INTRODUCTION

1.1 Foreword

Bloody Sunday was improbable, unthinkable, avoidable and yet inevitable.

That the British Army would open fire on an unarmed group of civilians was improbable to the citizens of Derry and to those who organised the Civil rights march for 30th January 1972.

That the British Army would open fire and kill 13 and wound 14 unarmed and innocent people was unthinkable even to those in the midst of the slaughter.

That the whole incident was avoidable was known to the chief police officers in Derry and to Brigadier MacLellan and the senior officers of 8th Brigade.

That it was inevitable was the consequence of a combination of events, values, personalities and factors, notable among which were the hopelessly and irretrievably flawed planning, the intervention of the CLF, the lack of checks and balances in the military decision making process, the unconstitutional position of the army, the use of the 1st Battalion of the Parachute Regiment, the command structure and communications on the day, political expediency, and the absence of any political control which had been devolved to the military by the blurring of the line between instrument and principal, whether deliberate or otherwise.

The mere mention of Bloody Sunday has the capacity to excite the most diverse of reactions, often at an emotional level. This Inquiry provides an opportunity to establish a solid basis of fact to inform such reactions. Hindsight can be a difficult tool. It can obscure the all-pervasive sense of contingency as well as the problematic nature of the choices facing the principal actors in historical events. On the other hand it can provide a useful panoramic perspective in which to frame issues in their full context, which may have been obscured from those trapped in the crucible of the moment, by allowing for the interplay of all the factors contributing to the outcome and its consequences. With it there is the opportunity to form an overview of what otherwise might appear to be a patternless swirl of unconnected events which in truth are so intricately woven as to be seamless.

1.2 PRELIMINARY OBSERVATIONS

1.2.1 The Starting Point

That the deceased and injured were innocent is a convenient starting point for any analysis of Bloody Sunday, what happened, why it happened and how it happened.

The Synopsis of the Proposed Opening Statement by the Lawton team OS7.1 dated 24th July 2000 sets out the basic position of the soldiers they represent:

> "Those clients who fired live rounds aimed and shot at, and only at, those whom they believed to be gunmen or nail bombers threatening lethal violence to them or to others. However, it does not follow that those who have been identified as having been killed or wounded on 30th January 1972 were themselves gunmen or nail bombers." (OS7.2)

Mr. Glasgow QC further refined this position. Day 51/21/14 to Day 51/21/25 when he said:

"I accept that none of the soldiers whom were represent has ever said that he was able to recognise as having been a person at whom he fired any of the individuals who have been publicly identified and named, and accordingly, we are not instructed to contend, and we will not contend, unless of course some new evidence that you produce alters the position, that those persons who have been identified were armed with lethal weapons. It follows, as has been rightly accepted for a long time, that innocent people were killed on Bloody Sunday."

That the deceased and injured were innocent is so obvious and elemental that it is at risk of being overlooked or becoming invisible in the assessment of what occurred on Bloody Sunday. It is the one crucial fact, which provides an invaluable tool for the appraisal of other evidence.

The position statement as set out on behalf of the soldiers gives rise to the following propositions:

(1) That the soldiers have no specific evidence to give as to how each of the deceased and injured came to be shot, and rely simply on the general assertion that on each occasion when they did open fire they were justified in doing so;

(2) That as the soldiers who admit to opening fire claim to have shot 27 people there are up to 27 missing casualties;

(3) In the absence of any explanation from the soldiers it is a reasonable probability that there was no justifiable excuse for the killing or wounding of those who are identified and known to have been shot;

(4) That there has been a massive conspiracy by substantial numbers of those present on the day, friends and relations, medical personnel, religious and other prominent figures to spirit away, treat and bury up to 22 youths and men, and conceal this conspiracy from the community, the media, the police, special branch, the army, the intelligence services and rival political opponents, and this has been conducted successfully for 31years;

(5) That those present at the scenes of the shootings have for 31 years deliberately withheld evidence which would have exonerated the deceased and injured;

(6) That evidence of the innocence of the deceased and injured has been deliberately suppressed by significant numbers of persons who had both direct and indirect knowledge of the subsequent actions connected to those the army allegedly did shoot other than those identified;

(7) That up to 54 people were shot by the soldiers of Support Company on Bloody Sunday;

(8) That on up to each of 27 occasions when the soldiers opened fire at specific targets they missed their intended victim and shot accidentally an innocent bystander;

(9) That while each of the deceased and injured was innocent each of their deaths and injuries were legally justified;

(10) That the IRA or civilian gunmen engaged the members of Support Company in a concerted, intense and organised manner using a variety of weaponry and tactics;

(11) That as there is no way of telling from the evidence of the soldiers either individually or collectively how they could have mistakenly or accidentally shot innocent bystanders it leaves open the possibility that some or all of the deceased or injured may in fact and in truth have been engaging the troops with lethal weapons;

(12) That the personal integrity of the soldiers is the touchstone of the truth of what occurred to justify their shooting;

(13) That the position statement is predicated upon the absence of evidence to implicate the deceased and injured in engaging the troops with lethal weapons, and the inability of the soldiers of Support Company to provide any account whatsoever as to the circumstances in which they came to kill and injure the 27 persons that have been identified as their victims;

(14) That those soldiers of Support Company who killed and maimed on Bloody Sunday are victims of a conspiracy to conceal the truth, and groundless accusations.

1.2.3 The position statement is, therefore, no more than a factual acknowledgment, namely, that there is absolutely no evidence to connect any one of the deceased or wounded with the use of or involvement in the use of lethal force against the soldiers of 1Para, or indeed with any activity which would have justified a soldier in opening fire. It is simultaneously an undiluted declaration that the soldiers are innocent of any wrongdoing and an avowal that "for an innocent person, even one, to be falsely accused of murder or of conspiracy to murder where what he was doing or attempting to do was nothing more or less than his duty in those same horrific circumstances is almost equally abhorrent." Day 051 This is, therefore, to equate the plight of the shooters with that of their victims. The case the soldiers have made is that on at least 37 occasions they opened fire at 32 gunmen and bombers [12 nail bombers, 9 riflemen, 9 other assorted gunmen, 1 acid bomber and 1 petrol bomber]. A brief review of the soldiers' evidence in the sectors demonstrates the untenable nature of the propositions contained in their Position Statement.

1.3 Review Of The Soldiers' Evidence In The Sectors

1.3.1. On the 30th of January 1972 at least 22 soldiers of the 1st Battalion of the Parachute Regiment opened fire with ball ammunition in an area of Derry, approximately 125 yards east to west and 75 yards north to south, situated in the Bogside bordered on the east by Chamberlain Street, on the west by Abbey Park, on the north by William Street and on the south by the rear of Rossville Flats. They opened fire on at least 44 occasions. They killed 13 citizens of Derry and wounded a further 14. They fired at least 108 7.62m rounds and 64 baton rounds. The 7.62m.rounds were fired from SLR rifles and travelled at approximately 2,600 feet per second. All those who fired were within a short distance of those who died or were injured. All but 5 of these shots were fired within a period of some 6 minutes between 4.10pm and 4.18pm. 5 people were shot in the car park of Rossville Flats, 1 fatally; 7 were shot at or near a rubble barricade in Rossville Street, 6 fatally; 7 were shot in Glenfada Park North, 2 fatally; 2 were shot in Abbey Park, both fatally; 4 were shot behind Rossville Flats, 2 fatally; and 2 were shot on waste ground on the southern side of William Street.

1.3.2 John Johnston and Damien Donaghy were the first persons shot on Bloody Sunday. They were shot on an area of open ground to the south of William Street. They were shot from a derelict building known as Abbey Taxis and occupied by members of Machinegun Platoon. They were undoubtedly shot by either A or B.

1.3.2.1 Neither A nor B admits to having shot either of them. Both claim to have shot the same person who was, however, a completely different person from either Donaghy or Johnston. Neither A nor B admit the chance of mistakenly shooting either Damien Donaghy or John Johnston. Neither admits to having seen either Donaghy or Johnston being struck by their bullets or falling to the ground. These shootings occurred at approximately 3.50pm. There is no record on the Brigade Log, the Porter tape or the 1 Para log of these shootings. 8th Brigade was not informed of these shootings or the circumstances in which they took place. Neither A nor B claim to have seen Donaghy or Johnston being assisted from the scene. Donaghy and Johnston must have within the sights of A and B, been struck by their bullets. Both A and B claim to have seen the man they shot being assisted from the area.

1.3.3 Of the 5 persons shot in the Rossville Flats courtyard no soldier admits responsibility for any of their injuries. No soldier admits to seeing any of these persons shot. No soldier admits to witnessing the circumstances in which these persons were shot. No soldier admits to witnessing the circumstances in which civilians gave assistance to any of those shot other than Jackie Duddy. No soldier acknowledges the existence of Margaret Deery or Michael Bridge, let alone witnessing them being carried in front of their eyes to 33 Chamberlain Street. Those soldiers who admit firing were within 50 yards and more realistically 25 yards of all these events. While denying responsibility for the death and injury of those who were in fact shot by army ammunition and weapons they claim to have shot at least 9 unaccounted for gunmen and bombers, having fired 32 rounds on 14 separate occasions.

1.3.4 Of the 7 persons who were shot at the rubble barricade there is no explanation from any soldier present on Rossville Street which can account for the death of 4 of those killed, namely Michael McDaid, John Young, William Nash, or Hugh Gilmore. Soldier F undoubtedly killed Michael Kelly but never claimed to have fired across the barricade until the 17th February, although he had made 3 previous statements in which he had completely omitted any account of such an incident. Soldiers K, L and M all provide explanations for firing, which could account for one of them being responsible for the death of Kevin McElhinney. Soldier P claims to have fired 9 rounds in the general direction and area of the rubble barricade and to have fired 4 of those shots at a pistol man behind the barricade, 3 of which struck the man in the chest. This is inconsistent with the forensic medical evidence available on all those who were shot at this location. Further, no other soldier admits to seeing or witnessing the shots fired by P across the barricade, or circumstances which would have justified him firing when he claims to have done so at a pistol man and subsequently above the heads of a threatening crowd. 3 soldiers claim to provide an account which could explain the injury to Alex Nash and potentially for the death of his son William, namely that a pistol man fired from the doorway of the Rossville Flats at the south west corner. This is inconsistent with the forensic evidence, which proves that William Nash was shot once with a 7.62mm bullet fired from an army rifle.

1.3.5 In all 11 soldiers claim to have fired a total of 36 shots in Rossville Street. Of the soldiers 5 were from Composite Platoon and therefore must have fired at a relatively late stage and probably when all had been killed at the barricade with the exception of Kevin McElhinney; 2 were from Mortar Platoon; and 4 were from Anti-tank Platoon.

Of the 36 shots it is claimed that 16 were fired at the windows of block 1 of Rossville Flats and these shots resulted in 2 casualties. The remaining 20 shots were fired in the direction of and over the barricade resulting in 5 casualties. Of the 5 casualties those claimed by C, P and U do not correspond with any of the known facts concerning any of those who were shot at the barricade. C, P and U account for 12 of the 20 shots allegedly fired in this area. Hugh Gilmore was shot while moving on the east side of Rossville Street and making his way south towards the south west corner of Block 1. No soldier of Support Company claims to have fired at anyone in the vicinity where he was killed or to have seen him shot.

1.3.6 Glenfada Park North is approximately 30 metres wide by 50 metres long. All 7 of those shot in this confined square were shot in a narrow corridor running from east to west at its southern end. 5 were shot in the southwest corner, which also contained the exit into Abbey Park. 1, Patrick O'Donnell, was shot at the southeast gable and 1, Daniel Gillespie, was shot while making his way to the southeast corner. The injuries sustained by the last mentioned 2 do not correspond with the injuries inflicted by E who is the only soldier who has claimed to fire in this direction. Indeed no soldier claims to have fired at a person positioned within Glenfada Park North as occupied by Daniel Gillespie. The injuries sustained by William McKinney, Joe Mahon, James Wray, Michael Quinn and Joe Friel do not correspond to those claimed to have been inflicted by soldiers F, G and H. All of their injuries are consistent with the actions of persons in flight moving from east to west across Glenfada Park North and seeking to make good their escape into Abbey Park.

SOLDIER	SHOTS-LOCATION	CASUALTIES
E	2 at nail bomber who fell, nail bomb exploded SE corner	1
F	2 at nail bomber, SW corner,	1, hit in the arm and chest
G	3 at 2 gunmen with short rifles	1 and possibly 2 shot to the front torso, or side
H	22 in total; 2 at man with coca-cola type tin, 1 at 2nd. man who picked object up, 19 through a window	3. First man, and Second youth in denim jacket in arm or shoulder. Third man behind window
TOTALS	29	6 possibly 7

No soldier claims to have heard or seen H fire 19 consecutive rounds at a window or to have observed a person behind a window, even in silhouette, attempting to fire a weapon. Indeed none of the soldiers claims to have had his attention distracted by an unusual number of shots fired consecutively by anyone in this restricted area.

Video 48 clearly shows the Anti-Tank soldiers going forward in platoon force yet only 6 admit to being in Glenfada Park North.

This sector is one in which the credibility of the soldiers is critical. Once again what is apparent is the admission by 4 of those soldiers who fired shots to having killed does not relate to having killed or injured any of those actually known to have been shot.

1.3.6 Gerard McKinney and Gerard Donaghey were both killed in Abbey Park. The bullet recovered from the body of Gerard Donaghey was proven forensically to have come from the rifle of G. G never at any time claimed to have killed or shot anyone in Abbey Park. In his oral evidence before the Widgery Inquiry he fleetingly referred to having fired into the alleyway at the southwest corner of Glenfada Park. This means (a) that the round count he provided is incomplete or (b) that he has lied about the circumstances in which he fired the rounds accounted for or (c) he has lied about both.

1.3.7 No other soldier admits to seeing or hearing G shoot anyone in Abbey Park, or going into the alleyway at the south west corner or witnessing any event, incident or action that would have justified the killing of anyone in that location.

1.3.8 To the rear of Rossville Flats 4 people were shot. These were Paddy Doherty, Barney McGuigan, both killed, Patrick Campbell and Danny McGowan.

1.3.9 Only 1 soldier, F, admits to having fired shots, which could account for any of the deaths or injuries. However as he only claims to have fired 2 shots at 1 man with a pistol who would have been in the vicinity of the position of Paddy Doherty it means that there is no explanation forth coming from any of the soldiers to account for the death of Barney McGuigan, or the injuries to Patrick Campbell and Danny McGowan. Furthermore a remarkable series of photographs of Paddy Doherty both before and after his death demonstrate conclusively that he was crawling to safety at the time he was shot and was not in possession of a firearm.
No other soldier claims to having seen or witnessed anything in this area, which would have justified the shooting of 1 let alone 4 people in this sector.

1.3.10 The photographic evidence establishes the movements of both Barney McGuigan and Danny McGowan immediately before they were shot and clearly shows their attempts to provide assistance to the dying Hugh Gilmore at the southwest corner of Block 1 of Rossville.

1.4 Initial Response To The Position Statement

1.4.1 This brief outline of the evidence in the sectors establishes that the current contentions set out in the Position Statement are wholly incompatible with the facts as attested to by the soldiers. Although each shooter does not profess to be able to identify a target as a known individual, nonetheless, each provides specific detail as to the location and the activity that the alleged gunman or bomber was engaged in prior to, or at the time he was shot. Each shooter claims to have had a particular target in his sights when he fired. Each shooter claims to have hit only an identified target, with the possible exception of U who claims that after he shot a pistol man in the vicinity of Joseph Place a man behind the gunman clutched his head. No soldier claims to have witnessed any person other than the specific target at whom he aimed being struck. No soldier claims to have seen any person being assisted from the scene other than the specific target who had been hit. Each soldier accounts for each round fired, and none describes any circumstances that allow for the possibility of innocent bystanders being shot.

1.4.2 Further, and most tellingly, a number of those indisputably shot by members of Support Company were shot at locations and at times when the number of shots fired cannot accommodate their injuries and deaths.

On its own the soldiers' evidence does not permit the concession made in the Position Statement, except in the most theoretical, and therefore in the present context most worthless sense. The concession is no more than a stratagem to enable the shooters to claim that they are victims rather than perpetrators, and consequently avoid the moral, ethical and legal consequences of their actions. It also is designed to ensure that the civilian witnesses were denied the opportunity to face examination on behalf of the shooters on the basis that the deceased and injured were using lethal force and therefore deliberately and intentionally shot by the members of Support Company.

1.4.3 Given the irrefutable independent body of evidence, the presentation of the actual case made by the individual soldiers would have posed enormous problems and its threadbare nature readily exposed. For example how could the deaths of Jackie Duddy, Hugh Gilmore, John Young, Michael McDaid, William Nash, Jim Wray, William McKinney, Gerard McKinney, Gerard Donaghey, Barney McGuigan, Kevin McElhinney, Michael Kelly and Paddy Doherty have been dealt with, considering that no soldier claims to have shot any one of them?

1.4.4 The Position Statement is not predicated upon the failure of the soldiers' ability to identify any of the deceased or injured as individuals, but rather their complete inability to truthfully account for the circumstances in which they came to shoot their actual victims.

1.4.5 The contention that the soldiers only fired at those whom they believed to be gunmen or nail bombers threatening lethal force which is then modified by the qualification that "it does not follow that those who have been identified as having been killed or wounded on 30th January 1972 were themselves gunmen or nail bombers" falls far short of accepting that they were in truth and in fact innocent. The further gloss on Day 51/22/24 that "It follows, as has rightly been accepted for a long time, that innocent people were killed on Bloody Sunday" falls a long way short of accepting that all those shot and injured were innocent, and is a formula which avoids the necessity of identifying those who the soldiers now accept were innocent and those whom they do not.

1.4.6 The families utterly reject the thesis that the soldiers are victims who were, in the execution of their unpleasant but necessary duty, justified in killing and wounding those who were identified and known to have been shot by them.

An expression of regret which is unaccompanied by an acceptance of responsibility is vacuous. An expression of regret accompanied by a claim of justification is a further injury.

1.5 The Search For The Truth

1.5.1 In opening this Inquiry on Day 001/13/15 to Day 001/13/18 Mr Clarke stated, "the truth has a light of its own, although it may be the first casualty of hostility, it has formidable powers of recovery, even after a long interval". The conscientious search for the truth is all that the families of the deceased and injured have sought, convinced that in the truth lies the vindication of their relatives, whatever the repercussions for others whether military, paramilitary or politician. Their commitment to this Tribunal's work is total. They recognise that it is through this Tribunal alone that the facts can be established and judgments made. There may be unpalatable facts and judgments but these cannot, and will not, impact upon the primary fact that the deceased and injured were innocent of any wrongdoing and shot without justification.

1.5.2 The families have repeatedly called upon all those with information about the events of Bloody Sunday to provide it to the inquiry. To this end they have worked with public representatives, lawyers, individuals and the Tribunal staff responsible for tracing witnesses. They remain conscious of and pained by the deficit in information imposed upon them at the Widgery Tribunal. The deliberate withholding of the initial statements of the soldiers and other vital material by the army and the lawyers to that Tribunal led to structural, substantive and procedural defects, which delivered an irrecoverable blow to the search for the truth. Their determination is that these proceedings should not suffer similarly. Their campaign for the establishment of this Tribunal was founded on their commitment to the truth. A full investigation is not merely desirable but achievable. "The deliberate killing of individuals.....by agents of the state is something that one associates with lawless totalitarian regimes. That is not to say that in liberal democracies such events cannot occur. The difference between totalitarian states and democracies lie in their response to a serious allegation that such targeted killings took place. It would be antithetical to the nature of a totalitarian state to permit such killings to be investigated. On the other hand, in modern times, liberal democracies have progressively become more ready to undertake investigations in such cases." McKerr v Secretary of State[2004] UKHL 12 para 36 Lord Steyn

1.5.3 The incontrovertible evidence establishes that members of Support Company shot the 13 deceased and 14 wounded. Even in controversial circumstances the truth will usually have a residual core of undisputed material, which provides a basis for moving forward with some assurance and as against which the areas of dispute may be narrowed and eventually resolved.

1.5.4 In this inquiry the common ground is that the deceased and injured are innocent. The area of contention is whether the soldiers of Support Company were justified in shooting them. The civilian evidence provides no corroboration for the assertion that any soldier was justified in shooting to kill on Bloody Sunday. The forensic evidence upon which they formerly sought to rely has been completely discredited. The protection offered by the disciplined adherence to the terms of the Yellow Card by members of 1 Para has been shown to be largely illusory.

It, therefore, follows that those with the most relevant, significant and material evidence to give to this inquiry are those who actually fired shots. Their evidence, therefore, is the basic starting point. Their belief as to what they say justified them in shooting to kill is entirely within their knowledge. Their credibility is central to the case that they seek to make.

1.6 Justification For Firing

1.6.1 No soldier who shot to kill acknowledges making a mistake. Each, except U, claims to have hit and only to have hit a specific identified target. The evidence of justification upon which the shooters seek to rely is:

1. They aimed and shot at and only at, those whom they believed to be using firearms or to be threatening lethal violence to them or to others. They accept that they would not have been entitled to fire on any other basis;
2. That civilian gunmen were operating on Bloody Sunday;
3. There appear to have been many more casualties than have been accounted for;
4. That gunmen and bombers were killed on Bloody Sunday.

Mr.Glasgow QC's opening statement Day 051/22/20 to Day 051/23/7 continues:

> " For the purposes of everything that I say today, we are wholly ignoring the military evidence, I wholly accept that if I were to engage in the same exercise and read out a lot of soldiers' statements contradicting what has been said, that would be classic adversarial advocacy and it could not conceivably assist you.

We have restricted ourselves wholly to non-military evidence and ignored all the soldiers' statement at all levels and simply ask you to look at this stage at the civilian evidence that is available, largely upon the basis of what you have already been told and what has been opened to you."

1.6.2 The 4 propositions set out above represent a perfectly rational, but incomplete, approach to the question of justification. What cannot be done is to isolate, then disregard, the belief of the shooter from the specific material upon which, at the time of firing, he formed that belief. These are interdependent elements of the law of justification and it is essential that a material correlation between the two is established. What is missing from the proposed approach is that link. Far from being a classic adversarial course it would have been of invaluable assistance to the families and to the Tribunal to have had identified each belief of each of the shooters', which was supported, confirmed or strengthened in its particulars by other testimony. General propositions are of little value in resolving issues that are event specific.

1.6.3 To read out a lot of soldiers' statements contradicting what had been said may have profited little. The same could not be said of the exercise of demonstrating the consistency between the actual belief held by a shooter at the time of fire and other evidence relevant to his decision to fire and its consequences. This is a fundamental forensic requirement particularly in an inquisitorial setting where the truth has precedence over sectional interest.

1.6.4 It has never been the case advanced by the families of the deceased and wounded represented by Madden & Finucane at this inquiry that there were no civilian gunmen who fired on Bloody Sunday. The statement by Mr.Glasgow on Day 371/227/10 to Day 371/227/20 is simply wrong. The submission made on behalf of those who pressed for this inquiry is that such civilian gunfire as was directed at the army on Bloody Sunday did not justify a single soldier firing at a single civilian in the circumstances that any of the deceased and wounded are known to have been shot.

1.6.5 It is simply wrong to suggest that the case made by the families is that there was no attempt to conceal civilian casualties. The case made is that any such attempt would if made have come to light, as occurred with Michael Doherty.

1.6.6 The case made is that it is simply offensive to allege that bodies were buried, without benefit of ceremony, in concealed unmarked graves and the identity of those so defiled kept secret. The case made is that there is not one shred of evidence to support such a claim by the shooters and their confederates. The case made is that this part of the shooters case is based upon the appreciation that as they cannot or will not account for those they actually shot and as the forensic evidence is regrettably deficient in identifying the soldier responsible for each victim they are safe to claim that they must have shot other unknown and unaccounted for persons of whom no conceivable trace has been left. Not simply the disappeared but the disappearance of the unidentified, unacknowledged and the unmourned. Army mythology that is based on a total misunderstanding of militant republican cultural reality.

1.6.7 The evidence relied on to claim that there were many more missing casualties than those accounted for is not derived from a principled comparison of the soldiers' accounts and that of the civilian and other evidence but rather a survey of the latter evidence specifically designed not to produce truth but some support for a general thesis which cannot be related to the specifics of the soldiers' versions of events. The evidence relied on lacks clarity and in many cases sufficient detail to determine whether it could be connected to persons hit by gunshot. While much of it can be related to a distorted recollection of those who were killed and wounded, much of it is simply confused and unreliable.

1.6.8 The validity of the case now made can be tested as against that advanced at the time.

(i) General Ford, when interviewed by John Bierman, claimed that his information was that the Para Battalion had fired only 3 shots in response to between 10 and 20 shots being fired at them. When the reporter pointed out that he had seen more than 3 casualties the General responded that these need not necessarily have been caused by the Paras. V1/9.40 to 13.00

(ii) Colonel Wilford when interviewed by Gerald Seymour claimed that 3 gunmen had been hit. V 3/7.10 to 8.40

(iii) The Loden shot plot, OS1.807, which has been constructed from information which he obtained that evening from those who fired, see B2259 paragraph D, does not account for the numbers of those who were killed and injured.

(iv) The Sit-rep transmitted at 23.59 pm that night claimed that there were 3 possible reasons for the discrepancy between the 13 civilians killed and the 5+ claimed by the Paras, namely indiscriminate fire from the gunmen, ricochets and two deaths caused by the same high velocity bullet. See Sit Rep G99.600.

(v) The case advanced at Widgery was the rather uncomplicated one, namely, as Paras only fired aimed shots at identified targets, which they hit it followed that the deceased and wounded were those targets.

1.6.9 The fundamental discrepancy is not that there are missing casualties but the evolution of the shooters case from that of too many casualties to too few. This has to be seen in the context of a failure of:

(i) Any member of Anti-Tank Platoon to admit to firing even a single shot across the Barricade in Rossville Street when questioned by Colonel Loden;

(ii) A plausible explanation to account for the extra casualties now represented by the known deceased and wounded;

(iii) A single journalist or photographer to witness and record bodies being spirited away from the very heart of the action;

(iv) The soldiers of the resident battalions who were manning the check points at the inner and outer cordons to prevent the removal;

(v) The professed failure of the officers of 1 Para to appreciate at the time that their soldiers must have killed and injured many more than the numbers admitted.

1.7 Self-Defence

Self-defence is generally regarded as a matter of justification rather than excuse. A person can rely on justification if he mistakenly believes he is under attack if there is evidence to support such a defence.Traditionally, the person's belief had to be based on reasonable grounds. The Privy Council in Beckford v The Queen (1988) AC 130 accepted the approach of the Criminal Law Revision Committee that a person may use such force as is reasonable in the circumstances as he believes them to be. However under Article 2 of the European Convention on Human Rights, a more demanding standard of honest belief for "good reasons" may be required certainly as far as trained law enforcement officers are concerned (see Andronicou v Cyprus (1998) 25 EHRR 491).

1.7.1 The claim of mistaken belief in each of 27 cases of deliberate firing by the soldiers of Support Company fails on the fundamental requirement of honesty. The recitation of the mantra that "I genuinely believed my life and that of my comrades to be in danger and I therefore opened fire" is a simple concept understood by any soldier even one to whom the strictures of the Yellow Card remain sealed. The belief and its genuineness are tested by the facts upon which it is based. A test, which in each instance, the shooters fail.

1.8 Military And Political Responsibility

1.8.1 In a democratic society the sustained use of the military in aid of the Civil Power is a testament to the failure of the political system. The military functions in necessarily but radically different ways from other law enforcement agencies. The most obvious being;

(i) That its personnel are armed with lethal weapons which they are trained to use only with the intended purpose of causing death;
(ii) That its personnel receive insufficient specialised training for their role in policing;
(iii)That the deployment of its men may be in areas and among communities that they are not part of and of which they have very little understanding;
(iv)That there are distinctions in approach by different regiments to similar problems;
(v) That policing can be seen as an opportunity to maintain an aggressive spirit by engaging the enemy;
(vi)That the investigation of complaints concerning the use of excessive force against the army was, by design, considerably less rigorous than that for civilians.

1.8.2 The Political control of a military operation in which the use of lethal force may occur is, therefore, critical. The fact that the 1st Battalion of the Parachute Regiment was the immediate and direct instrument for the use of lethal force on Bloody Sunday does not mean that the sole responsibility for what happened lies with those who fired and their officers.

1.8.3 Why Bloody Sunday happened extends far beyond the events of the day. Westminster, as the sovereign Parliament, had devolved power for the peace,order and good Government of Northern Ireland to Stormont. In doing so it sanctioned a political system that was fossilized from the moment of its inception. In effect all the organs of the State were in the control of one Political Party, which had a permanent in-built majority and little incentive to initiate accommodative change to secure the allegiance of its nationalist minority.

1.8.4 By 1969 the Political system had collapsed under the weight of its own out dated and unrepresentative political structures. This was rather simplistically presented as a breakdown in law and order, thus presenting the symptom as the disease. The Westminster Government, which had remained detached and aloof from the political process and problems of Northern Ireland, was compelled to address the crisis in law and order on the streets. It was unwilling, however, to commit the enormous resources required for confronting the fundamental changes necessary to democratise the political and social order within the State. The commitment of the army was an essential initial step but while the sovereign Government knew that stability and order are the product of sound political institutions commanding the general respect of its citizens it chose the path of its own self interest in attempting to confine the problem within the context of the existing political framework of Northern Ireland.

1.8.5 The failure to address the root problems which led to social unrest, division and conflict left the Unionist Government in power sustained by a substantial military presence. Stormont thus found itself dependent upon the military, over which it had no legitimate control, for that area of government that most exercised the attention of its supporters, namely law and order. The Joint Security Committee sought to address the inherent tensions and irreconcilable anomalies this created. The military by its very nature, as the instrument of the implementation of policy devised and refined within a political framework, was ill-suited to formulating judgments on the political dynamics of complex social and historical issues. Its function was to deal with consequences not resolve their political causes. The Westminster judgment was that its best option was the continuation of a devolved parliament in Northern Ireland with Brian Faulkner as Prime Minister of a Unionist Government. To this end he had to be supported in office and his programme accepted in large measure. As his survival was dependent upon his power to establish stability, stability became the prime objective, seen as the price and not the product of political change.

1.8.6 The military solution was elevated to the primary strategic approach on the political agenda of both Westminster and Stormont with the result that senior military figures in Northern Ireland, particularly General Ford, gradually began to accept the Unionist perspective of both the problem and its solution. The deteriorating security situation, including the failure of internment, tarnished the reputation of the army, which was identified with the inability of the Executive to govern effectively. If a military solution was the preferred option then clearly stronger measures were required to achieve it. The attendant increased risk to civilian life had simply to be accepted. It was against this background and the ban on marches that the Civil Rights March of 30th January 1972 took place. If it was a challenge it was also an opportunity. The army which would have been restricted by tight political control had it been operating in Britain was largely autonomous in Northern Ireland, therefore, largely free to determine its own response.

1.9 SUMMARY CONCLUSIONS

1.9.1 General Ford's profound lack of understanding of the unique problems of Derry, given his position as the Commander of Land Forces, led to many of the disastrous decisions, which when combined with the political failure to define clear constitutional legitimacy for and control over the operational deployment of the army in Northern Ireland, culminated in the events of Bloody Sunday. Bloody Sunday did not happen simply because Support Company of 1 Para used unjustified lethal force against an unarmed civilian crowd. It occurred because the use of that force was made possible by the following:

(i) The unlawful usurpation by the army of the statutory role of the Police;

(ii) The supremacy of the army over the RUC in critical areas of law enforcement;

(iii) The willingness of the Chief Constable to accept for the RUC a role subordinate to that of the army;

(iv) General Ford's determination to establish that 8th Brigade's structural approach to law enforcement was responsible for or a substantial contributing factor in the continuance of disorder on the streets;

(v) General Ford's belief that Chief Superintendent Lagan had a corrupting affect on Brigadier MacLellan's military resolve;

(vi) General Ford's belief that it could be demonstrated to 8th Brigade, Northern Ireland H.Q., Stormont, Westminster and the local Unionist and nationalist populations that given the proper resolve and the use of stronger measures a military solution similar to that in Belfast was immediately achievable.

(vii) The wholly unlawful concept of a scoop up operation to detain and falsely imprison upwards of some 300 people.

(viii) The preparedness to countenance the use of wholesale perjury to make effective the product of the arrest operation;

(ix) The failure of the Government to address the constitutional legality of using the army for the purposes of such a scoop up operation;

(x) The demotion of the resident battalions of 8th Brigade to that of a peripheral role in potentially the most difficult aspect of the plans for the day and that which posed the greatest risk to civilian life;

(xi) The imposition of 1 Para as the arrest force by General Ford;

(xii) The use of 1 Para at Battalion strength under the command of its own officers;

(xiii) The delegation to 1 Para of complete control over the arrest operation once launched;

(xiv) There was no detailed arrest plan submitted to either 8th Brigade or General Ford who had oversight of the operational order prepared by MacLellan and his staff.

(xv) There was no detailed plan prepared by Colonel Wilford and his staff;

(xvi) 8th Brigade was effectively excluded from the decision making process as to the advisability and practicalities of a scoop up operation which was notionally under its command;

(xvii) The formality and protocol of the channels of communication, within the army, for questioning decisions made by higher authority were such as to eliminate productive input and discourage dissent;

(xviii) The failure of Brigadier MacLellan and his staff to adequately deal with the obvious deficiencies in the detail of the scoop up operation, its execution and the knowledge of 1 Para of the local conditions and geography of Derry either at the co-ordinating conference or before the day;

(xix) The detached view that 8th Brigade and 1 Para took of each other as represented in the fact that the sum total of their communication on such a vital issue as the scoop up operation was the short co-ordinating conference;

(xx) The failure to address the issue of separation with 1 Para and how this was to be achieved before any arrest scoop up operation was launched;

(xxi) The failure to address the precise area in which the scoop up was to take place and the limits of exploitation;

(xxii) The determination by Colonel Wilford and indeed General Ford that a scoop up operation should be launched created irresistible pressure on Brigade;

(xxiii) The failure of 1 Para to obey the Order for the launch of the scoop up operation as given;

(xxiv) The failure to convey Brigade's order in the terms it was given to the 3 Companies of 1 Para;

(xxv) The failure to co-ordinate the activities of the 3 Companies;

(xxvi) The haphazard entry into the Bogside in vehicles when no orders had been issued to any of the soldiers as to how far they were to go, or where the different Platoons were to deploy.

(xxvii) The total failure of leadership by the officers of Support Company.

(xxviii) The failure of Colonel Wilford to remain in his command post and control the operation once he had launched it.

(xxix) The failure of Wilford and the staff in the Gin Palace to obtain sufficient reliable information from each Company and pass that information back to Brigade;

(xxx) The failure to pass vital information back to Brigade, namely that members of Machine-Gun Platoon had claimed to have killed a nail bomber and a shot had been fired at members of the wire cutting party from Mortar Platoon, which could have had a decisive affect upon Brigade's decision whether it was appropriate to launch a scoop up operation given the risk to civilian life;

(xxxi) The provision of information to Brigade which was patently false as to how Support company had entered the Bogside;

(xxxii) The provision of information to Brigade that was totally inaccurate and false as to the consequences of the actions of Support Company.

The Submissions of Madden & Finucane seek to address these issues.

It would, however, be fatal to regard any of the soldiers' evidence as a foundation for even the most basic of facts of what happened on Bloody Sunday. The practical convenience of having an incontrovertible body of evidence from the shooters, against which other testimony could be assessed, has been lost by their individual and systematic failure to tell the truth. Their evidence has been deliberately fashioned to mask the plainest truth, namely that their firing was unjustified and their conduct criminal.

2. Structure of Submissions and Specific Allegations

2.1. Structure of Submissions

2.1.1. The following submissions represent the case of those individuals represented by Madden & Finucane before this Tribunal.

2.1.2. They address

a) the legal framework within which we submit the Tribunal should conduct its task, the provision of evidence to the Inquiry and the categories of evidence before the Tribunal;

b) the historical background to and political context within which the events of Bloody Sunday took place and the legal and constitutional considerations that prevailed in 1972;

c) the actions of the military in Northern Ireland;

d) the security background to the events of Bloody Sunday;

e) the planning of Operation Forecast and the sanction of those plans by the Stormont and Westminster governments;

f) the intelligence material available in advance of the march planned for 30th January 1972;

g) Operation Forecast, the plan and its implementation;

h) the evidence in respect of each of the five sectors identified by the Inquiry;

i) the arrests made by the army on Bloody Sunday;

j) evidence of civilian gunmen or IRA activity;

k) the theory that there were so-called "missing casualties" on Bloody Sunday;

l) Intelligence material that has emerged since Bloody Sunday

m) the framework against which responsibility for what happened on Bloody Sunday should be judged;

2.1.3. Finally we make allegations against the following:

a) Soldiers on the ground on Bloody Sunday;
b) The senior military officers and;
c) The two governments.

2.2. Allegations

2.2.1. We submit that the evidence before the Tribunal supports the following broad allegations

a) That the Northern Ireland and British governments and senior military officers tolerated, if not encouraged, in Northern Ireland, the use of unlawful violence including lethal force.
b) That in the planning, control, organisation, approval and conduct of the military operation on Bloody Sunday, the British Government, by acts or omissions of its servants or agents, violated domestic and international law standards protecting the right to life, including Article 2 of the European Convention.
c) That the Northern Ireland and British governments violated their obligation to protect the right to life of those who took part in the march on Bloody Sunday and others and failed to take all feasible measures to vindicate the right to life and to minimise to the greatest possible extent the risk to innocent lives.
d) That senior military officers violated their obligation to protect the right to life of the marchers and others and failed to take all feasible measures to vindicate the right to life and to minimise to the maximum possible extent the risk to innocent lives.
e) That by their acts and omissions in the planning, organisation, approval and conduct of the military operation on Bloody Sunday senior military officers violated domestic and international law standards protecting the right to life including Article 2 of the European Convention.

f) Members of Support Company, 1 Para, are guilty of the murders of Jackie Duddy, Michael Kelly, Michael McDaid, John Young, Hugh Gilmore, Kevin McElhinney, William McKinney, Gerard McKinney and Gerard Donaghey.

g) Members of Support Company, 1 Para, are guilty of the wounding and attempted murders of Damien Donaghy, John Johnston, Alana Burke, Peggy Deery, Patsy McDaid, Patsy O'Donnell, Joe Mahon, Joe Friel, Danny McGowan and Patrick Campbell.

2.2.2. These allegations are particularised in sections twenty six, twenty seven and twenty eight.

Legal and procedural framework within which Inquiry operates

3.1 General Introduction

We set out below the legal and procedural framework within which the Inquiry operates; analyse the impact in terms of Convention compliance of various Court decisions reversing key Inquiry rulings; and analyse the impact in terms of Convention compliance of further rulings of the Inquiry.

3.2 Summary of Submissions

3.2.1 The Tribunal was compelled to grant anonymity on a widespread basis to the soldiers and, particularly, in respect of those most centrally involved. It is submitted that this was incompatible with international law and practice and, in particular, with Article 2 of the Convention.

3.2.2 The Inquiry was compelled to change the venue for the hearing of the evidence of most of the soldiers, including those most centrally involved, from Derry to London. It is submitted that this was incompatible with international law and practice and, in particular, with Article 2 of the Convention.

3.2.3 The compulsion of the Tribunal to grant anonymity and change of venue resulted from the invocation and exercise of the supervisory jurisdiction of the British High Court. It is submitted that the subjection of the Tribunal to this jurisdiction was incompatible with international law and practice and, in particular, with Article 2 of the Convention.

3.2.4 The invocation by the soldiers of the jurisdiction of the British High Court was aided and abetted by the Ministry of Defence and the security agencies. It is submitted that this is part of a wider strategy to unpick the Inquiry, its processes and ultimately its results by challenges before Courts which, in the circumstances of this Inquiry, do not command the necessary confidence and are not accepted as sufficiently independent.

3.2.5 The Inquiry's original rulings on anonymity and venue were, as a matter of international law and practice correct. The imposed requirements were not Article 2 compliant and accordingly the Tribunal has been coerced into conducting an Inquiry which fell short of the requirements, inter alia, of Article 2.

3.2.6 In breach of relevant international law and practice and, in particular, Principle 16 of the United Nations Principles on the Effective Prevention and Investigation of Extra-Legal, Arbitrary and Summary Executions ("the UN Principles") (see APPENDIX 1) adopted on 24 May 1989 by the Economic and Social Council Resolution 1989/65) the families and the legal representatives did not have access to "all information relevant to the investigation".

3.3 Background to Establishment of the Inquiry

3.3.1 This Inquiry is one to which the provisions of the Tribunals of Inquiry (Evidence) Act 1921 applied. As is clear from Section 1(1) of the Act, such tribunals are only established by resolution of both Houses of Parliament "that it is expedient that a tribunal be established for enquiring into a definite matter described in the resolution as of urgent public importance".

3.3.2 In order to discharge its functions a tribunal of inquiry is given very wide powers, as is clear from Section 1(2) of the Act.

3.3.3 In 1966 a Royal Commission headed by Salmon LJ (as he then was) reported on Tribunals of Inquiry and justified their continued existed to deal with, amongst other things:

"... matters causing public concern which cannot be dealt with by ordinary civil or criminal processes but which require investigation in order to allay public anxiety".

3.3.4 In paras.27 and 28 of its report the Salmon Commission said:

"27. The exceptional inquisitorial powers conferred upon the Tribunal of Inquiry under the Act of 1921 necessarily expose the ordinary citizen to the risk of having aspects of his private life uncovered which would otherwise remain private, and to the risk of having baseless allegations made against him. This may cause distress and injury to reputation. For these reasons, we are strongly of the opinion that the inquisitorial machinery set up under the Act of 1921 should never be used for matters of local or minor public importance but always be confined to matters of vital public importance concerning which there is something in the nature of a nation-wide crises of confidence. In such cases we consider that no other method of investigation would be adequate.

28. Normally persons cannot be brought before a tribunal and questioned save in civil or criminal proceedings. Such proceedings are hedged around by long standing and effective safeguards to protect the individual. The inquisitorial procedure is alien to the concept of justice generally accepted in the United Kingdom. There are, however, exceptional cases in which such procedures must be used to preserve the purity and integrity of our public life without which a successful democracy is impossible. It is essential that on the very rare occasions when crises of public confidence occur, the evil, if it exists, shall be exposed so that it may be rooted out, or if it does not exist, the public shall be satisfied that in reality there is no substance in the prevalent rumours and suspicions by which they have been disturbed. We are satisfied that this would be difficult if not impossible without public investigation by an inquisitorial Tribunal possessing the powers conferred by the Act of 1921. Such a Tribunal is appointed by Parliament to inquire and report. The task of inquiring cannot be delegated by the Tribunal for it is the Tribunal which is appointed to inquire as well as to report. The public reposes its confidence not in some other body or person but in the Tribunal to make and direct all the necessary searching investigations and to produce the witnesses in order to arrive at the truth. It is only thus that public confidence can be fully restored".

3.4 Relevant International Law & Practice

3.4.1 Paragraph 9 of the UN Principles provides, inter alia, that:

"There shall be a thorough, prompt and impartial investigation of all suspected cases of extra legal, arbitrary and summary executions, including cases where complaints by relatives or other reliable reports suggest unnatural death in the above circumstances ..."

3.4.2 Paragraphs 10 to 17 of the UN Principles contain a series of detailed requirements that should be observed by investigative procedures into such deaths.

Paragraph 10 states, inter alia:

"The investigative authority shall have the power to obtain all the information necessary to the inquiry. Those persons conducting the inquiry ... shall also have the authority to oblige officials allegedly involved in any such executions to appear and testify ..."

Paragraph 11 specifies:

"In cases in which the established investigative procedures are inadequate because of a lack of expertise or impartiality, because of the importance of the matter or because of the apparent existence of a pattern of abuse, and in cases where there are complaints from the family of the victim about these inadequacies or other substantial reasons, Governments shall pursue investigations through an independent commission of inquiry or similar procedure. Members of such a commission shall be chosen for their recognized impartiality, competence and independence as individuals. In particular, they shall be independent of any institution, agency or person that may be the subject of the inquiry. The commission shall have the authority to obtain all information necessary to the inquiry and shall conduct the inquiry as provided in these principles."

Paragraph 16 provides, inter alia:

"Families of the deceased and their legal representatives shall be informed of, and have access to, any hearing as well as all information relevant to the investigation and shall be entitled to present other evidence ..."

Paragraph 17 provides, inter alia:

"A written report shall be made within a reasonable time on the methods and findings of such investigations. The report shall be made public immediately and shall include the scope of the inquiry, procedures, methods used to evaluate evidence as well as conclusions and recommendations based on findings of fact and on applicable law ..."

3.4.3 The "Minnesota Protocol" (Model Protocol for a legal investigation of extra-legal, arbitrary and summary executions, contained in the UN Manual on the Effective Prevention and Investigation of Extra-legal, Arbitrary and Summary Executions) provides, inter alia, in Section B on the "Purposes of an inquiry":

> "As set out in paragraph 9 of the Principles, the broad purpose of an inquiry is to discover the truth about the events leading to the suspicious death of a victim. To fulfil that purpose, those conducting the inquiry shall, at a minimum, seek:
> (a) to identify the victim;
> (b) to recover and preserve evidentiary material related to the death to aid in any potential prosecution of those responsible;
> (c) to identify possible witnesses and obtain statements from them concerning the death;
> (d) to determine the cause, manner, location and time of death, as well as any pattern or practice that may have brought about the death;
> (e) to distinguish between natural death, accidental death, suicide and homicide;
> (f) to identify and apprehend the person(s) involved in the death;
> (g) to bring the suspected perpetrator(s) before a competent court established by law."

3.4.4 In section D, it is stated that:

> "In cases where government involvement is suspected, an objective an impartial investigation may not be possible unless a special commission of inquiry is established ..."

3.4.5 Para.13 of Section D entitled "Rights of Parties" states, so far as material, as follows:

> "As mentioned in Principle 16, families of the deceased and their legal representatives shall be informed of, and have access to, any hearing and to all information relevant to the investigation, and shall be entitled to present evidence. This particular emphasis on the role of the family as a party to the proceedings implies the specially important role the family's interests play in the conduct of the investigation. ..."

3.5 European Convention – Article 2

3.5.1 The special role of the next of kin has been repeatedly recognized by the European Court of Human Rights and recently restated in Finucane v UK[1] [see APPENDIX 2] where at para.71 it states:

> "In all cases, however, the next of kin of the victim must be involved in the procedure to the extent necessary to safeguard his or her legitimate interests (see Gulec v Turkey, cited above, p.1733, 82; Ogur v Turkey, cited above, 92; Gul v Turkey, cited above, 93; and recent Northern Irish cases, for example, McKerr v the United Kingdom, cited above, 148).

3.5.2 The requirements for an Article 2 compliant investigation were recently summarised by the House of Lords in Amin where the House identified a number of important propositions derived from recent ECHR cases. They included the following:

"(7) For an investigation into alleged unlawful killing by state agents to be effective, it may generally be regarded as necessary (Jordan, paragraph 106)

> "for the persons responsible for and carrying out the investigation to be independent from those implicated in the events ... This means not only a lack of hierarchical or institutional connection but also a practical independence ..."

(8) While public scrutiny of police investigations cannot be regarded as an automatic requirement under article 2 (Jordan, paragraph 121), there must (Jordan, paragraph 109)

> "be a sufficient element of public scrutiny of the investigation or its results to secure accountability in practice as well as in theory. The degree of public scrutiny required may well vary from case to case."

(9) "In all cases", as the Court stipulated in Jordan, paragraph 109:

> "the next of kin of the victim must be involved in the procedure to the extent necessary to safeguard his or her legitimate interests".

(10) The Court has not required that any particular procedure be adopted to examine the circumstances of a killing by state agents, nor is it necessary that there be a single unified procedure: Jordan, paragraph 143. But it is "indispensable" (Jordan, paragraph 144) that there be proper procedures for ensuring the accountability of agents of the state so as to maintain public confidence and allay the legitimate concerns that arise from the use of lethal force.

3.6 Inquiry Rulings on Anonymity & Venue

3.6.1 (a) The Inquiry ruled that acceding to the soldiers application for anonymity would represent a "material derogation from the Tribunal's investigative function" and that in respect of the shooters "the very soldiers whose conduct lies at the centre of this Inquiry. To allow this group to remain entirely anonymous would be a step that we would find difficult to reconcile with our public duty to determine what happened on Bloody Sunday (see Inquiry Ruling - 17 December 1998 at paras.40, 44 and 46[2].

(b) The Tribunal subsequently ruled, after having considered the matter "with the greatest care that [they] can muster" that their "duty to carry out a public investigation" overrode the concerns of the soldiers and accordingly the soldiers' applications for anonymity again failed (see Inquiry Ruling - 5 May 1999 at paras.11, 12 and 23)[3].

[2] 40. We see the point of substance as being not the maintenance of public confidence as such, but rather the proper fulfilment of our public duty to ascertain what happened on Bloody Sunday. An intrinsic part of that task is the investigation of the actions of individual soldiers on the day, which in our view encompasses not only what they did, but also who they were. ... ... we are satisfied that, if anonymity in the strict sense were to be allowed on a widespread or blanket basis, that would represent a material derogation from the Tribunal's public investigative function.
44. ... For the reasons we have given, we have reached the view that it would be wrong in principle to give a general dispensation allowing all military witnesses to give evidence without revealing their names. Moreover we believe that this would, in the majority of cases, be going further than is justifiable or appropriate in circumstances where there is no concrete evidence of a specific threat. ...
46. ... it has to be recognised that these are the very soldiers whose conduct lies at the centre of this Inquiry. To allow this group to remain entirely anonymous would be a step that we would find difficult to reconcile with our public duty to determine what happened on Bloody Sunday.
See also para.50 where the Inquiry stated: "No risk exists to the personal safety of soldiers who have died since Bloody Sunday, and the prospect that the surviving relatives of a deceased soldier would be sought out and attacked by way of revenge for Bloody Sunday seems to us somewhat remote. ..." It is to be noted that notwithstanding this observation, even the shooters who are deceased, for example, "G" has still retained anonymity even in the absence of any application by any next of kin!

[3] 11. The Tribunal has as its fundamental objective the finding of the truth about Bloody Sunday. It regards itself as under a duty to carry out its public investigative function in a way that demonstrates to all concerned that it is engaged in a thorough, open and complete search for the truth about Bloody Sunday. ... All interested parties accept the existence of this duty, which to our minds stems not so much from the fact that Tribunals of the present kind are only established where Parliament considers that there is a matter of "urgent public importance", nor from the fact that section 2 of the Act of 1921 requires us to sit in public (unless the public interest otherwise requires) but rather from the more fundamental principle of open justice in a democratic society.

(c) In its Ruling on Venue they stated that "the chances of this Inquiry restoring public confidence in general and that of the people most affected in particular (which is the object of public inquiries of this kind) would be seriously diminished (if not destroyed) by holding the Inquiry or a major part of the Inquiry far away and across the Irish Sea, unless there were compelling reasons to do so" and that "it would be unreasonable and in breach of the Article 2 procedural requirements for the Tribunal to conduct a central part of the Inquiry at somewhere other than the natural and proper place for it" (see Inquiry Ruling - 2 August 2001 at paras.5, 26 and 47)[4].

12. In our view the existence of this duty entails that in the absence of compelling countervailing factors, those who give evidence to the Tribunal should do so under their proper names. This after all is an Inquiry into events in which people lost their lives and were wounded by British army gunfire on the streets of a city in the United Kingdom. To withhold the names of those in the army who were concerned with that event must detract from an open search for the truth about what happened: and must need justification of an overriding kind. It is of course correct to bear in mind (as we said in December) that it is unlikely that the Tribunal would be hampered in its objective of finding the truth about Bloody Sunday by granting anonymity (since the Tribunal is an inquisitorial body and would itself know the identity of the witnesses), but this does not really take the matter much further forward, since what is presently at issue is the question of the duty laid on the Tribunal as to the manner in which it should seek that objective. The Tribunal must conduct what Lord Justice Salmon described in his Report (1966 Cmnd 3121 at paragraph 28) as a "public investigation."
23. We undoubtedly have a very difficult judgment to make and we have considered with the greatest care that we can muster all the written and oral submissions made to us. ... After the most anxious consideration we have concluded that on the basis of the material presently before us our duty to carry out a public investigation overrides the concerns of the soldiers and does so even if the Widgery assurance continues to apply; and that accordingly the present applications of the soldiers must fail. ..."

[4] 5. We have no doubt that our preliminary view is correct. We are a tribunal comprised of members from three countries charged with seeking the truth about Bloody Sunday. On that day in a city in Northern citizens of the United Kingdom were killed and wounded by British troops. The events of that day, though of great national and international concern have undoubtedly had their most serious and lasting effects on the people of that city. It is there that the grief and outrage that the events occasioned are centered. It seems to us that the chances of this Inquiry restoring public confidence in general and that of the people most affected in particular (which is the object of public inquiries of this kind) would be very seriously diminished (if not destroyed) by holding the Inquiry or a major part of the Inquiry far away and across the Irish Sea, unless there were compelling reasons to do so. It is for similar reasons that public inquiries generally are held in or near to the place where the events to be investigated occurred.
26. In these circumstances we consider that it could not properly or reasonably be said that the Tribunal should remove itself from the Guildhall to Great Britain for the purpose of hearing the evidence of the soldiers, which forms, of course a central part of the inquiry. In this connection we draw attention to the fact that Article 2 of the European Convention on Human Rights has what has been described as procedural as well as substantive aspects. As to the former the jurisprudence establishes that there must be a proper procedure for reviewing the lawfulness of the use of lethal force by state authorities, for otherwise there would be no practical and effective means of protecting the rights afforded by the Article see: Jordan v UK (Application No. 24746/94, 4th May 2001). The present Inquiry is concerned with the use of lethal force by state authorities. For the reasons that we have already given, we consider that such an Inquiry should be conducted where the events in question occurred. We accept that this procedural requirement could not be used to override the substantive rights afforded by Article 2, but

3.6.2 Each of these Rulings were successfully challenged by the soldiers before the British High Court. Appeals in each case by the Inquiry failed[5].

3.6.3 The Tribunal was thus "ordered" by the Court of Appeal to grant anonymity to those soldiers who accepted that they fired live rounds on Bloody Sunday or who were alleged to have done so. In a further Ruling, 13 October 1999, the Tribunal concluded that it had "no option" but to accept the submission of the soldiers, that in the light of the Court of Appeal's ruling, soldiers other than those who fired were entitled to the benefit of anonymity.

3.7 Impact of the Rulings

3.7.1 The Inquiry's original Rulings were Convention compliant. We submit that the effect of the Orders relating to anonymity and venue which the Tribunal was compelled to submit to, were incompatible with the requirements of Article 2. The reasons why this is so are to be found in the detailed submissions previously advanced to the Tribunal by the families and in the reasons contained in the Rulings themselves. They include the following:

(a) The effect of the Court's Order was that the very soldiers whose conduct lay at the heart of the Inquiry were ordered by the Court to remain entirely anonymous. This was a material derogation from the Tribunal's public duty to determine what happened on Bloody Sunday. As the Tribunal itself recognized, an intrinsic part of that since in our view those rights would not be infringed by requiring the soldiers to give their evidence at the Guildhall with the protection that can be given to them, it seems to us that it would be unreasonable and indeed in contravention of the Article 2 procedural requirements for the Tribunal to conduct a central part of the inquiry at somewhere other than the natural and proper place for it.

47. In conclusion therefore, in the light of the information presently available to us, we consider that none of the arguments put forward by those acting on behalf of the soldiers is sufficient to provide a compelling reason for not hearing the oral evidence of the soldiers at the Guildhall, which we regard as the proper place for this Inquiry. We accordingly rule that this is where that evidence should be given.

task was the investigation of the actions of individual soldiers on the day which encompassed not only what they did but also who they were.

(b) The next of kin were not involved in the procedure to the extent necessary to safeguard their legitimate interests.

(c) Ordering London as the venue for the holding of a major part of the Inquiry and for the hearing of the evidence of those most centrally involved was, for the reasons identified by the Tribunal itself, unreasonable and a breach of Article 2 (see Inquiry Ruling – 2 August 2001 at paras. 26 – 35)

3.7.2 It is also submitted that the subjection of the Tribunal to the jurisdiction of the High Court was incompatible with international law and practice and, in particular, with Article 2 of the Convention.

3.7.3 To borrow the words of the Salmon Commission referred to above at para.3.3.4 the public reposes its confidence not in some other body or person but in the Tribunal ... and it is only thus that public confidence can be fully restored. In the present case, a body other than the Tribunal effectively took control of the Inquiry regarding key decisions such as anonymity and venue. Thus, the involvement of the British Courts in reversing such fundamentally important decisions has profound implications for the integrity and convention compliance of the overall process.

3.7.4 Moreover, the material upon which the decisions of the Courts were based emanated from the untested assertions of the soldiers themselves and material supplied by the MOD and the security agencies, none of whom could be regarded as having the requisite degree of independence.

3.7.5 The previous Inquiry conducted by the Lord Chief Justice of England and Wales is widely regarded as a whitewash.

3.7.6 A British Judge sitting alone or with other British Judges would not have been regarded as sufficient to command the requisite public confidence in a second inquiry. For that reason the present inquiry has a distinguished international dimension.

3.7.7 The invocation and exercise of the High Court supervisory jurisdiction of inferior tribunals is not only wholly inapposite in the context of the present distinguished tribunal but it is, we submit, incompatible with the UN Principles and Article 2.

3.7.8 Vital decisions of the tribunal cannot, in our submission, be legitimately overseen and reversed by British Judges particularly in the context of the present case.

3.7.9 What is the point in having a tribunal with a distinguished international membership if its vital rulings can be overseen and reversed by a solely British Court. A Court which itself lacks the international character which was recognized as a fundamental pre-requisite of the second inquiry.

3.7.10 Former state agents financed by the state and supported by other state agencies such as the MOD and the security services chose to invoke supervisory jurisdiction of the High Court. Their choice of forum was clearly deliberate and revealing. If it was appropriate to seek a judicial review the natural forum would have been the Courts in Northern Ireland since the Tribunal was based in Northern Ireland. They chose instead the High Court sitting in London rather than the High Court sitting in Belfast.

3.7.11 The invocation of the supervisory jurisdiction of the British Courts has served them well. Every challenge thus far mounted by the soldiers has been successful. By contrast the Tribunal's appeals against the various High Court judgments have been universally unsuccessful.

3.7.12 The involvement of the British Courts and the reversals of key decisions of the Tribunal have seriously undermined the confidence of, inter alia, the families.

3.7.13 The involvement of the British Courts and the collaboration of former state agents and state agencies is perceived to be part of a wider strategy which has now effectively received the green light from the British Courts.

3.7.14 This wider strategy seeks to unpick the Tribunal, its processes and ultimately its results by challenges before Courts which, in the circumstances of this Tribunal, do not command the necessary confidence and are not accepted as sufficiently independent.

3.8 Other Rulings

3.8.1 The Tribunal has delivered a series of Rulings which are summarised at Appendix 3 the cumulative effect of which has been to deny the families and their legal representatives access to "all information relevant to the investigation". It would be pointless to rehearse again our previous submissions but we wish to record our present submission that the denial of access to the families and their legal representatives of all information relevant to this Inquiry is incompatible with Article 2.

COUR EUROPÉENNE DES DROITS DE L'HOMME
EUROPEAN COURT OF HUMAN RIGHTS

FOURTH SECTION

CASE OF FINUCANE v. THE UNITED KINGDOM

(Application no. 29178/95)

JUDGMENT

STRASBOURG

1 July 2003

This judgment will become final in the circumstances set out in Article 44 § 2 of the Convention. It may be subject to editorial revision.

In the case of Finucane v. the United Kingdom,

The European Court of Human Rights (Fourth Section), sitting as a Chamber composed of:

Mr M. PELLONPÄÄ, President,
Sir Nicolas BRATZA,

FS 1 · 50

Mrs E. PALM,
Mr M. FISCHBACH,
Mr J. CASADEVALL,
Mr S. PAVLOVSCHI,
MR J. BORREGO BORREGO, judges, and Mr M. O'BOYLE, Section Registrar,

Having deliberated in private on 10 June 2003,
Delivers the following judgment, which was adopted on that date:

PROCEDURE

1. The case originated in an application (no. 29178/95) against the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland lodged with the European Commission of Human Rights ("the Commission") under former Article 25 of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms ("the Convention") by an Irish national, Mrs Geraldine Finucane ("the applicant"), on 5 July 1994.
2. The applicant was represented by Mr Peter Madden, a lawyer practising in Belfast. The United Kingdom Government ("the Government") were represented by their Agent, Mr C. Whomersley of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, London.
3. The applicant alleges that there had been no proper, effective investigation into the death of her husband, Patrick Finucane.
4. The application was transmitted to the Court on 1 November 1998, when Protocol No. 11 to the Convention came into force (Article 5 § 2 of Protocol No. 11).
5. The application was allocated to the Third Section of the Court (Rule 52 § 1 of the Rules of Court). Within that Section, the Chamber that would consider the case (Article 27 § 1 of the Convention) was constituted as provided in Rule 26 § 1.
6. On 1 November 2001 the Court changed the composition of its Sections (Rule 25 § 1). This case was assigned to the newly composed Fourth Section (Rule 52 § 1).
7. By a decision of 2 July 2002, the Court declared the application admissible.
8. The applicant and the Government each filed observations on the merits (Rule 59 § 1). The Chamber decided, after consulting the parties, that no hearing on the merits was required (Rule 59 § 3 in fine).

THE FACTS

I. THE CIRCUMSTANCES OF THE CASE

9. The applicant was born in 1950 and lives in Belfast, Northern Ireland.
10. At around 7.25 p.m. on 12 February 1989, the applicant's husband, solicitor Patrick Finucane, was killed in front of her and their three children by two masked men who broke into their home. She herself was injured, probably by a ricochet bullet. Patrick Finucane was shot in the head, neck and chest. Six bullets had struck the head and there was evidence that one or more of these had been fired within a range of 15 inches when he was lying on the floor. The day after the murder, on 13 February 1989, a man telephoned the press and stated that the illegal loyalist paramilitary group, the Ulster Freedom Fighters ("UFF") claimed responsibility for killing Patrick Finucane, the Provisional Irish Republican Army ("PIRA") officer not the solicitor.
11. Patrick Finucane was a solicitor who represented clients from both sides of the conflict in Northern Ireland and was involved in a number of high profile cases arising from that conflict.

The applicant believed that it was because of his work on these cases that prior to his murder he received death threats delivered, via his clients, by officers of the Royal Ulster Constabulary ("RUC") and was targeted for murder. Occasional threats had been made against Patrick Finucane since the late 1970s. After acting for Brian Gillen in a case concerning maltreatment in RUC custody, the threats apparently escalated, and clients reported that police officers often abused and threatened to kill him during interrogations at holding centres such as Castlereagh. On 5 January 1989, five weeks before his death, one of Patrick Finucane's clients reported that an RUC officer had said that Patrick Finucane would meet his end. On 7 January 1989, another client claimed that he was told that Finucane was "getting took out" (murdered). His death came less than four weeks after Douglas Hogg MP, then Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, in a Committee Stage debate on the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Bill on 17 January 1989 said:

> "I have to state as a fact, but with great regret, that there are in Northern Ireland a number of solicitors who are unduly sympathetic to the cause of the IRA."

1. Investigation into the killing

12. After the shooting, the applicant's house was cordoned off by the RUC and a forensic examination of the scene conducted by experts. Photographs were taken and maps prepared. A scene of crimes officer examined the car believed to have been used by those responsible for the shooting which had been found abandoned.
13. On 13 February 1989, a consultant in pathology conducted a post mortem examination.
14. A major incident room was set up as the Antrim Road police station. Many suspected members of the Ulster Freedom Fighters (UFF) were detained and interviewed about the murder.
15. On 4 July 1989, the RUC found one of the weapons believed to have been used in the murder. On 5 April 1990, three members of UFF were convicted of possessing this and another weapon and of membership of the UFF. The weapon had been stolen from the Ulster Defence Regiment's barracks in August 1987 and in 1988 a member of the UDR was convicted of this theft.
16. In or about September 1990, the police found firearms in the roof space of William Stobie's flat. Stobie was arrested. He was, according to the applicant, questioned about the Finucane murder from 13 to 20 September 1990. A journalist had allegedly interviewed Stobie and had told police about the interview but declined to make a statement. The applicant alleged that Stobie denied to the police any direct involvement in the shooting but admitted that he was the quartermaster for the UDA, supplying the weapons and recovering them after use. He also is reported as having told the police that he had been acting as an informer for Special Branch for the past three years. A decision was taken on 16 January 1991 not to prosecute Stobie in relation to the Finucane case, apparently on the basis that there was insufficient evidence. On 23 January 1991, the decision was taken not to proceed with two arms charges against Stobie. The prosecution offered no evidence and Stobie was acquitted.

2. Inquest proceedings

17. The inquest into Patrick Finucane's death commenced on 6 September 1990 and ended the same day. Evidence was heard from RUC officers involved in investigating the death, as well as from the applicant, two neighbours and a taxi driver whose car had been hijacked and used by those responsible for the shooting. The applicant was represented at the inquest by counsel who was able to question witnesses on her behalf. After giving evidence, the applicant wished to make a statement concerning the threats made against her husband by the RUC but was refused permission to do so by the Coroner on grounds that it was not relevant to the proceedings.
18. Forensic evidence showed that the victim had been hit at least eleven times by a 9 mm Browning automatic pistol and twice by a .38 Special Revolver. Detective Superintendent ("D/S")

Simpson of RUC, who was in charge of the murder investigation, gave evidence that the Browning pistol was one of thirteen weapons stolen from Palace army barracks in August 1987 by a member of the Ulster Defence Regiment (UDR - a locally recruited regiment of the British army) who was subsequently jailed for theft. These weapons found their way into the hands of three members of the UFF who were convicted of possession of the weapons and of membership of the UFF. However, the police were satisfied that those individuals had not been in possession of the weapons at the time of Patrick Finucane's murder.

19. According to the evidence given by D/S Simpson at the inquest, the police had interviewed fourteen people in connection with the murder, but had found that, although their suspicions were not assuaged, and they remained reasonably certain that the main perpetrators of the murder were among the suspects, there was insufficient evidence to sustain a charge of murder. None of the fourteen persons had any connection with the security forces. D/S Simpson further stated that none of the suspects had any connection with the security services. He rejected the claim made by the UFF that Patrick Finucane was a member of the Provisional IRA.

20. The inquest heard evidence that the assassins had used a red Ford Sierra car, Registration no. VIA 2985, that had been hijacked by three men from a taxi driver, WR, shortly before the murder. D/S Simpson stated in evidence that he did not consider the hijackers to have carried out the murder and that he considered the precision of the killing to indicate that the killers had murdered before. He had heard that a death threat had been made to a prisoner client of the deceased. He had also seen parts of a report by a group of international lawyers. This had been investigated by the Stevens inquiry with whom he liaised closely. Though he did not know who was interviewed, as it was separate from the murder investigation, he said that no evidence was found substantiating the allegation. On further questioning, he stated that he had only read the report by the international lawyers that lunchtime and was unaware of the existence of material linking the security forces to Mr Finucane's death.

3. The Stevens inquiries

21. On 14 September 1989, the Chief Constable of the RUC appointed John Stevens, then Deputy Chief Constable of the Cambridgeshire Constabulary, to investigate allegations of collusion between members of the security forces and loyalist paramilitaries ("Stevens 1").

22. While the applicant stated that it was claimed by the RUC at Patrick Finucane's inquest that John Stevens had also investigated Patrick Finucane's death, the Government stated that the inquiry was prompted by events other than the shooting of Patrick Finucane.

23. On 5 April 1990, John Stevens presented his report to the Chief Constable of the RUC. While the full report was not made public, the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland made a statement to the House of Commons on 17 May 1990. He stated, inter alia, that as a result of the inquiry 94 persons had been arrested, of whom 59 had been reported or charged with criminal offences. He stated that while the passing of information to paramilitaries by the security forces had taken place, it was restricted to a small number of individuals and was neither widespread nor institutionalised. Any evidence or allegation of criminal conduct had been rigorously followed up. No charges had been laid against members of the RUC, but Mr Stevens had concluded that there had been misbehaviour by a few members of the UDR. Mr Stevens had made detailed recommendations aimed at improving the arrangements for the dissemination and control of sensitive information.

24. As a result of the Stevens inquiry, Brian Nelson, who had worked as an undercover agent providing information to British military intelligence and who had become the chief intelligence officer of the Ulster Defence Association ("UDA"), an illegal loyalist paramilitary group which directed the activities of the UFF, was arrested. At his trial, the British authorities claimed that he had got out of hand and had become personally involved in loyalist murder plots. Originally he faced thirty-five charges, but thirteen were dropped and he was eventually convicted of five charges of conspiracy to murder, for which he was sentenced to ten years' imprisonment. During the Stevens inquiry, members of the team had interviewed him. According to the Government, he had denied any complicity in the murder.

25. In prison, Brian Nelson allegedly admitted that, in his capacity as a UDA intelligence officer, he had himself targeted Patrick Finucane and, in his capacity as a double agent, had told his British Army handlers about the approach at the time. It was also alleged that Nelson had passed a photograph of Patrick Finucane to the UDA before he was killed. Loyalist sources further alleged that Nelson had himself pointed out Finucane's house to the killers. These allegations were transmitted in a BBC Panorama programme on 8 June 1992 and the transcript of the programme was sent to the Director of Public Prosecutions ("DPP").
26. Following the Panorama programme, the DPP asked the Chief Constable of the RUC to conduct further inquiries arising from the issues raised in the programme. In April 1993, John Stevens, then Chief Constable of the Northumbria Police, was appointed to conduct a second inquiry ("Stevens 2"). According to the Government, he made inquiries into the alleged involvement of Brian Nelson and members of the Army in the death of Patrick Finucane (see however John Steven's press statement paragraph 33 below). The applicant states that no member of the inquiry team contacted her or her legal representative, or any former clients of Patrick Finucane, about the death threats made prior to the murder.
27. On 21 January 1995, John Stevens submitted his final report to the DPP, having submitted earlier reports on 25 April 1994 and 18 October 1994. On 17 February 1995 the DPP issued a direction of "no prosecution" to the Chief Constable of the RUC.
28. In answer to a parliamentary question published on 15 May 1995, Sir John Wheeler MP said that the DPP had concluded that there was insufficient evidence to warrant the prosecution of any person, despite Nelson's alleged confession. He refused to place copies of Mr Stevens' three reports in the House of Commons library, claiming that police reports were confidential.

4. Civil proceedings

29. On 11 February 1992, the applicant issued a writ of summons against the Ministry of Defence and Brian Nelson, claiming damages on behalf of the estate of the deceased, herself and other dependants of the deceased. It was alleged that the deceased's murder was committed by or at the instigation of or with the connivance, knowledge, encouragement and assistance of the first defendant and by the second defendant, who was at all material times a servant or agent of the first defendant. It was also alleged that the first defendant was negligent in the gathering, recording, retention, keeping safe and dissemination of material concerning the deceased, and in the warning, protection and safeguarding of the deceased.
30. The applicant's statement of claim was served on 8 December 1993 and the defence of the Ministry of Defence on 29 December 1993. In its amended defence of 11 October 1995, it was admitted that Brian Nelson acted as agent for and on behalf of the Ministry of Defence but claimed that if he had had any information about the proposed attack on Patrick Finucane it had not been communicated to the Ministry as he was required to do.
31. On 22 January 1998, the applicant served further and better particulars of her case and a request for further and better particulars of the Ministry of Defence's case. She served a list of documents on 8 April 1998. On 20 May 1999, a supplemental list of documents, verified by an affidavit sworn by the Permanent Under Secretary of the Ministry of Defence, was served on the applicant. The applicant requested copies of those documents which were provided on 20 July 1999. The applicant then requested inspection of the originals but was informed on 21 October 1999 that the Ministry of Defence was not in possession of the originals.

5. Recent developments

(a) The Stevens 3 Inquiry

32. On 12 February 1999, the Government stated that at a meeting between the applicant and Dr. Mowlem, the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, a paper was handed over to Dr Mowlem which, it was claimed, contained new material relating to the murder of Patrick Finucane. This paper was passed to John Stevens, now Deputy Commissioner of the Metropolitan Police who had been appointed by the Chief Constable of the RUC to conduct an independent investigation into the murder of the applicant's husband ("Stevens 3").

33. On 28 April 1999, at a press conference, John Stevens stated:

> "... in September 1989 ... I was appointed ... to conduct the so-called 'Stevens Inquiry' into breaches of security by the Security Forces in Northern Ireland.
> This commenced after the theft of montages from Dunmurry Police Station.
>
> This Inquiry resulted in 43 convictions and over 800 years of imprisonment for those convicted.
>
> My subsequent report contained over 100 recommendations for the handling of security documents and information.
>
> All of those recommendations were accepted and have been implemented.
>
> This 'Stevens 1' Inquiry was followed by a 'Stevens 2' Inquiry in April 1993...
>
> At the request of the DPP I was asked to investigate further matters which solely related to the previous Inquiry and prosecutions. [The then RUC Chief Constable] referred to our return as 'tying up some loose ends'.
>
> At no time, either in Stevens 2 or in the original Stevens 1 inquiry did I investigate the murder of Patrick Finucane... However, those inquiries through the so-called double agent, Brian Nelson, were linked into the murder of Patrick Finucane.
>
> [The] Chief Constable of the [RUC] has now asked me to conduct an independent investigation into the murder of Patrick Finucane. I am also investigating the associated matters raised by the British Irish Rights Watch document 'Deadly Intelligence' and the UN Commissioner's Report. ..."

(b) Criminal prosecution

34. On or about 23 June 1999, charges were brought against:
- William Alfred Stobie for the murder of Patrick Finucane;
- Mark Barr, Paul Alexander Givens and William Hutchinson for offences of possession of documents containing information useful to terrorists.

35. It was reported by the Committee for the Administration of Justice that on being charged William Stobie made the following statement:

> "Not guilty of the charge that you have put to me tonight. At the time I was police informer for Special Branch. On the night of the death of Patrick Finucane I informed Special Branch on two occasions by telephone of a person who was to be shot. I did not know at the time of the person who was to be shot."

36. William Stobie's solicitor told the court that his client was a paid police informer from 1987 to 1990 and that he gave the police information on two occasions before the Finucane murder which was not acted upon. He also stated that, at his client's trial on 23 January 1991 on firearms charges, the prosecution offered no evidence and his client was acquitted. The bulk of the evidence against his client had, he alleged, been known to the authorities for almost 10 years.

37. On 26 November 2001, it was reported in the press that the trial of William Stobie had collapsed, when the Lord Chief Justice returned a verdict of not guilty in the absence of evidence. The prosecution had informed the court that the key witness, a journalist, was not capable of giving evidence due to serious mental illness.

38. On 12 December 2001, William Stobie was shot dead by gunmen, shortly after having received threats from loyalist paramilitaries.

FS 1 · 55

39. Further arrests were reported as being made by officers in the Stevens inquiry in March 2002, with persons being questioned in relation to the Finucane murder.

(c) Proposed international investigation

40. On 24 October 2001, the Government announced in Parliament that, amongst the measures proposed to the Irish Government in the context of the Good Friday Agreement, was the proposal for the United Kingdom and Irish Government to appoint a judge of international standing from outside both jurisdictions to undertake an investigation into allegations of security force collusion in loyalist paramilitary killings, including that of Patrick Finucane. In light of the investigation, the judge would decide whether to recommend a Public Inquiry into any of the killings.

(d) Stevens 3 Inquiry Report

41. On 17 April 2003, Sir John Stephens submitted his report to the D.P.P. A nineteen page overview with recommendations was made public. The summary included the following:

> "4.6. I have uncovered enough evidence to lead me to believe that the murders of Patrick Finucane and Brian Adam Lambert could have been prevented. I also believe that the RUC investigation of Patrick Finucane's murder should have resulted in the early arrest and detection of his killers.
> 4.7. I concluded that there was collusion in both murders and the circumstances surrounding them. Collusion is evidenced in many ways. This ranges from the wilful failure to keep records, the absence of accountability, the withholding of intelligence and evidence, through to the extreme of agents being involved in murder..."

He stated that his inquiries with regard to satisfying the test for prosecution in relation to possible offences arising out of these matters were continuing.

II. RELEVANT DOMESTIC LAW AND PRACTICE

A. Inquests

1. Statutory provisions and rules

42. The conduct of inquests in Northern Ireland is governed by the Coroners Act (Northern Ireland) 1959 and the Coroners (Practice and Procedure) Rules (Northern Ireland) 1963. These provide the framework for a procedure within which deaths by violence or in suspicious circumstances are notified to the Coroner, who then has the power to hold an inquest, with or without a jury, for the purpose of ascertaining, with the assistance as appropriate of the evidence of witnesses and reports, inter alia, of post mortem and forensic examinations, who the deceased was and how, when and where he died.

43. Pursuant to the Coroners Act, every medical practitioner, registrar of deaths or funeral undertaker who has reason to believe that a person died directly or indirectly by violence is under an obligation to inform the Coroner (section 7). Every medical practitioner who performs a post mortem examination has to notify the Coroner of the result in writing (section 29). Whenever a dead body is found, or an unexplained death or death in suspicious circumstances occurs, the police of that district are required to give notice to the Coroner (section 8).

44. Rules 12 and 13 of the Coroners Rules give power to the Coroner to adjourn an inquest where a person may be or has been charged with murder or other specified criminal offences in relation to the deceased.

45. Where the Coroner decides to hold an inquest with a jury, persons are called from the Jury

FS 1 · 56

List, compiled by random computer selection from the electoral register for the district on the same basis as in criminal trials.

46. The matters in issue at an inquest are governed by Rules 15 and 16 of the Coroners Rules:

> "15. The proceedings and evidence at an inquest shall be directed solely to ascertaining the following matters, namely: -
> (a) who the deceased was;
>
> (b) how, when and where the deceased came by his death;
>
> (c) the particulars for the time being required by the Births and Deaths Registration (Northern Ireland) Order 1976 to be registered concerning his death.
> 16. Neither the coroner nor the jury shall express any opinion on questions of criminal or civil liability or on any matters other than those referred to in the last foregoing Rule."

47. The forms of verdict used in Northern Ireland accord with this recommendation, recording the name and other particulars of the deceased, a statement of the cause of death (e.g. bullet wounds) and findings as to when and where the deceased met his death. In England and Wales, the form of verdict appended to the English Coroners Rules contains a section marked "conclusions of the jury/coroner as to the death" in which conclusions such as "lawfully killed" or "killed unlawfully" are inserted. These findings involve expressing an opinion on criminal liability in that they involve a finding as to whether the death resulted from a criminal act, but no finding is made that any identified person was criminally liable. The jury in England and Wales may also append recommendations to their verdict.

48. However, in Northern Ireland, the Coroner is under a duty (section 6(2) of the Prosecution of Offences Order (Northern Ireland) 1972) to furnish a written report to the DPP where the circumstances of any death appear to disclose that a criminal offence may have been committed.

49. Until recently, legal aid was not available for inquests as they did not involve the determination of civil liabilities or criminal charges. Legislation which would have provided for legal aid at the hearing of inquests (the Legal Aid, Advice and Assistance (Northern Ireland) Order 1981, Schedule 1 paragraph 5) has not been brought into force. However, on 25 July 2000, the Lord Chancellor announced the establishment of an Extra-Statutory Ex Gratia Scheme to make public funding available for representation for proceedings before Coroners in exceptional inquests in Northern Ireland. In March 2001, he published for consultation the criteria to be used in deciding whether applications for representation at inquests should receive public funding. This included inter alia consideration of financial eligibility, whether an effective investigation by the State was needed and whether the inquest was the only way to conduct it, whether the applicant required representation to be able to participate effectively in the inquest and whether the applicant had a sufficiently close relationship to the deceased.

50. The Coroner enjoys the power to summon witnesses who he thinks it necessary to attend the inquest (section 17 of the Coroners Act) and he may allow any interested person to examine a witness (Rule 7). In both England and Wales and Northern Ireland, a witness is entitled to rely on the privilege against self-incrimination. In Northern Ireland, this privilege is reinforced by Rule 9 (2) which provides that a person suspected of causing the death may not be compelled to give evidence at the inquest.

51. In relation to both documentary evidence and the oral evidence of witnesses, inquests, like criminal trials, are subject to the law of public interest immunity, which recognises and gives effect to the public interest, such as national security, in the non-disclosure of certain information or certain documents or classes of document. A claim of public interest immunity must be supported by a certificate.

2. The scope of inquests

52. Rules 15 and 16 (see above) follow from the recommendation of the Brodrick Committee on Death Certification and Coroners:

> "... the function of an inquest should be simply to seek out and record as many of the facts concerning the death as the public interest requires, without deducing from those facts any determination of blame... In many cases, perhaps the majority, the facts themselves will demonstrate quite clearly whether anyone bears any responsibility for the death; there is a difference between a form of proceeding which affords to others the opportunity to judge an issue and one which appears to judge the issue itself."

53. Domestic courts have made, inter alia, the following comments:

> "... It is noteworthy that the task is not to ascertain how the deceased died, which might raise general and far-reaching issues, but 'how ... the deceased came by his death', a far more limited question directed to the means by which the deceased came by his death.
>
> ... [previous judgments] make it clear that when the Brodrick Committee stated that one of the purposes of an inquest is 'To allay rumours or suspicions' this purpose should be confined to allaying rumours and suspicions of how the deceased came by his death and not to allaying rumours or suspicions about the broad circumstances in which the deceased came by his death." (Sir Thomas Bingham, MR, Court of Appeal, R. v. the Coroner for North Humberside and Scunthorpe ex parte Roy Jamieson, April 1994, unreported)
> "The cases establish that although the word 'how' is to be widely interpreted, it means 'by what means' rather than in what broad circumstances ... In short, the inquiry must focus on matters directly causative of death and must, indeed, be confined to those matters alone ..." (Simon Brown LJ, Court of Appeal, R. v. Coroner for Western District of East Sussex, ex parte Homberg and others, (1994) 158 JP 357)
> "... it should not be forgotten that an inquest is a fact finding exercise and not a method of apportioning guilt. The procedure and rules of evidence which are suitable for one are unsuitable for the other. In an inquest it should never be forgotten that there are no parties, no indictment, there is no prosecution, there is no defence, there is no trial, simply an attempt to establish the facts. It is an inquisitorial process, a process of investigation quite unlike a trial...
>
> It is well recognised that a purpose of an inquest is that rumour may be allayed. But that does not mean it is the duty of the Coroner to investigate at an inquest every rumour or allegation that may be brought to his attention. It is ... his duty to discharge his statutory role - the scope of his enquiry must not be allowed to drift into the uncharted seas of rumour and allegation. He will proceed safely and properly if he investigates the facts which it appears are relevant to the statutory issues before him." (Lord Lane, Court of Appeal, R. v. South London Coroner ex parte Thompson (1982) 126 SJ 625)

B. The Director of Public Prosecutions

54. The Director of Public Prosecutions (the DPP), appointed pursuant to the Prosecution of Offences (Northern Ireland) 1972 (the 1972 Order) is an independent officer with at least 10 years' experience of the practice of law in Northern Ireland who is appointed by the Attorney General and who holds office until retirement, subject only to dismissal for misconduct. His duties under Article 5 of the 1972 Order are inter alia:

> "(a) to consider, or cause to be considered, with a view to his initiating or continuing in Northern Ireland any criminal proceedings or the bringing of any appeal or other proceedings in or in connection with any criminal cause or matter in Northern Ireland, any facts or information brought to his notice, whether by the Chief Constable acting in pursuance of Article 6(3) of this Order or by the Attorney General or by any other authority or person;
> (b) to examine or cause to be examined all documents that are required under Article 6 of this Order to be transmitted or furnished to him and where it appears to him to be necessary or appropriate to do so to cause any matter arising thereon to be further investigated;

(c) where he thinks proper to initiate, undertake and carry on, on behalf of the Crown, proceedings for indictable offences and for such summary offences or classes of summary offences as he considers should be dealt with by him."

55. Article 6 of the 1972 Order requires inter alia Coroners and the Chief Constable of the RUC to provide information to the DPP as follows:

"(2) Where the circumstances of any death investigated or being investigated by a coroner appear to him to disclose that a criminal offence may have been committed he shall as soon as practicable furnish to the [DPP] a written report of those circumstances.

(3) It shall be the duty of the Chief Constable, from time to time, to furnish to the [DPP] facts and information with respect to -

(a) indictable offences [such as murder] alleged to have been committed against the law of Northern Ireland; ...

and at the request of the [DPP], to ascertain and furnish to the [DPP] information regarding any matter which may appear to the [DPP] to require investigation on the ground that it may involve an offence against the law of Northern Ireland or information which may appear to the [DPP] to be necessary for the discharge of his functions under this Order."

III. RELEVANT INTERNATIONAL LAW AND PRACTICE

56. Paragraph 9 of the United Nations Principles on the Effective Prevention and Investigation of Extra-Legal, Arbitrary and Summary Executions, adopted on 24 May 1989 by the Economic and Social Council Resolution 1989/65, (UN Principles on Extra-Legal Executions) provides, inter alia, that:

"There shall be a thorough, prompt and impartial investigation of all suspected cases of extra legal, arbitrary and summary executions, including cases where complaints by relatives or other reliable reports suggest unnatural death in the above circumstances ..."

57. Paragraphs 10 to 17 of the UN Principles on Extra-Legal Executions contain a series of detailed requirements that should be observed by investigative procedures into such deaths. Paragraph 10 states, inter alia:

"The investigative authority shall have the power to obtain all the information necessary to the inquiry. Those persons conducting the inquiry ... shall also have the authority to oblige officials allegedly involved in any such executions to appear and testify ..."

Paragraph 11 specifies:

"In cases in which the established investigative procedures are inadequate because of a lack of expertise or impartiality, because of the importance of the matter or because of the apparent existence of a pattern of abuse, and in cases where there are complaints from the family of the victim about these inadequacies or other substantial reasons, Governments shall pursue investigations through an independent commission of inquiry or similar procedure. Members of such a commission shall be chosen for their recognised impartiality, competence and independence as individuals. In particular, they shall be independent of any institution, agency or person that may be the subject of the inquiry. The commission shall have the authority to obtain all information necessary to the inquiry and shall conduct the inquiry as provided in these principles."

Paragraph 16 provides, inter alia:

> "Families of the deceased and their legal representatives shall be informed of, and have access to, any hearing as well as all information relevant to the investigation and shall be entitled to present other evidence..."

Paragraph 17 provides, inter alia:

> "A written report shall be made within a reasonable time on the methods and findings of such investigations. The report shall be made public immediately and shall include the scope of the inquiry, procedures, methods used to evaluate evidence as well as conclusions and recommendations based on findings of fact and on applicable law..."

58. The "Minnesota Protocol" (Model Protocol for a legal investigation of extra-legal, arbitrary and summary executions, contained in the UN Manual on the Effective Prevention and Investigation of Extra-legal, Arbitrary and Summary Executions) provides, inter alia, in section B on the "Purposes of an inquiry":

> "As set out in paragraph 9 of the Principles, the broad purpose of an inquiry is to discover the truth about the events leading to the suspicious death of a victim. To fulfil that purpose, those conducting the inquiry shall, at a minimum, seek:
> (a) to identify the victim;
>
> (b) to recover and preserve evidentiary material related to the death to aid in any potential prosecution of those responsible;
>
> (c) to identify possible witnesses and obtain statements from them concerning the death;
>
> (d) to determine the cause, manner, location and time of death, as well as any pattern or practice that may have brought about the death;
>
> (e) to distinguish between natural death, accidental death, suicide and homicide;
>
> (f) to identify and apprehend the person(s) involved in the death;
> (g) to bring the suspected perpetrator(s) before a competent court established by law."

59. In section D, it is stated that "In cases where government involvement is suspected, an objective and impartial investigation may not be possible unless a special commission of inquiry is established...".

THE LAW

I. ALLEGED VIOLATION OF ARTICLE 2 OF THE CONVENTION

60. The applicant complained that there was no effective investigation into the death of her husband, Patrick Finucane, which had occurred in circumstances giving rise to suspicions of collusion of the security forces with his killers. She invoked Article 2 of the Convention which provides as relevant in its first paragraph:

> " Everyone's right to life shall be protected by law. ..."

FS 1. 60

A. The parties' submissions

1. The applicant

61. The applicant submitted that the RUC investigation into her husband's death was inter alia hopelessly inadequate as it failed entirely to explore the possibility of collusion and as the investigating officers were hierarchically linked to those against whom allegations were made. The inquest was also strictly limited in its scope, involving no key witnesses or any persons suspected of involvement in the death and could not provide an effective part of the process of identifying or prosecuting the perpetrators of any unlawful act. As regarded the first two Stevens inquiries, neither was concerned with investigating the murder of Patrick Finucane and neither fulfilled the requirements of independence, promptness, public scrutiny or accessibility to the next of kin. The inquiry teams never, for example, made contact with the applicant's family, her husband's firm of solicitors or any of his clients who had reported death threats.

62. As regards the third inquiry, this was commenced ten years after the murder. So far the Stevens team refused to disclose to the applicant any material held by it. As regards her alleged lack of co-operation with various investigations, she had always taken the position that an independent judicial inquiry was the appropriate solution. Nor was the third inquiry sufficiently independent as it, like the others, had been established by the RUC Chief Constable at the relevant time and Mr Stevens reported, according to her understanding, to the Chief Constable. There was thus a hierarchical connection between the head of the investigation and the Chief Constable of the force against whom serious allegations had been made.

63. Further, the applicant argued that the examination by the DPP of the evidence throughout the history of the case had been a secret and undisclosed process, without any reasons given for decisions not to prosecute. He could not be regarded as independent due to the relationship between his office and the police. His decisions not to prosecute also cast grave doubt on his independence, in particular as the evidence against Mr Stobie was known to the authorities for at least 10 years. She referred to the decision not to prosecute Mr Stobie in 1991 for his role in the Finucane murder or his involvement in the UDA, the decision not to offer evidence against Mr Stobie at his trial on arms charges in January 1991 and the failure to prosecute Brian Nelson for conspiracy to murder, despite the evidence that he had passed a photograph of Patrick Finucane to known killers, or to prosecute Nelson's army handlers for collusion despite their knowledge that Patrick Finucane was targeted.

2. The Government

64. The Government accepted that, in light of the previous judgments (Hugh Jordan v. the United Kingdom, no. 24746/94, McKerr v. the United Kingdom, no. 28883/95, Kelly and Others v. the United Kingdom, no. 30054/96 and Shanaghan v. the United Kingdom, no. 37715/97, ECHR 2001-III) the RUC investigation, the inquest and the Stevens inquiries did not cumulatively satisfy the procedural requirement imposed by Article 2 of the Convention. They pointed out however that the reports following the first and second Stevens' inquiries were not made public as this would have prejudiced national security.

65. In any event, the Government stated that the third inquiry represented the only comprehensive investigation into the death of Patrick Finucane. This was ongoing, conducted by 18 to 20 police officers from outside Northern Ireland and it was to report to the DPP. So far, apart from William Stobie, 14 persons had been arrested and interviewed in connection with murder. While the RUC were resisting the applicant's current application for disclosure of material generated in the third inquiry because of potential prejudice to national security, the material's relevance to matters before, or likely to come before, the courts or to ongoing investigations, it had been made clear that disclosure would be reconsidered if it were to become apparent that there would be no harm to those interests.

66. Furthermore, the Government submitted that significant efforts had been made by the Stevens team to keep the applicant as fully informed as possible. However the applicant refused to meet with the police or the Stevens' team and repeatedly indicated her unwillingness to co-operate with the inquiry. In those circumstances, the Government argued that although the first two Stevens inquiries did not satisfy the procedural obligation in Article 2 as they were not centrally concerned with the murder of the applicant's husband, the third inquiry was so concerned and it was being conducted with thoroughness. The Government accepted that as it was occurring some years after the events it did not satisfy the requirements of promptness and reasonable expedition.

B. The Court's assessment

1. General principles

67. The obligation to protect the right to life under Article 2 of the Convention, read in conjunction with the State's general duty under Article 1 of the Convention to "secure to everyone within [its] jurisdiction the rights and freedoms defined in [the] Convention", requires by implication that there should be some form of effective official investigation when individuals have been killed as a result of the use of force (see, mutatis mutandis, the McCann and Others v. the United Kingdom, judgment of 27 September 1995, Series A no. 324, p. 49, § 161, and Kaya v. Turkey, judgment of 19 February 1998, Reports of Judgments and Decisions 1998-I, p. 324, § 86). The essential purpose of such investigation is to secure the effective implementation of the domestic laws which protect the right to life and, in those cases involving State agents or bodies, to ensure their accountability for deaths occurring under their responsibility. What form of investigation will achieve those purposes may vary in different circumstances. However, whatever mode is employed, the authorities must act of their own motion, once the matter has come to their attention. They cannot leave it to the initiative of the next of kin either to lodge a formal complaint or to take responsibility for the conduct of any investigative procedures (see, for example, mutatis mutandis, Ilhan v. Turkey [GC] no. 22277/93, ECHR 2000-VII, § 63).
68. For an investigation into alleged unlawful killing by State agents to be effective, it may generally be regarded as necessary for the persons responsible for and carrying out the investigation to be independent from those implicated in the events (see, for example, Güleç v. Turkey, judgment of 27 July 1998, Reports 1998-IV, §§ 81-82; Ogur v. Turkey, [GC] no. 21954/93, ECHR 1999-III, §§ 91-92). This means not only a lack of hierarchical or institutional connection but also a practical independence (see, for example, Ergi v. Turkey, judgment of 28 July 1998, Reports 1998-IV, §§ 83-84, and the recent Northern Irish cases, for example, McKerr v. the United Kingdom, no. 28883/95, § 128, Hugh Jordan v. the United Kingdom, no. 24746/94, § 120, and Kelly and Others v. the United Kingdom, no. 30054/96, § 114, ECHR 2001-III).
69. The investigation must also be effective in the sense that it is capable of leading to a determination of whether the force used in such cases was or was not justified in the circumstances (for example, Kaya v. Turkey, cited above, p. 324, § 87) and to the identification and punishment of those responsible (Ogur v. Turkey, cited above, § 88). This is not an obligation of result, but of means. The authorities must have taken the reasonable steps available to them to secure the evidence concerning the incident, including inter alia eye witness testimony, forensic evidence and, where appropriate, an autopsy which provides a complete and accurate record of injury and an objective analysis of clinical findings, including the cause of death (see, for example, Salman v. Turkey [GC], no. 21986/93, ECHR 2000-VII, § 106; Tanrikulu v. Turkey [GC], no. 23763/94, ECHR 1999-IV, § 109; Gül v. Turkey, 22676/93, § 89, 14 December 2000, unreported). Any deficiency in the investigation which undermines its ability to establish the cause of death or the person or persons responsible will risk falling foul of this standard (see the recent Northern Irish cases concerning the inability of inquests to compel the security force witnesses directly involved in the use of lethal force, for example, McKerr v. the United Kingdom, cited above, § 144, and Hugh Jordan v. the United Kingdom, cited above, § 127).

70. A requirement of promptness and reasonable expedition is implicit in this context (see Yasa v. Turkey, judgment of 2 September 1998, Reports 1998-IV, pp. 2439-2440, §§ 102-104; Cakici v. Turkey [GC], no. 23657/94, ECHR 1999-IV, §§ 80, 87 and 106; Tanrikulu v. Turkey, cited above, § 109; Mahmut Kaya v. Turkey, no. 22535/93, ECHR 2000-III, §§ 106-107). While there may be obstacles or difficulties which prevent progress in an investigation in a particular situation, a prompt response by the authorities in investigating a use of lethal force may generally be regarded as essential in maintaining public confidence in their adherence to the rule of law and in preventing any appearance of collusion in or tolerance of unlawful acts (see, for example, Hugh Jordan v. the United Kingdom, cited above, §§ 108, 136-140).

71. For the same reasons, there must be a sufficient element of public scrutiny of the investigation or its results to secure accountability in practice as well as in theory. The degree of public scrutiny required may well vary from case to case. In all cases, however, the next-of-kin of the victim must be involved in the procedure to the extent necessary to safeguard his or her legitimate interests (see Güleç v. Turkey, cited above, p. 1733, § 82; Ogur v. Turkey, cited above, § 92; Gül v. Turkey, cited above, § 93; and recent Northern Irish cases, for example, McKerr v. the United Kingdom, cited above, § 148).

2. Application in the present case

72. The Court recalls that, following the death of Patrick Finucane on 12 February 1989, an investigation was opened by the RUC. No prosecutions resulted at that stage. An inquest opened on 6 September 1990 and closed the same day. Two police inquiries, Stevens 1 and 2, took place in 1989-1990 and 1993-1995. A third inquiry, Stevens 3, commenced in 1999 and is still ongoing. On 23 June 1999, a criminal prosecution was brought against William Stobie for the murder of Patrick Finucane. A verdict of not guilty was entered on or about 26 November 2001, after the prosecution offered no evidence.

73. The applicant has made numerous complaints about these procedures, alleging that they do not satisfy the procedural obligation imposed by Article 2 of the Convention. The Court notes that the Government have accepted, in large part, that the procedures failed to provide the requisite safeguards, though they do not agree with all the criticisms made by the applicant.

(i) The police investigation

74. Firstly, concerning the police investigation, the Court notes that the investigation started immediately after the death and involved necessary steps to secure evidence at the scene. The car and gun used in the incident were located though this did not lead to any charges being brought in respect of the killing. A number of suspects from the loyalist paramilitaries, popularly believed to have carried out the killing, were interviewed. During the inquest, the officer in charge of the investigation stated that though he was reasonably certain that the main perpetrators of the murder were amongst them, there was insufficient evidence to support a prosecution.

75. It is not apparent to what extent the initial police investigation included inquiries into possible collusion by the security forces in the targeting of Patrick Finucane by a loyalist paramilitary group. A weapon believed to have been used in the murder had been stolen from the UDR and a member of the UDR was convicted of the theft and UFF members were convicted of possession of the gun. It was therefore apparent that the weapon had come into the hands of the loyalists via the security forces. At the inquest however, the police officer in charge of the investigation stated that none of the 14 persons interviewed in relation to the murder had any connection with the security forces. Allegations of collusion involving the police were also made from a very early stage, in particular with regard to threats made by the RUC to Patrick Finucane's clients.

76. In so far therefore as the investigation was conducted by RUC officers, they were part of the police force which was suspected by the applicant and other members of the community of issuing threats against Patrick Finucane. They were all under the responsibility of the RUC Chief Constable, who played a role in the process of instituting any disciplinary or criminal proceedings (see paragraph 55 above). In the circumstances, there was a lack of independence attaching to this aspect of the investigative procedures, which also raises serious doubts as to the thoroughness or effectiveness with which the possibility of collusion was pursued.

(ii) The inquest

77. In Northern Ireland, as in England and Wales, investigations into deaths may also be conducted by inquests. Inquests are public hearings conducted by coroners, independent judicial officers, normally sitting with a jury, to determine the facts surrounding a suspicious death. Judicial review lies from procedural decisions by coroners and in respect of any mistaken directions given to the jury. There are thus strong safeguards as to the lawfulness and propriety of the proceedings. In the case of McCann and Others v. the United Kingdom (cited above, p. 49, § 162), the Court found that the inquest held into the deaths of the three IRA suspects shot by the SAS on Gibraltar satisfied the procedural obligation contained in Article 2, as it provided a detailed review of the events surrounding the killings and provided the relatives of the deceased with the opportunity to examine and cross-examine witnesses involved in the operation. However it must be noted that the inquest in that case was to some extent exceptional when compared with the proceedings in a number of cases in Northern Ireland (see the cases of Hugh Jordan v. the United Kingdom, McKerr v. the United Kingdom, and Kelly and Others v. the United Kingdom, cited above). The promptness and thoroughness of the inquest in the McCann case left the Court in no doubt that the important facts relating to the events had been examined with the active participation of the applicants' highly competent legal representative.

78. In this case however, the inquest was concerned only with the immediate circumstances surrounding the shooting of Patrick Finucane. There was no inquiry into the allegations of collusion by the RUC or other sections of the security forces. The applicant was refused permission to make a statement to the inquest about the threats made by the police against her husband as the Coroner regarded these matters as irrelevant. As later events were to show however, there were indications that informers working for Special Branch or the security forces knew about, or assisted in, the attack on Patrick Finucane (see paragraphs 16, 25 and 36, concerning William Stobie and Brian Nelson), which supported suspicions that the authorities knew or connived in murder. The inquest accordingly failed to address serious and legitimate concerns of the family and the public and cannot be regarded as providing an effective investigation into the incident or a means of identifying or leading to the prosecution of those responsible. In that respect, it fell short of the requirements of Article 2.

(iii) The Stevens inquiries

79. The Court recalls that the authorities responded to concerns arising out of allegations of collusion between the loyalist organisations and the security forces by instituting special police inquiries, headed by a senior police officer from outside Northern Ireland. It is not apparent however that the first two inquiries, however useful they may have been in uncovering information, were in fact concerned with investigating the death of Patrick Finucane with a view to bringing prosecutions as appropriate. In any event, the reports were not made public and the applicant has never been informed of their findings. The necessary elements of public scrutiny and accessibility of the family are therefore missing.

80. As regards the most recent inquiry, Stevens 3, which is squarely concerned with the Finucane murder, the Government have admitted that, taking place some ten years after the event, it cannot comply with the requirement that effective investigations be commenced promptly and conducted with due expedition. It is also not apparent to what extent, if any, the final report will be made public, though a summary overview has recently been published. The Court does not find it necessary in light of these defects to consider further allegations of lack of accessibility of the applicant to the procedure or lack of independence of the inquiry from the Police Service in Northern Ireland (which has replaced the RUC).

(iv) The DPP

81. The applicant also alleged that the DPP had shown a lack of independence in this case. The Court has in previous cases noted that the DPP, who is the legal officer charged with the responsibility to decide whether to bring prosecutions in respect of any possible criminal offences, is not required to give reasons for any decision not to prosecute and in this case he did not do so. No challenge by way of judicial review exists to require him to give reasons in Northern Ireland, though it may be noted that in England and Wales, where the inquest jury may still reach verdicts of unlawful death, the courts have required the DPP to reconsider a decision not to prosecute in the light of such a verdict, and will review whether those reasons are sufficient. This possibility does not exist in Northern Ireland where the inquest jury is no longer permitted to issue verdicts concerning the lawfulness or otherwise of a death.

82. The Court does not consider it possible at this stage for it to determine what in fact occurred in 1990-1991 and in 1995 when decisions were taken concerning the prosecution of persons possibly implicated in the Finucane murder (see paragraphs 16 and 27 above). However, where the police investigation procedure is itself open to doubts of a lack of independence and is not amenable to public scrutiny, it is of increased importance that the officer who decides whether or not to prosecute also gives an appearance of independence in his decision-making. As the Court observed in Hugh Jordan v. the United Kingdom (judgment cited above, § 123) the absence of reasons for decisions not to prosecute in controversial cases may in itself not be conducive to public confidence and may deny family of the victim access to information about a matter of crucial importance to them and prevent any legal challenge of the decision.

83. Notwithstanding the suspicions of collusion however, no reasons were forthcoming at the time for the various decisions not to prosecute and no information was made available either to the applicant or the public which might provide re-assurance that the rule of law had been respected. This cannot be regarded as compatible with the requirements of Article 2, unless that information was forthcoming in some other way. This was not the case.

(v) Conclusion

84. The Court finds that the proceedings for investigating the death of Patrick Finucane failed to provide a prompt and effective investigation into the allegations of collusion by security personnel. There has consequently been a failure to comply with the procedural obligation imposed by Article 2 of the Convention and there has been, in this respect, a violation of that provision.

II. APPLICATION OF ARTICLE 41 OF THE CONVENTION

85. Article 41 of the Convention provides:

> "If the Court finds that there has been a violation of the Convention or the Protocols thereto, and if the internal law of the High Contracting Party concerned allows only partial reparation to be made, the Court shall, if necessary, afford just satisfaction to the injured party."

A. Damage

86. The applicant stated that the quantum of any award of non-pecuniary damage was for the Court to assess on an equitable basis. She raised concerns however that any award for damages for just satisfaction, as were made in the other Northern Ireland cases (Hugh Jordan, McKerr, Kelly and others and Shanaghan, cited above) would be regarded as bringing to an end the investigative obligation imposed by Article 2 of the Convention. She refers in that regard to the approach adopted by the domestic courts in the application brought by Jonathan McKerr after the Court's judgment in his case for a declaration that State was in continuing breach of the procedural obligation under Article 2 and for an order of mandamus to compel provision of an effective investigation. On 26 July 2002, the High Court in Northern Ireland rejected the application, finding that this Court would not have exercised its discretion to award just satisfaction had it envisaged the possibility of restitutio in integrum through the holding of an effective investigation and therefore considered that any continuing obligation had come to an end once the Court issued its judgment. This decision has since been overturned by the Northern Ireland Court of Appeal on 10 January 2003, and an application for leave to appeal by the Crown is apparently pending to the House of Lords. The applicant requested the Court to state that awards of just satisfaction do not bring to an end the rights conferred by Article 2. Since she would not wish any award of just satisfaction to jeopardise action taken at a domestic level to enforcing an investigation at domestic level, she requested the Court not to make an award of just satisfaction if it were to agree with the High Court approach mentioned above.

87. The Government stated that the applicant had received a very significant sum, some half a million pounds, under the Criminal Injuries Compensation Scheme and had shown a certain ambivalence as to whether she wished to claim non-pecuniary damage. As her main concern was to obtain a judgment of the Court against the Government, any such judgment would appear to constitute of itself sufficient just satisfaction.

88. The Court would recall that it has awarded non-pecuniary damages in other similar cases in which it has found a breach of the procedural obligation under Article 2 of the Convention (see the Hugh Jordan, McKerr, Kelly and Others and Shanaghan cases, cited above). The compensation referred to by the Government does not relate to the shortcomings in the official investigation and would not prevent an award of non-pecuniary damages in that respect.

89. As regards the applicant's views concerning provision of an effective investigation, the Court has not previously given any indication that a Government should, as a response to such a finding of a breach of Article 2, hold a fresh investigation into the death concerned and has on occasion expressly declined to do so (Ülkü Ekinci v. Turkey, no. 27601/95, judgment of 16 July 2002, § 179). Nor does it consider it appropriate to do so in the present case. It cannot be assumed in such cases that a future investigation can usefully be carried out or provide any redress, either to the victim's family or by way of providing transparency and accountability to the wider public. The lapse of time, the effect on evidence and the availability of witnesses, may inevitably render such an investigation an unsatisfactory or inconclusive exercise, which fails to establish important facts or put to rest doubts and suspicions. Even in disappearance cases, where it might be argued that more is at stake since the relatives suffer from the ongoing uncertainty about the exact fate of the victim or the location of the body, the Court has refused to issue any declaration that a new investigation should be launched (Orhan v. Turkey, no. 25656/94, judgment of 18 June 2002, § 451). It rather falls to the Committee of Ministers acting under Article 46 of the Convention to address the issues as to what may practicably be required by way of compliance in each case (cf. mutatis mutandis, Akdivar and Others v. Turkey, judgment of 1 April 1998 (Article 50), Reports 1998-II, p. 723, § 47).

90. In sum, the Court is unable to make the declaration or clarifications requested by the applicant with a view to the consequences of this judgment. As she has stated that in this event she does not wish any damages to be paid, it will proceed on the basis that her claim is withdrawn.

B. Costs and expenses

91. The applicant claimed 94,020.22 pounds sterling (GBP), inclusive of value-added tax VAT) for costs and expenses for legal work done since the introduction of the case in 1995. This included fees of GBP 31,385.75 for over 207 hours work by a senior solicitor, GBP 6,580 for over 117 hours work by a paralegal, GBP 29,375 for fees of senior counsel and GBP 19,583.32 for junior counsel.
92. The Government submitted that this was grossly excessive. While the case was complex, many of the legal issues were similar to those raised in the other Northern Ireland cases. The claims by lawyers included well over 300 hours by solicitors plus unspecified hours by two counsel. They considered there must have been a significant degree of duplication of work and that the applicant has not demonstrated that these legal costs were reasonably and necessarily incurred.
93. The Court recalls that this case, which has been pending for some considerable time, has involved several rounds of written submissions and may be regarded as factually and legally complex. Nonetheless, no oral hearing has been held. It finds that the fees claimed to be on the high side when compared with other cases from the United Kingdom and is not persuaded that they are reasonable as to quantum. Having regard to equitable considerations, it awards the sum of 43,000 euros (EUR), plus any value added tax which may be payable.

C. Default interest

94. The Court considers it appropriate that the default interest should be based on the marginal lending rate of the European Central Bank, to which should be added three percentage points.

FOR THESE REASONS, THE COURT UNANIMOUSLY

1. Holds that there has been a violation of Article 2 of the Convention;

2. Holds

(a) that the respondent State is to pay the applicant, within three months from the date on which the judgment becomes final according to Article 44 § 2 of the Convention, EUR 43,000 (forty three thousand euros) in respect of costs and expenses, to be converted into pounds sterling at the rate applicable at the date of settlement, plus any tax that may be chargeable;
(b) that from the expiry of the above-mentioned three months until settlement simple interest shall be payable on the above amount at a rate equal to the marginal lending rate of the European Central Bank during the default period plus three percentage points;

3. Dismisses the remainder of the applicant's claim for just satisfaction.

Done in English, and notified in writing on 1 July 2003, pursuant to Rule 77 §§ 2 and 3 of the Rules of Court.

FS 1. 69

Principles on the Effective Prevention and Investigation of Extra-legal, Arbitrary and Summary Executions

Recommended by Economic and Social Council resolution 1989/65 of 24 May 1989*

Prevention

1. Governments shall prohibit by law all extra-legal, arbitrary and summary executions and shall ensure that any such executions are recognized as offences under their criminal laws, and are punishable by appropriate penalties which take into account the seriousness of such offences. Exceptional circumstances including a state of war or threat of war, internal political instability or any other public emergency may not be invoked as a justification of such executions.

Such executions shall not be carried out under any circumstances including, but not limited to, situations of internal armed conflict, excessive or illegal use of force by a public official or other person acting in an official capacity or by a person acting at the instigation, or with the consent or acquiescence of such person, and situations in which deaths occur in custody. This prohibition shall prevail over decrees issued by governmental authority.

2. In order to prevent extra-legal, arbitrary and summary executions, Governments shall ensure strict control, including a clear chain of command over all officials responsible for apprehension, arrest, detention, custody and imprisonment, as well as those officials authorized by law to use force and firearms.

3. Governments shall prohibit orders from superior officers or public authorities authorizing or inciting other persons to carry out any such extralegal, arbitrary or summary executions. All persons shall have the right and the duty to defy such orders. Training of law enforcement officials shall emphasize the above provisions.

4. Effective protection through judicial or other means shall be guaranteed to individuals and groups who are in danger of extra-legal, arbitrary or summary executions, including those who receive death threats.

5. No one shall be involuntarily returned or extradited to a country where there are substantial grounds for believing that he or she may become a victim of extra-legal, arbitrary or summary execution in that country.

6. Governments shall ensure that persons deprived of their liberty are held in officially recognized places of custody, and that accurate information on their custody and whereabouts, including transfers, is made promptly available to their relatives and lawyer or other persons of confidence.

7. Qualified inspectors, including medical personnel, or an equivalent independent authority, shall conduct inspections in places of custody on a regular basis, and be empowered to undertake unannounced inspections on their own initiative, with full guarantees of independence in the exercise of this function. The inspectors shall have unrestricted access to all persons in such places of custody, as well as to all their records.

8. Governments shall make every effort to prevent extra-legal, arbitrary and summary executions through measures such as diplomatic intercession, improved access of complainants to intergovernmental and judicial bodies, and public denunciation. Intergovernmental mechanisms shall be used to investigate reports of any such executions and to take effective action against such practices.

Governments, including those of countries where extra-legal, arbitrary and summary executions are reasonably suspected to occur, shall cooperate fully in international investigations on the subject.

Investigation

9. There shall be thorough, prompt and impartial investigation of all suspected cases of extra-legal, arbitrary and summary executions, including cases where complaints by relatives or other reliable reports suggest unnatural death in the above circumstances. Governments shall maintain investigative offices and procedures to undertake such inquiries. The purpose of the investigation shall be to determine the cause, manner and time of death, the person responsible, and any pattern or practice which may have brought about that death. It shall include an adequate autopsy, collection and analysis of all physical and documentary evidence and statements from witnesses. The investigation shall distinguish between natural death, accidental death, suicide and homicide.

10. The investigative authority shall have the power to obtain all the information necessary to the inquiry. Those persons conducting the investigation shall have at their disposal all the necessary budgetary and technical resources for effective investigation. They shall also have the authority to oblige officials allegedly involved in any such executions to appear and testify. The same shall apply to any witness. To this end, they shall be entitled to issue summonses to witnesses, including the officials allegedly involved and to demand the production of evidence.

11. In cases in which the established investigative procedures are inadequate because of lack of expertise or impartiality, because of the importance of the matter or because of the apparent existence of a pattern of abuse, and in cases where there are complaints from the family of the victim about these inadequacies or other substantial reasons, Governments shall pursue investigations through an independent commission of inquiry or similar procedure. Members of such a commission shall be chosen for their recognized impartiality, competence and independence as individuals. In particular, they shall be independent of any institution, agency or person that may be the subject of the inquiry. The commission shall have the authority to obtain all information necessary to the inquiry and shall conduct the inquiry as provided for under these Principles.

12. The body of the deceased person shall not be disposed of until an adequate autopsy is conducted by a physician, who shall, if possible, be an expert in forensic pathology. Those conducting the autopsy shall have the right of access to all investigative data, to the place where the body was discovered, and to the place where the death is thought to have occurred. If the body has been buried and it later appears that an investigation is required, the body shall be promptly and competently exhumed for an autopsy. If skeletal remains are discovered, they should be carefully exhumed and studied according to systematic anthropological techniques.

13. The body of the deceased shall be available to those conducting the autopsy for a sufficient amount of time to enable a thorough investigation to be carried out. The autopsy shall, at a minimum, attempt to establish the identity of the deceased and the cause and manner of death. The time and place of death shall also be determined to the extent possible. Detailed colour photographs of the deceased shall be included in the autopsy report in order to document and support the findings of the investigation. The autopsy report must describe any and all injuries to the deceased including any evidence of torture.

14. In order to ensure objective results, those conducting the autopsy must be able to function impartially and independently of any potentially implicated persons or organizations or entities.

15. Complainants, witnesses, those conducting the investigation and their families shall be protected from violence, threats of violence or any other form of intimidation. Those potentially implicated in extra-legal, arbitrary or summary executions shall be removed from any position of control or power, whether direct or indirect. over complainants, witnesses and their families, as well as over those conducting investigations.

16. Families of the deceased and their legal representatives shall be informed of, and have access to. any hearing as well as to all information relevant to the investigation, and shall be entitled to present other evidence. The family of the deceased shall have the right to insist that a medical or other qualified representative be present at the autopsy. When the identity of a deceased person has been determined, a notification of death shall be posted, and the family or relatives of the deceased shall be informed immediately. The body of the deceased shall be returned to them upon completion of the investigation.

17. A written report shall be made within a reasonable period of time on the methods and findings of such investigations. The report shall be made public immediately and shall include the scope of the inquiry, procedures and methods used to evaluate evidence as well as conclusions and recommendations based on findings of fact and on applicable law. The report shall also describe in detail specific events that were found to have occurred and the evidence upon which such findings were based, and list the names of witnesses who testified, with the exception of those whose identities have been withheld for their own protection. The Government shall, within a reasonable period of time, either reply to the report of the investigation, or indicate the steps to be taken in response to it.

Legal proceedings

18. Governments shall ensure that persons identified by the investigation as having participated in extra-legal, arbitrary or summary executions in any territory under their jurisdiction are brought to justice. Governments shall either bring such persons to justice or cooperate to extradite any such persons to other countries wishing to exercise jurisdiction. This principle shall apply irrespective of who and where the perpetrators or the victims are, their nationalities or where the offence was committed.

19. Without prejudice to principle 3 above, an order from a superior officer or a public authority may not be invoked as a justification for extra-legal, arbitrary or summary executions. Superiors, officers or other public officials may be held responsible for acts committed by officials under their authority if they had a reasonable opportunity to prevent such acts. In no circumstances, including a state of war, siege or other public emergency, shall blanket immunity from prosecution be granted to any person allegedly involved in extra-legal, arbitrary or summary executions.

20. The families and dependents of victims of extra-legal, arbitrary or summary executions shall be entitled to fair and adequate compensation within a reasonable period of time.

* In resolution 1989/65, paragraph 1, the Economic and Social Council recommended that the Principles on the Effective Prevention and Investigation of Extra-legal, Arbitrary and Summary Executions should be taken into account and respected by Governments within the framework of their national legislation and practices.

4. THE ROLE OF THE GOVERNMENT IN THE PROVISION OF EVIDENCE TO THE INQUIRY

4.1 Introduction and Summary of Submissions

4.1.1 The vast bulk of the documentary evidence received by the Inquiry has been provided by the Government. Apart from being the custodian of official documents, the Government is under a legal obligation by virtue of Article 2 of the European Convention to do everything in its power to ensure that the Inquiry into deaths and injuries caused by its servants and agents is both independent and effective. It is readily acknowledged that the Government has declared its willingness to cooperate fully with the Inquiry and to disclose all relevant material. It has supplied the Tribunal with a very substantial and wide-ranging body of information and documentation. The material provided includes documents that purport to be contemporaneous as well as documents that have been recently created.

4.1.2 However, the Tribunal has to evaluate this information and, as part of this process, it is obliged to determine whether it has indeed been given all the relevant available material and whether the material that has been provided is reliable. It also has to be satisfied that it is genuine.

4.1.3 In this context, we submit that: the Government (including in particular the MOD) and its agencies (including in particular the Security Service, Secret Intelligence Service and the RUC / PSNI) should be regarded as having a potential interest in protecting their former servants and agents, including in particular soldiers, civil servants, politicians and others involved either directly or indirectly in the events leading up to Bloody Sunday, the events on the day itself and relevant events thereafter. For this reason alone, the Government and its agencies cannot be relied upon to make full disclosure of all the documentation and information in their possession. Indeed, it is our submission that the Government ought to have been represented as an interested party at the Inquiry, rather than merely an observer and provider of information and documentation. If the Government had been a party, the Security Service for example, may have felt under a greater obligation to take care to disclose everything in its possession.

4.1.4 Whether or not the Tribunal accepts this contention, the Tribunal will be unable to discharge its task without fully appreciating the nature and role of those Army and Government agencies which were and still are engaged in what may euphemistically be described as shaping perceptions of the truth in a manner favourable to the Government and Army. It is in our respectful submission necessary, therefore, to examine the role of the HQNI's Information Policy unit in order to determine the extent, if any, to which it was engaged in psychological operations (psyops) in relation to Bloody Sunday.

4.1.5 Secondly, whether or not State agencies were engaged in formal psyops, it has to be determined whether relevant documentation which was damaging to the Army case, including photographs and cine film, was destroyed or otherwise suppressed at the material time or in the intervening period before the Inquiry was set up..

4.1.6 Thirdly, the Tribunal must decide whether State agencies have disclosed all of the relevant material still in their possession. This in turn requires an examination of the reasons for delayed disclosure in order to determine whether the failure to disclose such material at an earlier stage reflects a lack of genuine willingness on the part of the agencies concerned to co-operate with the Inquiry.

4.1.7 In our submission,

(i) vital documents (including photographs) relevant to Bloody Sunday that were or ought to have been in the possession of the Government or State agencies have been deliberately destroyed and / or suppressed;

(ii) some material has been edited;

(iii) some material, including in particular Intelligence material, has been supplied by the Government in a manner designed to mislead the Tribunal;

(iv) some material that is or should still be available has been withheld and, therefore,

(v) the Tribunal has not been provided with all the relevant official documentation and information concerning Bloody Sunday.

4.1.8 We propose to arrange our submissions under the following headings:

(i) Information Policy Unit and Psyops

(ii) Missing Army Photographs and cine film

(iii) MOD

(iv) Intelligence Agencies

(v) RUC / PSNI

4.2 Information Policy Unit and Psyops

Nature Of Psyops In The 1970's

4.2.1 Psychological Operations (Psyops) in the early 1970's in Northern Ireland took a variety of forms, some perfectly harmless "hearts and minds" work but some of it sinister, as it was described by Tony Staughton, Head of Public Relations at HQNI (KW2.5). Sinister psyops involved deception, dirty tricks, disinformation, black propaganda, falsifying documents, forging documents and spreading false rumours. This activity was all designed to invent or distort facts in such a way as to cast the Army in a good light and the "enemy" in a bad light. (per Colin Wallace, Day 237/162/20 to Day 237/162/24)

4.2.2 The enemy in this context included not just the IRA but others, such as NICRA, who were perceived by the Army as threatening the state: see the evidence of Colin Wallace (Day 237/163/10 to Day 237/163/14).

4.2.3 Colin Wallace has given examples of the kind of psyops conducted by the Army and the Intelligence Services at the material time. On Day 237/163/15 to Day 237/167/24, he confirmed the accuracy of the accounts published in Curtis, "The Propraganda War in Ireland" (OS1.614 to OS1.617), Lashmar and Oliver "Britain's Secret War" (OS1.601 to OS1.605) and Dillon, "The Dirty War" (OS1.627). The Psyops referred to in these accounts included an example of the Army falsifying official statistics in order to influence Government policy and the Information Research Department of the Foreign Office distorting facts so as to influence public opinion. Information Policy disinformation sometimes re-emerged in Intelligence Summaries graded as A1 (Day 237/174/21 to Day 237/175/1). At Appendix 5 of his second statement (KW2. 218), he exhibited a document that purported to be a confession of a former IRA member but which was in fact forged by Mr Wallace and contained much "fiction" (KW2.145 and Day 237/175/12 to Day 237/175/13) In brief, psychological Operations were characterised by dishonesty, deceit and falsehood. (Day 237/178/5 to Day 237/178/7)

4.2.4 Psyops required cooperation and co-ordination with the Intelligence Services and those involved in Psyops worked closely with MI6 and MI5 (Day 237/178/8 to Day 237/178/23). As the term "dirty tricks" implies, Psyops and Intelligence units were capable not only of being unscrupulous but also of engaging in activity which would normally be regarded by official agencies as completely unconscionable, as exemplified in the Kincora affair (summarised in Dillon, "The Dirty War" at OS1.629) so that allegations of misconduct which in other circumstances might be considered outlandish cannot be rejected without close examination.

4.2.5. The upshot of this is that all information and documentation emanating from or influenced by Psyops personnel is inherently unreliable and potentially misleading (Day 237/180/25 to Day 237/181/15). The problem is that just about all official Army and Government information and documentation could be influenced by Psyops personnel. It is simply impossible to tell. Mr Wallace was not aware of any documents or information in respect of Bloody Sunday having been falsified by Psyops personnel (Day 237/189/10 to Day 237/189/20). However, as Hugh Mooney suggested (KM.631), it appears that Mr Wallace was involved only in "low level" psyops and that he may have been "outside the loop" when it came to "high level" activities. Therefore the mere fact that he was unaware of psyops being conducted in relation to Bloody Sunday does not mean that they were not (Day 238/18/5 to Day 238/18/10).

4.2.6 Nor can the Government necessarily be relied upon to admit when such information and documentation has been influenced by psyops personnel. Mr Wallace's own involvement in Psyops was authorised by senior officials, including in particular Mr Broderick (OS1.624), but this was denied at the highest level by the Government until 1990 when it was finally admitted in the House of Commons by the Secretary of State for Defence (see Hansard OS1.551 to OS1.552 and OS1.571) (Day 237/182/17 to Day 237/183/7).

Psyops personnel in Northern Ireland in 1972

4.2.7. Colin Wallace was the only witness to admit active involvement in psyops during the period in question but, ironically, he was the only one who was not either a member of Psyops staff or on the Psyops Committee. Indeed, he was unaware that there was a Psyops Committee (Day 238/8/22 to Day 238/15/11).

4..2.8 Col. Tugwell claimed not to have been involved in Psyops or disinformation but he was the Head of the Department described by Colin Wallace as the Psyops Unit and he is recorded in the documentation as responsible for the co-ordination of psyops.

4.2.9. INQ 1873 said in his statement (C1873.1 paragraphs 3 to 4) that he was not involved in psyops and that it was wrong in principle to practise psyops against one's own people. Yet we now know that he was the former Head of Psyops at the Joint Warfare Establishment at Old Sarum and he was a member of the Psyops staff in N. Ireland. Both Mr Mooney and Mr Wallace confirm that he was actively involved in psyops. (Day 238/22/12 to Day 238/22/15)

4..2.10. Hugh Mooney also claimed to have no involvement in psyops and could not remember any committee meetings but he had been sent to Northern Ireland to advise the Army on psyops; according to the documentation, he was a member of the Psyops staff and of the Psyops Committee; and he referred in his own reports to attending Psyops meetings.

4.2.11. This anxiety on the part of Messrs Tugwell, Mooney and INQ 1873 to distance themselves from psyops in the face of documentary evidence that they were deeply involved in such activity gives rise to the inference that (a) they were involved in such activity, (b) this activity related to Bloody Sunday and (c) it was so discreditable that they had to deny it.

4.2.12. The documentation discloses the following facts. In July 1970, Lt Col INQ 1873 visited Northern Ireland with a view to considering possible ways in which military psychological activities might be employed there: C1873.7. He recommended the establishment of a Psyops Committee and a Psyops Staff Officer at HQNI. At a meeting of the JSC on 3rd June 1971, the GOC confirmed that he was examining the whole subject of psychological warfare: TMPD 29.39. On 14th July 1971, Lt. Col. INQ 1870 submitted a memorandum for consideration by the G (Liaison) Committee on 21st July 1971. The memorandum was classified Secret / LocSen (locally sensitive). Attached to the memorandum was a document entitled "Headquarters Northern Ireland Psychological Operations Staff Terms of Reference". (KM6.108.1) According to this document, the Director of Psychological Operations was to be the Commander of Land Forces. The Psyops staff was to consist of GSO1 (Liaison) (INQ1873), the Information Advisor to the GOC (Mr Mooney) and clerical support. The Psyops Committee was to consist of, inter alia, the CLF, the Chief of Staff, the UK Rep (Howard Smith), the Director of Intelligence (David), INQ1873, the GSO1 Intelligence, the Civil Advisor, Mr Mooney and the Chief Public Relations Officer. Lt. Col. INQ1873 was to be responsible for psyops activities and co-ordination of other forces and agencies, including the RUC, when implementing psyops activities. Mr Mooney was to be responsible for assistance with the implementation of psyops affecting non-military matters. All operations were normally to be approved by the CLF as the Director of Psyops.

4.2.13 No minutes of the meeting of this Committee on 21st July 1971 or of any meeting of the Psyops Committee have been provided to the Tribunal. In a note dated 24th January 1972, Col Tugwell advised that the term "Psyops" should not be used "in view of its somewhat sinister connotations". This may explain why there is no other reference to any committee by the name of Psyops Committee. There are references to the Military Information Policy Committee and it is clear that this Committee did meet (see G70C.441.11 paragraph 29) but the Tribunal has not been provided with any minutes of any of this Committee's meetings either.

4.2.14 Colin Wallace

(i) According to Colin Wallace, the Information Policy unit was involved in Psyops as of January 1972 and was in fact known as the Psyops Unit. (Day 238/149/2 to Day 238/149/7)

(ii) The Department was headed by Col Tugwell and the personnel included INQ1873 and Mr Mooney. They were all involved in Psyops. (Day 238/22/1 to Day 238/22/6)

(iii) Psyops was part of PR but the MOD chart at GEN1.19 is misleading in that it did not refer to the Psyops Unit or the Psyops Committee.(Day 238/23/10 to Day 238/24/11). This chart is not a true reflection of the Government's understanding of the position since, at KW2.205, the Secret Intelligence Service confirmed that Mr Wallace was engaged in Psyops.

(iv) Mr Wallace knew of the Army's intention to teach the Bogsiders and Civil Rights marchers a lesson (KW2.191). The new "get tough" policy was designed to placate Unionists and the paratroopers were the instrument chosen to effect the policy (KW2.190). In other words, as Mr Wallace accepted, the Army plan was politically motivated (Day 238/31/15 to Day 238/31/22)

(v) It was planned to use the paratroopers in circumstances where they were liable to use lethal force, whether in a premeditated, calculated fashion or as a characteristic over-reaction on their part. Even though the written operation order did not envisage a plan to shoot demonstrators, Mr Wallace expressed the view that there can be plans at various levels and that this "happened all the time" (KW2.263) in a way that was always "deniable". (Day 238/33/6 to Day 238/33/10)

(vi) Mr Wallace was aware that consideration was being given before Bloody Sunday to a plan or policy to shoot selected ringleaders of the DYH (Day 236/99/1)

(vii) He accepted that, as an alternative to giving soldiers direct orders to shoot civilians, it was possible to create conditions in which that was likely to happen, for example by using trigger-happy soldiers and manipulating them by giving them a special briefing (KW2.140 paragraph 58, Day 238/34/12 to Day 238/34/15). Of particular significance in this connection is the evidence concerning the draft chapter of a book written by an anonymous officer referred to Wallace by Captain Jackson. This officer appears to have been a lieutenant or captain in 1 Para who was present both at Bloody Sunday and at the briefings beforehand. The fact that the wife of one of the officers who attended the briefings could characterise the planned operation as "Londonderry's Sharpville" tends to suggest, as Mr Wallace accepted, that some elements of 1 Para may have been given a special briefing to the effect that they had a licence to shoot civilians on Bloody Sunday. (Day 238/35/14 to Day 238/37/2)

(viii) In the aftermath of the shootings, Mr Staughton and the regular PR Branch at HQNI was effectively excluded from presentation of the facts on behalf of the Army. (Day 241/138/9 to Day 241/138/12). The first Press release was drafted by Col. Tugwell, who concealed this by arranging that the staff who put out the statement should say it was "phoned in by one of our chaps in Derry" (B133.103). The interview with the BBC was arranged by Mr Mooney and the interview itself was given by Col. Tugwell. All the information put out by the Army that day was put out by psyops personnel ((Day 238/43/25 to Day 238/45/12).

(ix) Although Mr Wallace has denied falsifying any information in relation to Bloody Sunday, Mr Mooney stated that he, Col. Tugwell and Mr Wallace met at Mr Mooney's house a few days after Bloody Sunday to discuss the matter (Day 240/27/11 to Day 240/27/14) and during the course of the meeting Mr Wallace raised the possibility that the IRA could have been present at Bloody Sunday wearing uniforms stolen sometime earlier from a laundry in Derry. (Day 239/122/25 to Day 239123/3). If true, this evidence suggests both that these three individuals were involved together in a Psyops Unit at the material time and that they actively considered psyops methods for dealing with the fall-out from Bloody Sunday. This should be seen in the context that Col. Tugwell and Mr Wallace were both involved in the "analysis of the opposition case" at the Widgery Inquiry (CO1.209)

(x) Based on his own experience, Mr Wallace said he would not be surprised if Government officials had suppressed documents relevant to Bloody Sunday (Day 238/86/21 to Day 238/86/25)

4.2.15 Col Tugwell

(i) Col. Tugwell says that he was not involved in Psyops and did not deal with disinformation (B1333.7 paragraph 46). However, the documentary evidence would suggest otherwise.

(ii) In the memorandum of 30th November 1971 written by Mr C H Henn of DS10 concerning the organisation of information activity for Northern Ireland (KM6.99), which was copied to Col. Tugwell among others, it is stated in express terms that Col. GS (Information Policy), i.e. Col Tugwell, was responsible among other things for co-ordinating and laying down the general policy for the activities of the GSO1 (Liaison), i.e. INQ1873, in the latter's concern with Psychological Operations (KM6.102). It was also noted in the same memorandum that, within the Ministry of Defence in London, a new staff post at Lt Colonel level was to be set up early in January 1972 in the Northern Ireland branch of the Directorate of Military Operations (MO4) and that this officer would be responsible for co-ordinating those aspects of intelligence, psychological operations and special political action which contribute to HMG's propaganda policy and that in this connection he would liaise with Col Tugwell at HQNI (KM6.101 paragraph 7).

(iii) In 1990, the Government admitted formally, in connection with Mr Wallace's activities, that until the mid 1970's it was Army policy to disseminate disinformation to malign individuals (OS1.552).

(iv) It does not appear that Col Tugwell was opposed in principle to the use of Psyops where the occasion demanded it. In a memorandum written by him just one week before Bloody Sunday in his capacity as Chairman of the Military Information Working Party (G70c.441.6), he expressed reservations about "black activities" in Northern Ireland but apparently only on the basis that it was difficult to keep secrets for long in Northern Ireland. He did not consider that this excluded "isolated exercises for specific purposes" where authorised by the Military Information Policy Committee, the committee which may have been the cover name for the Psyops Committee. (G70c.441.9). Although it is clear from this memorandum (at paragraph 29) that the MIPC did meet, we have no minutes of any such meetings.

(v) With regard to the nature of the "enemy" against whom such black activities may have been regarded as legitimate, Col Tugwell made it clear in another note written by him on 9th November 1971 (G26A.195.1) that the individuals and organisations regarded by him as either "front organisations" for the IRA or republican sympathisers included the Irish News, NICRA, various relief and action committees in Catholic areas, the SDLP, vigilante or street committees, University Groups and teachers, the Association of Irish Priests and a number of other named priests. (Paragraph 7)

(vi) In the same document (at paragraph 8) Col Tugwell, without a trace of irony, comments that "the indigenous Irish, once convinced that their cause is just, possess a breathtaking ability to lie with absolute conviction, not just in support of something they believe to be true, but to put across a story they know very well is untrue".

(vii) Another reflection of his attitude towards Irish civilians is his comment at paragraph 13b of the same document that internment was a "humane alternative to relying entirely on shooting it out". (G26A.195.6)

(viii) The importance attached by Col Tugwell to the truth is reflected in his own conduct on Bloody Sunday. He said in his statement that he was "anxious to get to HQNI to find out what had happened" (B1333.4 paragraphs 23 to 24) but the first press statement issued by the Army was drafted by Col Tugwell before he even left Derry. In other words, he was responsible for disseminating the Army's first official account of what had happened in Derry before he himself had found out what had happened. It seems clear that long before he returned to HQNI he knew that the Paras had killed innocent civilians and that, in his own terms, the Army faced a public relations disaster, which is why he and others in his vehicle were "sombre and quiet on the way back to HQNI" (B1333.4 paragraph 23). Despite this, he drafted a press statement and gave an interview to the BBC which conveyed the impression that the Army had behaved perfectly properly and had fired only when justified in doing so. During the course of this interview, he also claimed that four of those shot were on the Army's Wanted List. He claimed that this was an error but it is, in our submission, much more likely that this was a deliberate ploy designed to promote the belief that the Army had in fact been engaged in a gun battle with the IRA.

4.2.16 INQ1873

(i) In his statement (C1873.1 paragraphs 3 to 4), Lt Col. INQ1873 denies being involved in Psyops in Northern Ireland because this would have been contrary to the principle that Psychological Operations may not be conducted "against one's own people". The evidence that this is untrue is overwhelming. When asked whether he now accepted that when he denied involvement in psyops in Northern Ireland he was being economical with the truth, he replied: "I think unintentionally, sir" (Day 242/52/21).

(ii) In any event, it is clear from the documented remarks of some senior Army officers and civil servants that many in the Army and British Government did not in fact regard the people of Northern Ireland, especially the Nationalists, as their "own people." Like Col. Tugwell, it is notable that some of INQ1873's comments in his diary have an anti-Irish racist tinge and tend to suggest that, far from regarding the people of N. Ireland as his "own", he would have regarded large sections of the community as "the enemy", and certainly would have done so for the purposes of psyops. He referred in his diary to the "mendacious Irish" (C1873.21) and to "the Irish at their worst, violent cold-blooded killers" (C1873.23.1)

(iii) As appears from the documents referred to above, INQ1873 had been the head of Psyops at the Joint Warfare Establishment, Old Sarum; he prepared a report on ways in which military psychological activities might be employed in Northern Ireland; he was himself appointed as the Psyops staff officer in Northern Ireland; he was a member of the Psyops Committee; and he was primarily responsible for Psyops activities in Northern Ireland at the material time, although he was anxious to point out that he was responsible for it "under the direction of the Commander for Land Forces", i.e. General Ford. (Day 242/52/24 to Day 242/55/6)

(iv) Mr Mooney says that INQ1873 did carry out psyops in Northern Ireland at the material time (KM6.14 paragraph 25) and Mr Wallace also confirmed this (Day 238/22/12 to Day 238/22/15 and Day 238/151/12 to Day 238/152/15).

(v) In paragraph 3 of the Information Policy Review to the end of March 1972 (G130.858 paragraph 4) written by INQ1873, he wrote:

> "When intelligence indicated that the IRA planned to use the march as cover for their gunmen, consideration was given to various pre-emptive and protective measures in the propaganda field".

In his oral testimony, INQ1873 admitted that he did not have any intelligence before the march that the IRA planned to use the march as cover for their gunmen and when asked by the Chairman why then he came to write this a month or so later he said:"I cannot explain that. It is a mistake on my part, I think" (Day 242/23/17 to Day 242/23/25)

(vi) Referring to INQ1873's description of the "pre-emptive and protective measures" taken by Information Policy on Bloody Sunday in his Review, Col Tugwell said that these were "wise-after-the-event items". (B1333.067) In other words, they were made up. Mr Mooney referred to some of these measures as "sheer invention" and certainly not taken in the light of any intelligence. (Day 239/121/3 to Day 239/121/18)

(vii) In his own personal diary for 30th January (C1873.16), he had also written that "undoubtedly there was an IRA plan for the hooligans to promote trouble" but he also had to admit that he did not know of any such plan (Day 242/42/10 to Day 242/42/13).

(viii) INQ1873 agreed that a meeting did take place in July 1971 to consider the document (KM6.108.1) recommending the establishment of a psyops committee (Day 242/56/4 to Day 242/56/6). He said there were no minutes of the meeting but could not explain why not. He began to explain that "it was merely an approval of the .. ..." but then he changed tack and suggested that it was merely for distributing the document for consultation. In our submission he was about to explain that the meeting was called simply to rubber stamp the document before realising that he had previously suggested that the committee "did not go any further" (Day 242/55/24 to Day 242/56/13). His subsequent attempts to explain why recommendations that had apparently been generated initially by the GOC and Commander of Land Forces had not been approved and minuted were not convincing. When asked who disagreed with the establishment of the Psyops Committee he said that he did not think that there was any disagreement. When asked why then it had not been set up he said it was not necessary. When asked who decided that, he said it just came about. (Day 242/56/14 to Day 242/58/19)

(ix) Having claimed that he had no further role in Psyops after July 1971, he was unable to explain why it appeared from a series of documents which came into being after that date that he was still being referred to as the officer involved in Psyops in Northern Ireland. For example, in a note from Mr Henn, DS10 dated 30th November 1971 (KM6.9.9 and KM6.102) he is referred to as being concerned with psychological operations. In his diary for 4th January 1972 (C1873.11.4), there is reference to INQ1873 having a discussion with someone from Old Sarum (C1873.21.1) and to him meeting the Psyops staff.

(x) INQ1873 also claimed to have no recollection of doing anything specifically in connection with Bloody Sunday to counteract what he would have regarded as enemy propaganda about Bloody Sunday, namely allegations that innocent civilians had been murdered by the Army, even though it was his task to counter such "propaganda" (Day 242/71/24 to Day 242/73/14)

(xi) In the light of this evidence, it is difficult to regard INQ1873's denials of involvement in Psyops as anything other than pure lies. His denials of involvement in psyops concerning the dissemination of official information after Bloody Sunday are equally unreliable. Insofar as psyops were necessary to protect the image of the Army in Northern Ireland, the Army could hardly have been in greater need of such activities as they were following Bloody Sunday. Despite this, INQ1873 persisted in claiming that not only did he take no part in matters concerning Bloody Sunday but he did not engage in psyops of any kind during this period.

4.2.17 Hugh Mooney

(i) Mr Mooney described himself as a journalist by profession and joined the Information Research Department of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office as a "Specialist Writer". (KM6.1 paragraph 2) He was seconded to HQNI in or about July 1971. He was there under "deep cover" as the Information Advisor to the GOC (KM6.62). He claims that he did not carry out any psyops in Northern Ireland and that IRD activity in Northern Ireland was not sinister. If this is true, it is difficult to understand why Mr Clifford Hill, then Deputy Head of the FCO's Guidance and Information Policy Department, told the FCO's Personnel Department to put a note on the file of anyone serving in Northern Ireland that "anything done there should not be held against them" (KM6.11 paragraph 16c), or why the Chief of Army Public Relations wanted to be disassociated from him. (KM6.75).

(ii) He said his role was to "eliminate extremists" (KM6.118), a characterisation which he now claims is inaccurate and misleading even though he did seem to take credit in the same document (KM6.118) for participation in the fabrication of a dummy Army order which was designed to kill persons handling certain types of explosives. In another of his reports, he was keen to point out that he had not neglected the "darker side" of his work (KM6.113).

(iii) He now claims that his only function in respect of Psyops was to keep an eye on what was going on and to report to the UK Rep (KM6.24 at paragraph 54). However, this is difficult to reconcile with the documentary evidence that

- He attended a Psyops course in February 1971 (KM6.14 at paragraph 23)
- His immediate job on appointment to Northern Ireland was to advise the Army on psyops(KM6.67 at paragraph 2)
- There was concern that his work would duplicate that of the Psyops Officer already in Northern Ireland (KM6.68 2)
- He was a member of the Psyops Staff and a member of the Psyops Committee (KM6.108)
- He claims that he didn't attend any Psyops meetings and cannot recall any such meetings (KM6.28 paragraph 59 (2) (e)) but he claimed in a contemporaneous report that he did attend Psyops meetings (KM6.118). In a report at KM6.111, he refers to a "psyops working party of which I am a member".

(iv) He says that Psyops ceased in September 1971 with the formation of Information Policy (KM6.28 and 29), but

- This was just a few weeks after the Psyops Committee was established (21st July 1971)
- INQ1873 continued to be styled as GSO1 (Liaison) as per the "Terms of Reference" proposed in the new scheme (KM6.109)
- Col. Tugwell was responsible, as the Head of Information Policy, for co-ordinating the activities of GSO1 (Liaison) "in the latter's concern with psychological operations" (KM6.102).
- His above-mentioned report to the effect that he was "attending psyops meetings" (KM6.118) was written after he had been in post for more than three months and there was no hint in that report that the Psyops Committee had ceased to exist or was about to cease to exist.
- He continued to share an office with INQ1873 after September 1971.
- Mr Wallace says that Information Policy was involved in Psyops in January 1972. [KW2.14 paragraph 73]
- The Military Information Policy Committee (possibly the cover name for the Psyops Committee) was certainly still meeting in January 1972.

(v) Mr Mooney claims that his dealings with Intelligence were only at a social level and he did not receive Army Intelligence Reports (KM6.25 paragraph 57) but

- His role was to liaise with the Director of Intelligence (KM6.73) and
- He wanted to have his own office to have access to "more" raw intelligence. (KM6.120)

(vi) He says that Bloody Sunday was the "biggest PR event for the British Army" (KM6.40 paragraph 92) but he claims that the PR Branch did very little in response to it (KM6.39 paragraph 91); Psyops did nothing because it did not exist at the time; he did very little as Information Advisor to the GOC and was not called upon to brief anyone before or after because he was careful not to tread on PR's toes

(KM6.35 paragraph 75); and there is no evidence that Clifford Hill did anything. Mr Mooney could not explain why the various individuals in PR at the time did so little to present the Army's case effectively in the immediate aftermath of Bloody Sunday. It is submitted that the truth is that those involved in Psyops, such as Mr Mooney, were in fact heavily involved in damage-limitation psyops exercises but are not prepared to disclose what they did.

(vii) In his first statement, Mr Mooney made no reference to writing the "Hindsight on Insight" article and gave the impression that he paid only one visit to the Widgery Tribunal just to see what was going on but had no other role (KM6.2 paragraph 13). However, it is submitted that in order to acquire the understanding of the detail apparent in that article, he would either have had to do considerable research into the matter or he was in fact already best placed to write the article because of his covert involvement in related psyops.

4.2.18 Mr Mooney claimed that the chart prepared by Madden and Finucane at KM6.79 was inaccurate, mainly because it shows him as part of the Information Policy unit. When asked specifically whether he was under the operational responsibility of the Information Policy section, he said "not at all" (Day 240/32/10). However, his own Head of Department at the IRD said that Mooney was under the operational control of the Information Policy Unit (KB4.3 paragraph 7). Mr Mooney cannot in our submission be regarded as a reliable witnesses.

Conclusion

4.2.19. We are satisfied that we have not been provided with all relevant documentation and information concerning the Psyops witnesses and the issues with which they are or may be connected. The only expert evidence and/or guidance received by the Tribunal and the Families' representatives concerning Intelligence and Information Policy / Public Relations has been that provided by the Ministry of Defence, which we do not regard as either impartial or reliable. We have therefore been deprived of the material required fully to appreciate the role of these witnesses in all relevant matters.

4.2.20. It is therefore difficult to know the extent to which they were involved in preparing the public and the Press for violence on Bloody Sunday, seeking in advance to attribute to the organisers of the march responsibility for the violence, and, after the event, concealing the truth of what the Army had done. This may have taken the form of, inter alia, disseminating false information (e.g. that those shot had been gunmen and bombers, that 4 of the deceased were on the "wanted" list, that the events confirmed intelligence reports that the IRA had planned to use the march as cover for an attack on the Army), suppressing evidence (e.g. the army photographs), fabricating evidence (e.g. Col Tugwell's own claim to hear automatic fire) and impugning the integrity of those local eye-witnesses and others (such as the Sunday Times Insight Team) who sought to reveal the truth about Bloody Sunday. However, the Tribunal should, at least, be satisfied that the documentation it has received about these matters is incomplete. Moreover, all the information and documentation that has emanated from Government and Army agencies must be treated with caution and cannot safely be taken at face value.

4.3 Missing Army and Police Photographs and Cine Film

Introduction and Summary of Submissions

4.3.1 The failure by the Army and the Royal Ulster Constabulary to produce photographs and cine films taken by soldiers and police officers on Bloody Sunday is a matter of grave concern. The evidential value of photographs and films of material events cannot be overstated. We know that at least 10 Army photographers between them took well over 1000 photographs of the march and its aftermath. Yet not one of these photographs has been produced to the Inquiry and it has now emerged that they may even have been concealed from the Widgery Tribunal. Nor has the Ministry of Defence been able to explain when, where, why, by whom and in what circumstances these photographs came to be destroyed or lost. Apart from a passing reference in Col. Overbury's Report, there is not a single record of their development, contents, movement, custody or disposal. All we know about them is that these photographs undermined the Army case, because they did not show any civilian gunmen or bombers or anything else to justify Army shooting. What we do not know is the extent to which they undermined the Army case and implicated individual soldiers.

4.3.2. The Army also had a photographer in an Army helicopter taking cine film. The Ministry of Defence failed to furnish the Tribunal with the original cine film taken from the helicopter. All the Tribunal received was a "copy", lasting 3 minutes 43 seconds and in which the relevant passage of film stops abruptly almost immediately after the first two APC's came to a halt near Rossville Flats.

4.3.3 Our submissions on this issue are as follows:

(i) These photographs undermined the Army's case that soldiers were shot at and had nail bombs thrown at them. Lt Col Overbury made this clear in his report when he said that "a single photograph of a gunman or nail-bomber would have gone a long way to proving the case of the Army". With 10 Army photographers in a forward position -normal Army practice, according to General Ford (WT 10/30) - in order to obtain maximum photographic coverage, it would be remarkable if none of the "well over 1,000 copies of photographs" taken by them provided a clear picture of the true scene encountered by soldiers as they moved into the Bogside and began firing, not to mention the real possibility that soldiers may have been caught on camera in the act of shooting civilians.

(ii) The photographs were copied and retained in a variety of locations.

(iii) Records of the photographs were kept. There should still be records indicating their contents, existence, movements, whereabouts and/or disposal.

(iii) The MOD's failure to produce either the photographs themselves or records indicating what happened to them gives rise to the inference that they have been deliberately destroyed and/or concealed either by the Army or the MOD in order to suppress damaging evidence about the Army's conduct on Bloody Sunday.

(iv) The copy cine film made available to the Tribunal is an incomplete, edited copy of the original, which was destroyed and / or concealed in order to suppress damaging evidence about the Army's conduct on Bloody Sunday.

The Operation Order and its Implementation

4.3.4. The Operation Order for Photographic Coverage specified that 10 photographers (deployed initially at positions along the containment line) and one cine camera team (deployed in a helicopter) would execute the "mission" of providing "max photo coverage of the NICRA march and all associated incidents on 30 Jan 72" (G99A.600.1);

4.3.5. The 10 soldiers were drawn from 22 LADR (2), 1 Coldstream Guards (2), 1 Royal Anglian(1), 2 Royal Green Jackets(2), 1 King's Own Border(1), 3 Royal Regiment of Fusiliers(1) and 1 Para(1):G99A.600.1 paragraph 1) The two photographers from 2RGJ and the one photographer from 1 Para were attached to 22LADR, giving them 5 photographers in all, deployed initially at five different locations, viz. OP Echo (Embassy Building), the Corner Boot Store/Waterloo Street, the junction of Great James Street/Little James Street, the City Wall (Shipquay Gate) and the entrance to Victoria RUC station. The photographer from the Fusiliers was attached to the Coldstream Guards, making a total of three photographers, who were deployed at Blighs Lane and St Eugene's Cathedral (2). The photographer from 1KOB was attached to 1

Royal Anglian, making two photographers, who were deployed at Brandywell and Craigavon Bridge. (G99A600.1 paragraphs 4 to 6).

4.3.6. Although the photographers were deployed initially at the stated locations, they were required to "move posn as necessary to achieve the aim". (G99A600.1 paragraph 3) In this connection, General Ford said during the Widgery Tribunal proceedings that it was normal Army practice for photographers to occupy forward positions (Widgery Transcript 10/30).

4.3.7. The films were to be collected from time to time by the Intelligence section of HQ 8 Infantry Brigade and processing was to be carried out at HQ 8 Infantry Brigade at HQNI under the instructions of GSO3 Intelligence and Security (Captain INQ1803) (G99A600.2 paragraph 11). INQ 1803 (who was also given the cipher INQ1504) signed the order and was also to be responsible for the co-ordination of the plan (G99A600.3 paragraph 15).

4.3.8. Two Sioux helicopters were made available, one to carry the cine photographer during the event and the other to carry film from Brigade Headquarters to HQNI. It was anticipated that there would be at least two deliveries of films, with one helicopter departing for HQNI at 15.30 hrs and the other at 17.15 hrs with "the balance of films" (N.B. plural) (G99A600.2 paragraph 9). The films were to be subsequently available to units for "INT and PR purposes". (G99A600.3 paragraph 13).

4.3.9. There are statements from 6 soldiers who were apparently designated to take still photographs of the events on the day as well as from 1 soldier who took cine film from a helicopter, 2 RMP soldiers who took photographs at the mortuary, a war artist who took photographs for the purposes of a painting and a press officer who also took some photographs. Photographers were generally members of Intelligence sections and the officer in charge of coordinating the plan was the Brigade Intelligence Officer (GSO 3 Int and Sy, viz INQ1803). The connection between photographs and Intelligence is important, for reasons connected to the maintenance of files and records, discussed further below.

4.3.10 It is difficult to relate these statements to the Op Order in that the positions photographers say they took up do not seem to correspond exactly with those allocated to the photographers in the Order, which may mean either that the photographers did not comply with the Order or that there were other photographers who did but from whom statements have not yet been taken.. The positions adopted by the photographers who have given statements appear to have been as follows:

(i) Barrier 12: INQ 836 (22 LADR) and INQ 863 (22 LADR)
(ii) Barrier 14: INQ 850 (RGJ, War Artist) and INQ 1231 (2 RGJ)
(iii) Craigavon Bridge: INQ 1199 (1 RA) until moved to City Walls
(iv) City Walls: INQ 1199 (1RA) after Craigavon Bridge
(v) Presbyterian Church: INQ 1970 (1 PARA) (until he left to follow the Intelligence Officer)

4.3.11 The most relevant initial deployment locations appear to have been those under the control of 22 LADR. According to INQ863 of 22LADR, UNK48 was taking photographs at OP Echo. As his cipher indicates, we have no statement from this photographer. There is no statement from the RGJ photographer who was assigned to the Corner Boot Store/Waterloo Street, although this may have been the task performed by INQ1231 who says he was positioned at Barrier 14. Two (not 1) photographers from LADR were deployed at the junction of Great James Street/Little James Street (Barrier 12), viz INQ836 and INQ863. There is no statement from an RGJ photographer to the effect that he was at the City Wall (Shipquay Street) although Corporal INQ1199 of the Royal Anglians made his way to the City Walls and Craigavon Bridge. The 1 Para photographer (INQ1970) was not deployed at the entrance to the Victoria RUC station but at the Presbyterian Church before he moved to a barrier.

4.3.12 If photographers from different units were deployed in accordance with the Operational Order, there were at least three, possibly four, other photographers from whom statements do not appear to have been taken, viz the second photographer from 1 Coldstream Guards and the photographers from 1 Kings Own Border and 3 Royal Regiment of Fusiliers.

4.3.13 There is no reason to believe that the Operation Order was not carried out in full; the evidence, for example, of Captain 028 (WT 17/59), Lieutenant 119 (WT 14/18) and INQ 863 confirms that Army photographers, both in uniform and in civilian clothes, did take photographs and were present at material times and locations. Soldiers with cameras are seen in some of the still photographs and some are seen in the actuality footage, for example as follows:

V1/03.05 / 11.41	- Para (INQ1970?) wearing a beret with a camera over his left shoulder.
V1/03.17 / 11.41	- Soldier on knee, perhaps the same as number 1 taking photographs with other cameras slung over his shoulder.
V1/04.06 / 11.41	- Soldier with a camera in his left hand as he moves through the barrier (this is not entirely clear)

Video 3 (CDRom):

V3/3.52 / 09.25	- Soldier referred to by Alan Finnis at AF 17.1 paragraph 4 as having been handed a camera as he stood on the roof of a Landrover which moved in the direction of William Street on the west side of Waterloo Place.

4.3.14 There is little doubt that there were a number of photographers well placed to take photographs of material events. In addition to the photographers responsible for taking still photographs (discussed below), INQ754, a Bombardier in 42 Battery 22 LADR, was allocated the job of looking after two Army cameramen who were going to take a cine film of part of the march. (C754.1 paragraph 6). He believes that they were positioned on about the third floor of a large derelict building on the south side of William Street (C754.1 paragraph 7). The camera crew set up the cine camera in one of the windows (C754.2 paragraph 8). He says that the camera crew were filming through the window after he had heard a number of shots fired (C754.2 paragraph 14). Neither of these cameramen made a statement to the RMP at the time or to the Widgery Inquiry or to the present Inquiry. Neither the contents nor the existence of the cine film have been disclosed or referred to in any documentation provided to us. However, these cameramen would appear to have been in a position to take cine film which would have been of considerable use to this Inquiry if it had been disclosed.

4.3.15 INQ622 says that he was one of four soldiers who each accompanied a photographer on Bloody Sunday. It was not clear how many, if any, are among the six who have made statements. However, INQ622 was with his photographer at or near the junction of Rossville Street/William Street when he saw paras debus in the waste ground and take up firing positions. (C622.4 paragraphs 25 to 26) He assumed that the photographer been taking photographs. (C622.4 paragraphs 27 to 28 and Day 310/94/11 to Day 310/94/16)

4.3.16. Captain 21 of 22 LADR was directing a photographer (UNK48) on top of the Embassy Ballroom (OP Echo) at a time when he saw paratroopers shooting at the Rubble Barricade and claims to have seen automatic fire coming from the rubble barricade. (B1501 to B1503). During his oral testimony, he said that if he had seen anything indicating the presence of civilian gunmen or bombers or anything of that kind presenting any kind of threat to soldiers he would have directed the photographer to take photographs of it. (Day 317/109/17 to Day 317/110/3). If there had been gunmen in the open in the Rossville Flats area he was in a good position to see them but he did not and saw nothing to justify the firing by soldiers on any civilian in that area. (Day 317/110/4 to Day 317/111/22). The photographer was in the same position.

4.3.17. Capt 028 of the Royal Artillery briefed photographers and visited various locations. He had a camera himself and took some photographs. He was in Rossville St and claims to have seen civilians firing from behind the rubble barricade but produced none of his photographs at the Widgery Tribunal when he gave evidence and he no longer has them. (B1577.3)

4.3.18. In view of this, the most striking feature about the evidence of those Army photographers who have made statements is that none of them recollects photographing anything significant. The following is a summary of their evidence in note form:

(i) INQ 81: Member of 1 Coldstream Guards. Stayed at one barrier all day. Handed over films to one of the Intelligence officers of the Coldstream Guards. Royal Ordnance Corps had a dark room at Ebrington. Did not see the prints. Doesn't remember what barrier he was at.

(ii) INQ 836: Warrant Officer, 22 LADR. Intelligence and Operations Room staff. Unit consisted of 3 men plus photographer. He was photographer that day. Went to Barrier 12. Doesn't remember photographing anything very interesting. Stayed at barrier. Any photographs he took would have been kept on file and handed over to the Regiment that took over from his.

(iii) INQ 863: 22 LADR. Battalion photographer. There were 2 or 3 other photographers in his team, each assigned different positions. Was at barrier 12. UNK48 stationed on the Embassy Ballroom. He has seen a photograph taken by UNK48 from the Embassy Ballroom which shows gas coming from the direction of the Army from behind Barrier 12. Some time after Bloody Sunday he saw photographs taken by UNK48 from Embassy Ballroom of civilians lined up at Kells Walk. He took three films at Barrier 12 but never saw them. He handed them over to an officer from the Brigade. Seven or eight films were taken by other photographers. UNK48 kept one of his films.

(iv) INQ 850: War artist. He was a Company Commander in the RGJ. He had a small Instamatic camera to take photographs for painting. Probably not one of the designated photographers. He has identified himself on BBC news footage. He took photographs only at Barrier 14.

He was beside Col Wilford at Barrier 14 when he (Wilford) radioed that he was "under fire".

(v) INQ 1199: Corporal in 1 RA (Royal Anglians). PR/Military Intelligence photographer, reported to PRO (UNK14 and Intelligence Officer INQ 8) It was up to INQ 8 to decide where he would be deployed. He took a position on Craigavon Bridge. Later moved to city walls, when there was still plenty of day light for photography. Saw injured people but no soldiers. May have taken photographs but saw nothing out of the ordinary. Usually handed photographs in. No knowledge of where they are now.

(vi) INQ1231: Lance Corporal, 2 RGJ. Photographer with Intelligence Section, Battalion HQ. Each battalion had its own photographer. He took photographs in order to obtain intelligence and build up a portfolio of persistent rioters. He was positioned at Barrier 14, took photographs with telephoto and standard lenses. Moved through Barrier 14 some time after Paras went in. Took photographs of arrest operation around 5.00 pm. 10 rolls of film, over 300 photographs. All sent to the Widgery Inquiry. Also prepared intelligence files for the day including information and photographs, and presented it to Intelligence Officer. Completing this kind of file was standard procedure.

(vii) INQ 1970:. 1 Para Intelligence Section (part of TAC HQ). He was the Batallion Photographer after the Intelligence Sergeant Major. Trained in Belfast Telegraph for 2 weeks, trained in covert photographs in HQ Northern Ireland. Generally had responsibility to take arrest photographs. N.B. A Battalion scrap book used to be kept and Intelligence Sergeant kept it up to date with photos. INQ1609 was also was in Intelligence section and became standby photographer. INQ 2139 was also in the Intelligence section. He (INQ 1970) has a photograph of the Intelligence section which he did not produce to Eversheds. All the negatives were filed. He started a filing system in Palace Barracks in the Intelligence section. He kept book of photographs, maybe as many as five copies each. (This is a reference to his general practice rather than to Bloody Sunday photographs in particular.) He was in Derry for Bloody Sunday. He was deployed initially with A Company near the Presbyterian Church. He gave one of his two cameras to them. He then left to get better photographs of the rioters at a barrier. He followed the Intelligence Officer and took photographs. He was not shown the 8 Brigade briefing order for photographs. He took 2 x 36 rolls. He gave them to the Intelligence Officer and they were taken to HQ Northern Ireland for processing. The negatives and prints were all given back to his section after the Widgery Inquiry. He put them into a filing system. INQ1609 was also there and might have taken photographs. In 1974 there was a photographic display about Northern Ireland in the Parachute Regiment Intelligence section at Aldershot. Some of those on display were taken by him on Bloody Sunday. All the books and files stayed in Northern Ireland when the Battalion returned to England. He seems to have been close to Lt N when he was firing at the corner of Eden Place (viii) Soldier 222: Company Quartermaster Sergeant in RMP. Went to Altnagelvin to photograph civilians who had been killed. He did this in the mortuary. He said it was necessary to remove clothing to do this. He took Polaroid instant colour prints. He does not know what has become of the photographs.

(ix) Soldier 223: Company Sergeant Major, Provost Company 1RMP. Went with Soldier 222 to photograph bodies at Altnagelvin. He says he did not touch the bodies. They took full-length photographs but also took photographs of entry and exit wounds where visible. A report was filed to go with the photographs. It was handed to Brigade HQ. The photographs in the EP series are not the ones he took.

4.3.19. In his report, Col. Overbury said that "well over 1000 copies of photographs were produced on demand for the use of the Tribunal and Counsel for the Army" (CO1.7 paragraph 21). In a letter from his solicitors to the Inquiry dated 15th June 2000 it was stated that "Mr Overbury would not disagree with the figure of 1000 different photographs which has been mentioned as the number handed over" (emphasis added). (CO1.278) The statements of the soldiers themselves suggest that hundreds of photographs were taken by them. In the same letter, it was stated that Mr Overbury saw many such photographs taken from the ground and also, he believes, from the air" (CO1.277 to CO1.278) although no soldier has admitted to taking still photographs from the air.

4.3.20 The cine film was taken by Sergeant INQ 2030, who was a Sergeant in the Royal Army Ordnance Corps. He believes he was under the command of Tony Staughton (Day 256/96/5 to Day 256/96/14) but he reported to Colin Wallace, who was his immediate superior. (C2030.1 paragraph 6) He does not know whether he used a Bolex camera (battery-operated, zoom lens,500 ft spool) or a Bell and Howell (clockwork-operated, no zoom lens, 100 ft spool) but he believed it was a Bell and Howell. He believes he was on the left-hand side of a Scout helicopter, not a Sioux, as suggested in the Operation Order. He does not remember the name of the pilot and has only vague impressions of what he filmed. He says he learned over the intercom that shots had been fired and probably after that went from 500 ft to over 1000 ft. He was in the air for at least two and a half hours, possibly three and a half or more (Day 256/129/17 to Day 256/130/9). He probably landed either to refuel or to replace film. (Day 256/131/4) The film was couriered to the Ministry of Defence in London for development. He had to fill in a form and attach it to the package. That is the last he saw of the film. Whenever he took the film he would have entered it into a Job Book but he may not have done that with this particular film. The Job Book was normally sent to the Ministry of Defence once a year but it was sometimes lost. He says the cine film appears to be in three parts: 1. from 500 ft., 2.from 1000 ft (after he had heard that shots had been fired), 3. 1000 ft with the tele photo lens.

4.3.21 There are statements from Major INQ254 and INQ2088, the pilots in the Kangaw Flight with 3 Commando Brigade, Air Squadron. They piloted the two Sioux helicopters in the air on Bloody Sunday. According to INQ 2054, there was no camera in these helicopters. The cine film was probably taken from an Army Air Corps helicopter. (We do not appear to have a statement from this pilot.) Captain INQ 2088 took the first flight from 13.45 until 16.15 and his passenger was Col Welsh. INQ2054's was from 16.15 -17.45 and his observer was Corporal UNK555. His call sign was 61 Delta. Captain INQ2088's was 61 Yankee. He doesn't remember what he saw. He refers to a letter from the Ministry of Defence to the OC Kangaw Flight dated 14th December 1972 requesting a copy of aerial photography for an official history of Northern Ireland because the photographs were "not held by HQNI or HQ8 Infantry Brigade" (C2054.67)

The Cover-up

4.3.22 As appears above, well over 1000 photographs taken by Army photographers were produced and, even before the events of the day, it was the intention to retain them for PR and intelligences purposes. The importance of retaining and cataloguing them became greater when the enormity of the events that had occurred became apparent and even more so when the establishment of the Widgery Inquiry was announced. As appears from the evidence of the photographers themselves, in particular INQ1231 (C1231.3 paragraph 21) and INQ1970, the 1 Para photographer, (C1970.4 paragraph 17) the photographs were often kept and filed in unit Intelligence sections, with possibly as many as five copies of each group of photographs. INQ1970 himself took 2 rolls of film x 36. The negatives and prints were returned to him after the Widgery Tribunal and he personally put them into the filing system. (C1970.8 paragraph 33) INQ1970 said that some of these photographs were part of a photographic display put on by the Parachute Regiment in Aldershot in 1974.

4.3.23 INQ2023 said that in 1973 or in 1974 he saw hundreds of Bloody Sunday Photographs in the Intelligence Section of 1 Para. (C.2023.4 paragraph 21)

4.3.24 Yet, although the Tribunal has made extensive efforts to obtain the Army photographs and cine film, their enquires have met with an almost completely negative response from the Ministry of Defence. The Ministry even failed to provide the name of the photographer who took the cine film and this was only obtained when Mr Scott made a personal visit to Army Headquarters in Northern Ireland (KS1.1 paragraph 66). In addition, when he began calling the specified organisations to arrange inspection visits he "encountered resistance" (letter of 27th July 1999 at KH3.111 paragraph 4).

4.3.25. We do not accept Mr Harding's explanations either for the disappearance of the photographs or for the complete absence of documentation relating thereto.

4.3.26. In his statement, Mr Harding makes the bland assertion that the photographs were probably destroyed after the Widgery Inquiry on the grounds that they were "of no further use" (KH3.6 paragraph 14) and that they were probably of poor quality given "the photographic techniques of the day and the lack of expertise of unit military photographers at the time". (KH3.10 paragraph 26). This is at odds with the evidence summarised above, that the Army photographers were specialist photographers drawn from Intelligence sections of their units. Soldiers are seen in photographs and in actuality footage (e.g. V1/03.05) carrying cameras with telescopic lenses. INQ1970, the 1 Para photographer, had extensive training with the Belfast Telegraph and had a Pentax PRI which he described as "excellent" (C1970.1 paragraph 7). As for the photographic techniques of the day, the photographs taken by press photographers and even amateur photographers such as Mr Tucker (EP28) give the lie to this suggestion.

4.3.27 As for the suggestion that they were probably destroyed on the grounds that they were of no use, the decision whether Army photographs would have been preserved and recorded depended, according to Mr Harding himself, on two factors, namely whether they were of some enduring historical value (KH3.6 paragraph 13) and whether they were of any continuing practical use. (KH3.5 paragraph 11) Photographs of Bloody Sunday should have qualified as being of enduring historical value. As for their continuing practical use, they were of immediate use for the purpose of the Widgery Inquiry and so should have been catalogued and filed for that reason alone, yet we have seen no such records. They were of medium term use in defending court claims. There are no references in photographs in the material dealing with claims (Day 275/18/7 to Day 275/19/22). They were of long term use for intelligence, PR and Operational purposes and indeed may have been entered in classified document registers but they have not been found in such files either. They were certainly more important than arrest photographs once the prosecutions were dropped but the arrest photographs were retained, for reasons that Mr Harding was unable to explain. (Day 275/29/17 to Day 275/30/4).

4.3.28 Quite apart from the obvious flaws in the propositions on which Mr Harding relies, it is simply inconceivable that "well over 1,000 copies of photographs" and original cine film could disappear without trace when (a) they related to one of the most controversial events in modern British political and military history, (b) there had recently been a major public inquiry under the 1921 Act in relation to this event, at which all the photographs had been deliberately concealed from the families, and (c) they were in the possession of Government agencies which as a matter of routine operated bureaucratic systems in order to keep track of just this kind of material.

4.3.29 Whilst acknowledging the time and effort Mr Harding has clearly devoted to the task of searching for photographs, neither the method nor the attitude adopted by him was in our submission appropriate to achieve the task. He was over-eager to offer instant explanations for both the disappearance of the photographs and the absence of records. Apart from the suggestion that photographs may have been of no use and that they were probably of poor quality in any event, he carried out searches in a manner that assumed integrity on the part of the Army branch to which his inquiries were directed. He did not carry out any personal checks on the records of the officers responsible for the collection of photographs or any of the Intelligence sections or of the Assistant Provost Marshall since the normal method of searching is to ask the unit itself to do the search. (Day 275/33/10 to Day 275/33/18) This was the approach adopted even in the case of the Parachute Regiment. Interestingly, the 3rd Battalion of the Parachute Regiment keeps its photographic history in its Intelligence cell (KH3.364), which is consistent with photographers being drawn from the Intelligence sections and with the photographs themselves being recorded in Intelligence files. When asked if he would expect 1 Para to follow the same practice, he agreed that certainly that was the practice in 1972. (Day 275/38/12 to Day 275/38/14) Mr Harding did not in fact receive a reply from 1 Para itself in response to his queries but from Regimental HQ on behalf of the Parachute Regiment (Day 275/38/15 to Day 275/38/19). The letter of 4th September 2002 from the Regimental HQ said that 1 Para holds "no photographic or film records" (KH3.376 paragraph 2(a). It was further explained that 1 Para's scrapbooks were passed to the Regimental museum in 1998. This did not strike Mr Harding as suspicious (Day 275/38/20 to Day 275/40/13) even though this was the year the Inquiry was set up. It did not occur to him that, if there had been any photographs left in 1 Para's possession, the incriminating photographs might have been moved in 1998 and only the residue sent to the Regimental museum. (Day 275/40/14 to Day 275/40/18)

4.3.30 When it was suggested that this was because he had never entertained the possibility that the Army could suppress incriminating material he said: "That is correct. I do not believe the Army has suppressed material from 1972". (Day 275/40/22 to Day 275/4023) When given the chance to reconsider and change this answer if did not reflect his real view, he did not take the opportunity to do so but simply said: "I am not prepared to speculate". (Day 275/40/29 to Day 275/41/19). As we know, there were 10 photographers from 7 different regiments. Yet the Tribunal's inquiries of all these regiments and their museums has led to a "nil return", apart from some irrelevant photographs found at the Parachute Regiment's museum. This displays either that, quite independently of each other, each of these 7 different regiments operates a very efficient system of destroying every last photograph in its possession about an event which must have been one of the most significant in its recent regimental history or that, alternatively and in our view more plausibly, there has been a deliberate, concerted policy of withholding damaging material from the Inquiry.

4.3.31. During the course of his testimony, Mr Harding said that the "audit trail goes cold in 1972" (Day 275/16/17 to Day 275/17/8). In fact, as Mr Harding conceded, he did not find any audit trail at all. (Day 275/17/12 to Day 275/17/14) There is no documentary material in any Government department or public agency indicating the whereabouts or fate of the photographs.

4.3.32 Indeed, Mr Harding claims to have drawn his conclusion that the photographs could not have been regarded as terribly important from the fact that, had the material been of value to ascertain the events of January 1972, he "would have expected to find them among the material archived by the Widgery Tribunal itself" (Day 275/17/15 to Day 275/17/21). This tends to suggest that the Army photographs were not even produced to the Widgery Tribunal. Mr Smith, Secretary to the Widgery Tribunal, was unable to say whether the photographs were provided to the Tribunal and could throw no light on the existence of the photographs (Day 239/30/21 to Day 239/32/15). David Dewick, the Assistant Secretary to the Tribunal, "cannot recall seeing photographs of any kind during the Inquiry." He suggested that as they would have been evidence to the Tribunal they would have gone to the Legal teams rather than have passed through the general office. He would also have expected the Legal team to keep logs of the photographs since it was certainly not his job to do that. (KD5.5 paragraph 25) To the best of his knowledge, he never saw any Army photographs. (Day 270/30/23 to Day 270/31/1

4.3.33. Sir Basil Hall was the Solicitor to the Tribunal and therefore head of one of the Legal teams referred to by Mr Dewick. When he was asked whether any of the Army photographs were made available to the Widgery Inquiry, his reply was "not that I know of" (Day 250/74/23).

4.3.34 Sir Basil says that Mr Huggins was "responsible for various administrative matters associated with the collation of evidence" and "looked after the filing and distribution of all papers received by the Inquiry". (KH2.2 paragraph 6).

Nor does Sir Basil recollect seeing the Operation Order about photographs. (Day 250/73/16 to Day 250/73/17). When asked why he did not make any inquiry of the soldiers as to what happened to the photographs produced on foot of the Operation Order, he said that if he had seen the Operation Order it would certainly have been his duty to try to obtain the photographs so he either failed in his duty or he did not see the Operation Order. (Day 250/76/22 to Day 250/77/19) In his statement, David Huggins agrees that he was mainly responsible for the handling and recording of documents although he did not see or handle all the documents before the Tribunal. (KH10.2 paragraph 3) So far as he can recollect, he did not see any photographs which may have been supplied by the Army. (KH10.2 paragraph 4) If the photographs were before the Tribunal, he would be surprised if there were no records of them somewhere. (KH10.2 paragraph 5) 4.3.35. Sir Basil Hall's deputy, John Heritage, cannot recall seeing any Army photographs other than the aerial photographs at EP21.1 to EP21.8. (KH6.15 paragraph 1). He does not recall seeing any Operation Order about photographs or anything about photographs (Day 251/98/7).

4.3.36 Roger Munrow, a Senior Legal Assistant who was a member of Sir Basil Hall's team, was mainly responsible for taking statements from journalists and priests (KM8.1 paragrpah 3). He too makes no reference to seeing Army photographs. Michael Hirst was the most junior legal member of the team. Although he saw photographs of scenes in Derry on Bloody Sunday he cannot remember whether they were press photographs. (KH7.2)

4.3.37. It appears that the surviving Counsel for the Army and for the Widgery Inquiry have not been asked about the photographs and film.

4.3.38. As Legal Advisor to the Army Team and the person who was effectively in charge of that team, Lt Col Overbury should also have been able to answer at least some of the questions about the contents, distribution, cataloguing and whereabouts of the Army photographs and film. It was he who prepared the Army Tribunal Team's report of the Inquiry, which referred to the photographs having been produced and made the point "that the evidential effect of photographs in support of a case cannot be over emphasised". In this connection he said that

> "a single photograph of a gunman or nail bomber would have gone a long way to proving the case of the Army" (CO1.67 paragraph 30)

As pointed out above, he said that over 1000 copies of photographs were produced on demand for the use of the Tribunal and Counsel for the Army. (CO1.66 paragraph 21) Col Overbury's evidence about the photographs was extremely unsatisfactory. In a letter written on his behalf by his solicitors on 15th June 2000 (CO1.277), it was stated that Mr Overbury saw many Army photographs taken from the ground and also, he believes, from the air. He said he could not disagree with the figure of 1000 different Army photographs. In his Eversheds statement made in November 2002, he said that he saw a large number of the Army photographs (CO1.51 paragraph 69).

4.3.39 When he came to give evidence before the Tribunal on Day 243, he said he couldn't remember whether these were different photographs or 1000 copies of what may be a considerably lesser number of images. (Day 243/68/19 to Day 243/69/13) When asked whether there was a large number of Army photographs that did not reach the Tribunal and, if there were what they showed, he said he could not help the Tribunal at all on that. (Day 243/70/21 to Day 243/70/25). He said that he did not actually have the physical control or possession of documents or photographs, most of which were held by the DAPM (Day 243/70/25 to Day 243/71/8). When asked whether he did remember that he had seen Army photographs that were shot both from the ground and in the air, he said: "My recollection is that I did". (Day 243/170/14 to Day 243/170/19). He initially said that he did not think that he had seen photographs taken from the air on Bloody Sunday (Day 243/172/6 to Day 243/172/10) but then said he believed he did see such photographs although he couldn't recall what they showed (Day 243/172/25 to Day 243/173/10) When it was pointed out that he had said that the photographs did not show anything that helped the Army, he said that is what he was told and then suggested that, as far as he knew, he did not look at the photographs at all. Then he said that he did not know how many photographs he looked at (Day 243/175/20 to Day 243/176/8). He said that aspect of the case was the responsibility of the DAPM (Day 243/177/2 to Day 243/177/3) and we were told on Day 256/157/7 to Day 256/157/12 that this DAPM was INQ1898 (as opposed to INQ3). When asked if it could be the case that the Army did not provide the Army photographs to the Widgery Tribunal, he said he had no knowledge of that (Day 243/179/16 to Day 243/179/18). When asked by the Chairman who would actually have handed over things like statements or anything else to the Inquiry, he said that the DAPM, i.e. INQ1898, would have done that (Day 243/180/2 to Day 243/180/8), he told the Chairman that he was not able to help the Tribunal as to whether or not any of the Army photographs were actually sent to the Widgery Inquiry (Day 243/180/22 to Day 243/180/25) He said that it was possible that the Army photographs were never supplied to the Tribunal (Day 243/181/3 to Day 243/181/5).

4.3.40 Major INQ1872, who was Col Overbury's assistant, said he did not remember dealing with photographs at all. Certainly he had nothing to do with keeping track of them. He did not even remember seeing photographs taken by Army photographers. (Day 252/79/7 to Day 252/81/1)

4.3.41 In his statement INQ1898, the DAPM who, according to Col. Overbury, had responsibility for the photographs, says:

> "I would not have had control over any photographs and they would not have been handed to me for (sic) me for the simple reason that I did not have an office or cupboard space in which they could be stored". (C1898.5 paragraph 15)

Whether or not this is regarded as a convincing explanation, this is another witness who is anxious to deny any responsibility for or knowledge of the photographs. Lt Col. Overbury having pointed the finger of responsibility at INQ 1898, he in turn then pointed the finger of responsibility at the Assistant Provost Marshall who, he said, "would have had overall responsibility for collecting the photographs as evidence." (C1898.5 paragraph 13). The Assistant Provost Marshall was Lt Col. (now Brigadier) INQ1383. He was head of the RMP in Northern Ireland. (Day 304/144/16 to Day 304/144/17). Needless to say, he too denied ever seeing any Army photographs of Bloody Sunday or having any idea what had happened to them (Day 304/121/7 to Day 304/121/11). When pressed about this, he insisted that he had "absolutely no idea that these photographs even existed" (Day 304/183/13 to Day 304/183/17). Therefore, as far as the two most senior officers responsible for the collection, preservation, and presentation of evidence are concerned, the Tribunal is expected to believe that even the very existence of the Army photographs has been erased from their memories. The upshot is that, with regard to their enquiry into the whereabouts of these photographs, the Tribunal has been completely "stonewalled" by the Army.

4.3.42 Colin Wallace did admit to seeing Army photographs. He would not make a guess at the number but there were certainly a lot and thought that the figure of well over 1000 different Army photographs was reasonable. (Day 238/64/4) He agreed that these photographs could not have been handled or processed in any way without there being a comprehensive cataloguing index system and that the Tribunal could be assured that there was such a system. (Day 238/64/8 to Day 238/64/16) He found it hard to believe that all the Army photographs had disappeared. He also believed that at the end of the

Widgery Tribunal all the material produced by the relevant groups was archived (Day 238/66/1 to Day 238/66/4)

4.3.43 In summary, therefore, apart from Mr Wallace, all those involved in the Widgery Tribunal, both in the Tribunal's team and the Army's team, have distanced themselves from the Army photographs. They claimed to have no memory of what they showed or what became of them. This is simply not credible. We note that the photographs were never made available to the families and the evidence would now suggest that they were not even made available to the Widgery Tribunal. Bearing in mind the sympathy which Lord Widgery exhibited towards the Army, this is one of the clearest pointers that the Army photographs must have not only failed to assist the Army's case but seriously damaged its case. Indeed, the mere fact that nothing could be found in well over 1000 different photographs taken by soldiers to assist the Army is itself seriously detrimental to the Army case. Clearly, there was nothing in any of that vast number of images that supported even the suspicion of conduct on the part of the civilians which would have warranted live shooting by the Army.

4.3.44 If the Tribunal had been provided with the Photo Coverage Order, it is likely that an enquiry would have been made about the photographs taken by soldiers in accordance with the Order. The fact that no such enquiry appears to have been made would suggest that the Army's team was so concerned about disclosing the existence of the photographs that it even concealed the existence of the Photo Coverage Order.

4.3.45 In other words, suppression of the evidence concerning Army photographs began as soon as the Widgery Inquiry was announced. Whether or not the photographs were indeed destroyed or have simply been concealed from this Tribunal, there can be little doubt that their contents, existence and whereabouts have been deliberately suppressed by or on behalf of the Army in order to deprive anyone outside the Army of incontrovertible evidence of discreditable conduct on the part of the Army.

4.3.46 The Tribunal has sought expert evidence on the question whether the heli-tele cine film taken by INQ2030 was edited. Mr R J Butler examined the cine film from which the VHS recording (Video No.3, HO219 / Item 46) was made. He found the cine film to be a 16 mm positive print from a negative original. The cine positive is identical in content to the video. He found no indication on the positive print of a splice on the negative from which it was made. He is satisfied that the positive print is "complete and unedited and that the negative from which the 16 mm positive print was made was unedited". (E5.5 paragraphs 20 to 22) Mr Adrian Williams also examined the positive print. The printed edge numbers (from the negative onto the positive) were continuous through the length of the reel indicating, in his opinion, that the material had not been cut. In his opinion, the footage had not been edited. (M99.2 at paragraphs 11 to 14)

4.3.47 The Tribunal refused our request to instruct our own expert in film or video tape to enable us properly to evaluate and challenge this evidence. See our letter of 9th January 2002. As a result, we are at a marked disadvantage vis-a-vis the soldiers' representatives. It would appear that they do have the benefit of advice and guidance from a photographic expert. This is apparent from the nature of the questions forwarded by the Treasury Solicitor for Mr Butler's consideration. At question 8(b), the Treasury Solicitor asked what processes were applied to the image in question, "giving details of both the software functions applied (such as, for example, deblurring, contrast corrections etc.) and the effect of such operations upon the image". Not only are we unfamiliar with deblurring and contrast corrections but we have no idea what other processes would be incorporated by the term "etc." The Treasury Solicitor was also conscious of problems that could arise where images are taken from video tape since he asked whether account was taken of "image interlacing".

We doubt if this question was raised by a lay person. Basic fairness, not to mention the principle of equality of arms, required that if a photographic expert could be made available to the soldiers' representatives out of public funds then the same facility should have been made available to the families' representatives.

4.3.48 With regard to the instruction to Mr Butler to examine the cine film for "both contents and authenticity" (E5.2 paragraph 2), we have great difficulty accepting the validity of either Mr Butler's conclusions or those of Mr Williams

4.3.49 First, like the Peer Review Panel, we note that in paragraph 6 of his Report Mr Butler says that "all conclusions are based on examination of the original material using laboratory video and imaging equipment" but none of the material originally received by Mr Butler was truly "original". As he notes himself elsewhere, the cine film from which the VHS recording was made was itself no more than a positive print from a negative original.

4.3.50 Secondly, he makes no attempt to explain the extent to which or the manner in which it is possible to detect on a positive print the presence or absence of a splice on the negative from which it was made.

4.3.51 Thirdly, he says in paragraph 19 of his original report that all but one of the apparent edits are consistent with being created within the cine-camera that recorded the original material without explaining how he comes to this conclusion.

4.3.52 Fourthly, neither Mr Butler nor Mr Williams made any attempt to relate the film to the statements of relevant witnesses. In fairness to both, some of this evidence may not have been available at the time they carried out their examinations but, for whatever reason, their reports do not take account of or attempt to explain this evidence.

4.3.53 In particular, as appears above, INQ2030 believed he used a Bell and Howell camera with a 100 ft. spool whereas the copy the Tribunal has is 135 ft long. It also appears from the photo coverage order and from INQ2030's testimony that there were two or more different spools of film. Neither of the experts comments on whether the film was shot with a telephoto or zoom lens or had other features indicating whether it was shot with a Bolex camera (battery-operated, zoom lens, 500 ft spool) or a Bell and Howell camera (clockwork-operated, no zoom lens, 100 ft spool). Nor do the experts comment on the fact that the copy film deposited with the Public Record Office was 200 ft. (KD5.25), not 135 ft. INQ2030 himself believed that some of the film appeared to be missing. (Day 256/134/9). In this connection, Mr Colin Wallace (KW2.19 paragraph 98) raised the query whether the film follows a correct chronological sequence in that there are shots of what appears to be a relatively calm crowd at Free Derry Corner after the Army had been deployed in Rossville Flats car park. In fact, the crowd scene to which Mr Wallace seems to be referring appears on the film approximately 40 seconds after soldiers are seen to debus on the waste ground at Rossville Street and discharge at least two baton rounds. We also know from the evidence of Mr Robert White (combined with other evidence) that shots were probably fired by one or more members of the Anti-Tank Platoon in a southerly direction along Rossville Street (i.e. towards Free Derry Corner) possibly less than a minute after the two lead Army personnel carriers were photographed by him on Rossville Street (i.e. before they reached the waste ground).

4.3.54 According to Mr Wallace, the film should have been brought back directly to him personally but the orders were changed at some time during the afternoon and was sent direct to London. (Day 238/75/24 to Day 238/75/25). INQ2030 told Mr Wallace that he had been instructed to hand the film over. Such an order must have been given by someone more senior that a Colonel (Day 238/79/20 to Day 238/80/19). The decision to intercept the film was "highly irregular" (Day 238/81/7 to Day 238/81/14). Mr Wallace's expectation was that INQ2030 would have had several rolls of film of the events of Bloody Sunday and that his main task would have been to film the separation between the marchers and the rioters (Day 238/82/24 to Day 238/82/25). Each individual roll of film should have been 20 minutes long and the fact that the Tribunal only have one roll which is 3 minutes 33 seconds long was "very odd" (Day 238/83/12) Mr Wallace believed at the time that the film he saw was "obviously a cut version" (Day 23885/9) The Army did not have facilities to edit cine film in HQNI but he believed that the MOD could have done it quite easily in England. (Day 238/81/19 to Day 238/81/21)

4.3.55 In this connection, there is a minute written by Major General INQ 2144 (the DPS) at KH3.37 which records: "some PR film had been taken from a helicopter at the height of the engagement and I was asked to bring it to the UK for security processing. I handed this over to PR5 at London Airport at 21.30 hrs. One copy is to go back to NI and one to ALS2 for Treasury Solicitor". (Emphasis added.) The Tribunal has not been told what "security processing" meant or why it was necessary for a Major General to take the cine film to England at all. As of 24th May 1972, it was believed that the original film was held by Mr David Dewick (KH3.51).

4.3.56 In all these circumstances, the reports of both Mr Butler and Mr Williams are incomplete and their conclusions unconvincing.

4.3.57 With regard to the RUC photographs and films, Sergeant Penny said that 3 RUC photographers were briefed (JP7.1) We have sets of still photographs from Constable Simpson (EP5) and Constable Brown (EP4) Sergeant Penny himself took 3 x100' rolls of cine film (Mr Scott's statement, KS 1.16 paragraph 70), none of which has been produced. As appears from the Inquiry's report of 22 April 2002 summarising its searches for photographs, the Inquiry's own staff searched the RUC's photographic archive without success, apart from the negatives at P3/233.64-66. The RUC has said that no one can throw any light on the whereabouts of the cine film.

4.3.58 It is on the basis of this evidence that we say the submissions set out above are well founded.

4.4. Role of the MOD

Introduction and Summary of Submissions

4.4.1 As the Department of Government responsible for the Army, the MOD is the custodian of the vast bulk of material concerning Bloody Sunday. Recognising this, the Government established the Bloody Sunday Inquiry Unit. We readily acknowledge that their task was onerous and that many of their staff have clearly applied themselves to this task with commendable diligence.

4.4.2 However, as appears from our submissions in relation to the Information Policy Unit/Psyops and Missing Army Photographs, we are not satisfied that all relevant material has been disclosed. With regard to other categories of documentation, it is our submission that:

(i) in view of the evidence of the suppression of Army photographs, Psyops material and Intelligence material, it is likely that other relevant documentation has also been deliberately destroyed, concealed or otherwise withheld from the Inquiry; and

(ii) whether as a result of genuine oversight or of unsatisfactory search methods, the MOD has also failed to disclose all relevant documentation in their possession and failed to make disclosure of all relevant documentation in a timely manner or at all.

4.4.3 The first submission arises by inference from the submissions made in the sections concerning Missing Army Photographs, Information Policy/Psyops and Intelligence Agencies. The second submission is founded primarily on our experiences of receiving late disclosure of documentation, sometimes after relevant witnesses have been called.

Major Loden's Shot List

4.4.4 In his testimony to the Widgery Tribunal Major Loden said:

> " As soon as I got back to Clarence Avenue I personally interviewed all the soldiers who had fired (Support Company). I made them tell exactly where they were when they fired, what they fired at, and also they told me the grid references as far as they could on the map I had with me, of where their targets were". (B2259D and see also B2283.8 paragraph 22)

4.4.5 The list of "engagements," including grid references, is set out at B2214 and his Diary of Operations appears at B2211. It was originally suggested that the Diary and List were typed up from Major Loden's notes. However, during the course of his testimony, the MOD produced a hand written list and a hand written draft statement signed by Major Loden but which was apparently in the hand writing of Captain Michael Jackson, the 1 Para Adjutant (B2214.1 to 2214.5). This was of major significance, throwing new light on the testimony of both Major Loden and Captain Jackson. The explanation given in a letter from Mr Jeremy Williams of the BSIU was that it had not been disclosed earlier as a result of a simple oversight. Whether or not this is correct, and we have no reason to doubt Mr Williams' good faith since it was he who brought it to the Tribunal's attention, this episode indicated that, at the very least, there was an alarming degree of sloppiness in the practices and procedures applied by the MOD when making available to the Tribunal material that was available to itself. Insofar as it reflects the MOD's assessment of relevance, it is alarming in the extreme that this would not have been regarded by the MOD as of obvious relevance.

4.4.6 This episode alone supports the submission that, even in the absence of bad faith, the MOD could not be trusted either to identify all the documentation in its possession that was relevant or to ensure that all the documentation identified as relevant was in fact provided to the Tribunal.

4.5 Intelligence Agencies

Introduction and summary of submissions

4.5.1 We use the term "Intelligence Agencies" in the broadest sense to include all those agencies apart from the MOD/Army that were and are concerned with the provision of Intelligence documentation concerning Bloody Sunday. The main agency in this regard is the Security Service (MI5), which comes under the aegis of the Home Secretary. However, it is common case that both the Secret Intelligence Service (MI6) and the Information Research Department of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office played a role in the affairs of Northern Ireland in 1972, so that they also have a responsibility to disclose relevant material in their possession.

4.5.2. Since 1998 the Tribunal has been requesting the Government to make full disclosure of all documentation relevant to Bloody Sunday. Some of these requests have been directed specifically at the Security Service and the Secret Intelligence Service. The Tribunal has been assured on more than one occasion that all relevant documentation has been supplied and when we have sought to challenge this we have been referred to the Government's assurances. For example, in a letter of 7th December 2000 from the Deputy Treasury Solicitor on behalf of the Security Service to Mr Tate, it was stated that "the files of all the Service's human sources on Irish Republican terrorism around that time [Bloody Sunday] have been searched and all material identified as relevant to the Inquiry (reporting from Infliction and Observer B) has either already been made available or is the subject of a Public Interest Immunity (PII) application" (page 3). It was also stated in the same letter that from the early 1970's until the early 1990's the Service's policy was not to destroy files on individuals of intelligence value, which were retained either on paper or on film.

4.5.3 The appearance of a substantial quantity of additional material since then, much of it as late as 2003, when the Inquiry had been in existence for nearly five years indicates, at the very least, a failure on the part of the Security Service to conduct an adequate search of its archives. The contents of some of the documentation provided, especially in respect of Observer C, suggests that (a) at least some of this documentation was deliberately withheld because it was damaging to the soldiers' case and (b) there must be further documentation which has still not been disclosed. The evidence of Martin Ingram points to the same conclusion.

Martin Ingram

4.5.4 Martin Ingram said that he had access to and saw "hundreds" of documents relating to Bloody Sunday (KI2.40 paragraph 3).

4.5.5 Relevant documents which Ingram saw (and in one case wrote) but which have not been made available to the Tribunal include:

(i) documents that give details of Martin McGuinness' movements indicating that he had been the subject of surveillance during the day of the march (statement dated 26th July 2002, KI2.3 paragraph 8);

(ii) documents recording intelligence received prior to the march from both Official and Provisional IRA agents that there was no intention to undertake military activity during the march (ibid);

(iii) documents indicating that there were no shots fired at the troops prior to the troops opening fire (ibid),

(iv) relevant MOD F102 and MOD F24 forms (ibid, KI2.5 paragraph 11);

(v) the written report on the Bloody Sunday material prepared by Ingram for an unnamed Major at 121 Intelligence Section, HQNI which Ingram expects still to be in existence (statement dated 17th March 2003, KI2.40 paragraph 2) and

(vi) the document recording the debriefing of Frank Hegarty, KI2.40 paragraph 5.

4.5.6. He says that "all original intelligence documents are relevant and in my experience are never destroyed" (KI2.42 paragraph 12). This material should therefore still be available.

Observer B

4.5.7 In March 2000, we were provided with a statement by Observer B to the effect that, among other things, he had witnessed the drilling of IRA Auxiliaries at Rossville Flats in the week leading up to Bloody Sunday. He contended that from his own observations and from speaking to other persons he formed the view that these Auxiliaries were practising an ambush on soldiers on Bloody Sunday. He claimed to have telephoned his handlers on 25, 26 and 27 January to give them this information. He claimed to have telephoned one of his handlers again on the day after Bloody Sunday with further information about how several men had been seen running from Rossville Flats after the shooting started and that they loaded two Thompson sub-machine guns, a rifle and a pistol into a car before driving off.

4.5.8 He claimed that some of his evidence was corroborated by contemporaneous documents attached to the statement. Six documents were attached to the statement, all referring in different ways to the movement and use of firearms by the IRA and/or civilians. In fact, only three of these documents had been referred to by Observer B in his statement, the origins of the others being unexplained. Nor did they correspond with the details given in Observer B's statement but they were sufficient to give the impression of IRA activity, availability of firearms and civilian firing on or about the time of Bloody Sunday. In other words the Security Service was seeking to bolster Observer B's account by the selective provision of misleading documentation.

4.5.9 Attached to Julian's statement of 19th June 2002 (KJ4.7) are Notes for Files, Source Sheets and Reports of the kind that we knew must have existed but which had not previously been supplied. These record in detail and in a systematic fashion some of the information provided by Observer B but, significantly, there was no such documentation concerning Bloody Sunday in the new material. (ibid) If it wasn't already obvious, it became clear that such documentation must still exist and that the documentation attached to Observer B's statement was not the only material that was generated in respect of him.

4.5.10 In June 2002, the Inquiry came across the signal from David in the files of the Police Service for Northern Ireland. As a result of requests made by the Inquiry, the Security Service, in or about March 2003, produced a substantial bundle of additional documents concerning Observer C. Even though the contents of the signal document did not correspond with the information Observer B claimed to have provided, the impression which, by silence, the Security Service had allowed to be created and/or maintained was that this signal had been based on information supplied by Observer B, who had of course "pinpointed just about everything they knew about Derry" according to James (KJ2.1 paragraph 5). With the production of the additional material in March 2003, it immediately became apparent that the signal was based on information allegedly supplied by Observer C.

4.5.11. When the documents relating to Observer C were first produced, exhibited to Julian's 4th statement (KJ4.30) it became apparent that certain of them at least must have been in the Security Service file from which certain of the documents attached to Observer B's statement had been extracted. In other words, whoever examined the file for the purpose of extracting material in relation to Observer B must have known that there was also material in relation to Observer C and that this was directly relevant to the issues before the Tribunal. Indeed, even a cursory examination of those Observer C documents would have made it clear that they impacted on the accounts given by James, Julian and David.

4.5.12. When collated, it was clear that the documents formed a sequence, as follows:

(i) Document K (KJ4.75)- from the Observer C Bundle attached to Julian's 4th statement. This document is telegram number 22 of 31st January 1972. (Incidentally, there is a reference in this document to a Special Branch report graded by them "B3". In his oral testimony Julian claimed not to know what this meant even though it was directed to him. He adhered to this answer even when questioned about it by the Chairman: Day 325/104/16 to Day 325/104/18 and Day 325/106/18 to Day 325/107/11)

(ii) Document L (KJ4.77)- from the Observer C Bundle. This is a note for file that refers to document K.

(iii) Document 3 (K02.11)- from the Observer B bundle. This document starts off: "Following for Julian from Director of Intelligence Northern Ireland. Reference my telegram 22 of 21st January." It is accepted that this is a mistake and is a reference to the telegram of 31st January, i.e. document K. In order to understand this document (document 3), it would have been necessary to have sight of the first document (document K), which is the telegram to which it refers. Julian agreed with this. (Day 325/109/13 to Day 325/109/20) He also agreed that anybody reading document 3 would need to have in the file the previous documents to which it relates, namely documents K and L and that there would be a file with the relevant documents. (Day 325/110/25 to Day 325/111/5) However, when document 3 was provided to the Tribunal, it was not provided with documents K or L. In our submission, document 3 must have been extracted from a file and documents K and L, which must have been in the same file, were withheld deliberately. The source referred to in document K was not B but C (per Julian, Day 325/112/23 to Day 325/112/25). Julian could not think of a valid reason why the first two documents in the sequence, in this file, as they must have been, would have been withheld (Day 325/113/18 to Day 325/113/21) but, in our submission, the object was to conceal the existence of Observer C.

(iv) Document 4 (KO2.12)- from the Observer B bundle, although it was not referred to by Observer B.

(v) Document 1 (KO2.9) - from the Observer B bundle

(vi) Note for file dated 4th February (KM10.4) - attached to Officer M's statement. This was not attached to Observer B's statement although it did relate to him. The reason, we suspect, is that even though it was the record of the first meeting with Observer B after Bloody Sunday, it makes no reference to B seeing auxiliaries drilling during the week leading up to the march. It is also another document that refers to the "distribution" of arms rather then the loading of arms.

(vii) Document 2 (KO2.10) - this refers to document 4.

(viii) Note dated 29th February (KJ4.90) - from the Observer C bundle. As Julian agreed (Day 325/118/13), this document seems to refer to document 4, an Observer B document. At the foot of this document there is a note: "Source is reliable. This is a different source to the original one." (KJ4.90). As Julian pointed out (Day 325/118/19), both Observer B and Observer C appear to have reported on the van. This cross-referencing would suggest that this document and document 4 were probably in the same file but, again, it was not supplied to the Tribunal at the same time as document 4. Julian said that he could not answer for that (Day 325/119/6 to Day 325/119/7) but no one else from the Security Service volunteered to explain how one file was apparently filleted in order to extract certain material in relation to Observer B while withholding other material to which it related and about which three of their former members had made statements.

Observer C

4.5.13 The very existence of two additional informants/ agents (Observers C and D) was concealed from the Inquiry. Apart from the obvious relevance to Bloody Sunday of the documentation concerning these informants, the very fact that this documentation runs to "several volumes of files" (per Julian's statement dated 21st March 2003, KJ4.30 paragraph 1) makes it difficult to accept that this material could have been overlooked. In his oral testimony, he said that there could have been about 20 files each containing something like 80 documents (Day 326/26/22 to Day 326/27/15). Even if the current Security Service staff had somehow contrived to miss this store of material during their searches, there can be no excuse for Julian. When he was first asked in his statement about Observer B, his first thought must have been that Observer B was only an occasional visitor to Derry whereas Observer C was their main agent there.

4.5.14 The reasons why Julian and the Security Service would have wanted to conceal the existence of Observers C and D are obvious. Although anyone familiar with the Republican movement in Derry would have known that Observer C's understanding was limited in the extreme, he was regarded by Julian as a very reliable agent whose reporting was judged of sufficient merit to be shown to the Prime Minister on one occasion. In the weeks prior to Bloody Sunday, he produced a series of reports about plans for civil unrest and the IRA's activities in Derry. He was regarded as a very accurate observer of events around him and was apparently a member of community groups such as the Londonderry Tenants Association. (KJ4.32 paragraph 5).

4.5.15 On the day after Bloody Sunday, the Director of Intelligence (David) asked Julian to task Observer C to obtain information about what happened on Bloody Sunday (KJ4.38 paragraph 18 and Document K at KJ4.75).

Observer C was tasked accordingly (see Document L at KJ4.48). Julian states: "I cannot recall whether Observer C ever did report in response to this tasking: I have found nothing on his file to indicate that he did."(KJ4.39 paragraph 19)

4.5.16 The documentation indicates that Observer C was in regular contact with his handlers during the period immediately before and immediately after Bloody Sunday but there is no documentation containing any information from Observer C about what happened on Bloody Sunday. Given the intensity of his contact with his handlers around the material time, it seems unlikely that he did not respond at all. If he had provided information that supported the Army's account of events, it is likely that this would not only have been retained in the original source reports but passed on in documentary form to other interested agencies, including 8 Brigade, HQNI, the Army's Legal Team at Widgery, Army Information Service and Special Branch. No such material or even the suggestion of the existence of such material has surfaced in any of the documentation of which we are aware.

4.5.17 The more likely explanation is that Observer C's report contradicted the Army's account of events and the relevant source reports have either been excised from Security Service records or have been withheld from the Inquiry.

4.5.18 Also, Document T (KJ4.101) is a telegram dated 4th December 1972 confirming that it had been routine procedure for at least the previous year for Observer C's case officer to "brief orally the Commander of 8th Brigade on the agent's intelligence". It was not suggested by Brigadier MacLellan that at any time after Bloody Sunday he ever received any intelligence of a kind that would indicate that Observer C passed on any information confirming the Army's account of events.

The Signal from David

4.5.19 The Signal from David was not disclosed by the Security Service or the MOD. It was found by Counsel to the Inquiry in the files of the PSNI in June 2002. A copy of the signal was then sent to the Security Service and the MOD. The Inquiry was told that neither body was able to locate either the signal or the material relating to it. (Day 319 p.18). The copy found in the PSNI files was stored on microfilm, a facility clearly available both to the MOD and the Security Service. This is yet another failure for which it is difficult to accept an innocent explanation

4.5.20 The Security Service successfully applied to conceal in their entirety the further statement from Officer A dated 26th February 2003 and the 37 accompanying documents giving further detailed information regarding Infliction's reliability. In the absence of even a redacted version of this material, we are unable to make meaningful submissions about the quality of this material or the delay in providing it.

4.5.21 However, we note that Officer A did not refer to any of the 37 documents in his original statement (KA2.1 to KA2.4) and since he contended in that statement that Infliction was a reliable agent we find it difficult to accept the suggestion at paragraph 7 of the Skeleton Argument supplied in support of it's PII application that it was not the Security Service's purpose in providing this additional statement and documentation to seek to persuade the Tribunal that information originating from Infliction is or is not credible.

4.5.22 As for the Security Service's contention that it was concerned only to respond to the Tribunal's request for assistance in the form of further information held in the Service's files, it is difficult to understand why it did not provide the same documentation in response to the Tribunal's original request for assistance.

4.5.23 Nor do we accept that "by its very nature, material addressing the reliability of Infliction's reporting as an agent has the potential to lead to the identification of Infliction".

4.5.24 References to Infliction's grading in the documentation supplied to us were deleted. According to Annie Machon, Infliction was known to be unreliable and files concerning him noted expressly that his reliability was being assessed (KM12.1 paragraph 7). We were supplied with no documentation to this effect although we recognise that this may have been provided to the Tribunal.

4.5.25 According to Officer N, evaluations of agents would take place "regularly, normally at least once a year" (KN1.1 paragraph 5) and this would lead to a report which would include a "recommendation as to the reliability, security and requirement issues concerning the maintenance of the agent relationship". These evaluations would normally include details of the numbers and grading of the agents reporting. None of these evaluations, reports or other such documents was made available to us.

4.6 RUC / PSNI

Introduction and Summary of Submissions

4.6.1 The role of the Police Service in Northern Ireland in the provision of evidence to the Inquiry is of much less significance than the role of other State agencies, for the obvious reason that the Police were relegated to a subordinate role on Bloody Sunday.

4.6.2 We are not in a position to comment on the degree to which the Police Service of Northern Ireland has co-operated with the Inquiry. It has certainly provided some important information, for example in connection with Arrests, Communications and Intelligence both before and after the event. However, the following are examples of areas in respect of which, in our submission, disclosure by the PSNI has been unsatisfactory and, in the field of Intelligence assessments, suspiciously incomplete.

Photographs

4.6.3 We refer to Section 4.3 concerning missing photographs and cine film. It may be that, by virtue of their deployment, RUC officers were not in a position to take photographs or cine film that would have thrown much light on events in the Bogside. Nevertheless, it is a matter of concern that none of the cine film and not all of the photographs have been discovered. We have received no explanation for the failure to discover this material.

Intelligence Material

4.6.4 The Signal from David dated 27th January 1972 (KJ4.45) was provided not by the MOD but by the PSNI. The circumstances in which it came to be found suggest that the PSNI had searched their own archives and reviewed their material in a distinctly casual fashion.

4.6.5 As was explained by Christopher Clarke QC (Day 319/18/22 to Day 319/20/19) the signal was located in June 2002 in the files of the PSNI. In a letter to the parties dated 11th September 2002, the Inquiry explained that Junior Counsel to the Inquiry had come across the signal and covering letter on a micro-film in the possession of the PSNI. The PSNI held two microfilms containing information relating to Bloody Sunday. One was made available in 1999 and it was apparently believed that that was the only film that existed. However, in June 2002, Junior Counsel to the Inquiry was invited to view the contents of the film and on viewing it she realised that it was not the same film as that originally made available. The signal was on this second microfilm.

4.6.6 It would appear from the circumstances in which the signal was discovered that the PSNI were not seeking to conceal the second microfilm. Nevertheless, it is surprising that when there were only two microfilms containing relevant information only one was forwarded to the Inquiry. At the very least, this failure indicates a careless attitude and haphazard method. We do not know what steps have been taken by the PSNI to uncover all relevant material. It is therefore difficult to comment extensively on the PSNI's approach to this matter.

Special Branch Assessments

4.6.7. The RUC Special Branch prepared assessments on a weekly basis. An example of the form which these assessments took appears at G64.380 et seq. This is the assessment for the period ended 19th January 1972. Although part of it is missing, it consists of ten pages of text with the headings General Situation, IRA (General), Goulding IRA, IRA (Brady), Na Fianna Eireann (sic), NICRA, Northern Civil Resistance Committee and Russian Journalists. Attached were a number of appendices, including Appendix B, "Forthcoming Events", in which the comment "no trouble anticipated" appears against the Bloody Sunday march. (G66.411) The Special Branch assessment for the period ended 3rd February 1972 is in the same form, with a substantial narrative text followed by a series of appendices (G112.697-706)

4.6.8. However, the Special Branch Assessment for the period ending 26th January 1972, i.e. the last one before Bloody Sunday, is missing. We have two documents which are in the same form as two of the regular appendices, including the appendix concerning "Forthcoming Events". Incidentally, it is for this reason that we reject Mr Bradley's suggestion that this document is not part of the Special Branch Assessment: see Day 384/147/13 to Day 384/147/25 and Day 384/176/1 to Day 384/177/17. In the document, all that is suggested in relation to the march is that "it is anticipated that marchers will clash with the Security Forces" and there is no reference to any anticipated IRA action. The narrative text is completely missing, for reasons that have not been explained.

4.6.9 Although the schedule of incidents for the period ending 26th January 1972 and the schedule of forthcoming events for the period 27th January – 2nd February are in the same form as the Special Branch's appendices, they are not headed as appendices. They appear in Bundle G following the minutes of the JSC meeting held on Thursday 27th January 1972 (G76.463). This is the meeting in which it was suggested that "the operation might well develop into rioting and even a shooting war". (G76.465 paragraph 4) Such a suggestion was clearly not warranted by the comment made by Special Branch in "Forthcoming Events" and we suspect that the narrative text of the Special Branch assessment made it clear that nothing more than public disorder was expected and perhaps even that there was an understanding that both the Provisional IRA and the Official IRA were unlikely to engage in any hostile action.

4.6.10 As appears from the stamps on these documents, the Special Branch Assessments were all provided by the MOD, presumably because they were copied to HQNI at the time. It has not been explained why copies of these assessments were not provided by the PSNI itself, especially when it had the signal from David on its microfilm.

4.7 Conclusion

4.7.1 It is clear from the Madden and Finucane chart at KM6.79 that the UK Government and Army PR network in Northern Ireland at the material time was dominated by MI5, MI6 and IRD operatives. The UK Representative, Howard Smith, later became head of MI5. His deputy, Frank Steele, was a member of MI6. Clifford Hill and Mr Mooney were seconded from IRD. (Day 240/33/9 to Day 240/36/21). The Director of Intelligence at HQNI was also a member of MI5, as were James and Julian, and a member of MI6 was seconded to that Department. In the nature of things, what secret intelligence agencies do best is to keep secrets. What the Intelligence agencies did in support of the Army case following Bloody Sunday and what the IRD and other Psyops operatives at HQNI did as part of their role in shaping perceptions of the truth about Bloody Sunday is likely to remain secret. In view of the direct involvement of soldiers and police officers on Bloody Sunday, nor can the MOD or PSNI be relied upon to disclose material that may incriminate their former members.

4.7.2 It may very well be that the Government, in the sense of the Cabinet, fully intended that all relevant official documentation would be made available to this Inquiry but, for the reasons set out above, we consider that this intention has been frustrated.

5. GENERAL OBSERVATIONS ON CATEGORIES OF EVIDENCE BEFORE THE INQUIRY

5.1 Soldiers

5.1.1. Introduction and summary

5.1.1.1 The evidence available to the Tribunal comes from a variety of sources and takes various forms, including documentary and photographic evidence as well as contemporaneous and recent written and oral accounts taken by civilians, priests, journalists, photographers and expert witnesses. The vast bulk of this evidence points firmly to the conclusion that those killed and wounded on Bloody Sunday were innocent civilians shot deliberately and without any justification by soldiers. Even the RUC, as a body of witnesses, failed to provide evidence to justify the shootings, except indirectly by reference to claims of hearing civilian gunfire. The only body of evidence offering any support for the individual soldiers who shot civilians is that of the soldiers themselves. The evidence of those soldiers who fired shots and of those soldiers who have sought to justify the shootings is examined in detail in those sections concerning the individual sectors where the shootings occurred. In this section, we propose to make general observations on the reliability of the soldiers' testimony as a class of evidence, by reference largely to the evidence of the soldiers themselves. Our submissions on this issue can be summarised as follows:

(i) At best, the evidence not only of the soldiers directly involved in the shootings but of all the soldiers who have given evidence is inaccurate and unreliable. At worst, it is a tissue of lies. Of the hundreds of soldiers who have testified either orally or in writing to the Tribunal, only a small handful can be regarded as completely truthful. None of those who gave evidence touching directly upon the shootings can be regarded as either truthful or reliable.

(ii) The unreliability of these soldiers' testimony is attributable not only to the dishonesty of individuals. From the moment the events of Bloody Sunday occurred until the present day, the fabrication of evidence has been systematic and has occurred at all levels of the Army, from the youngest private soldier through senior NCO's and officers to General Ford, Commander of Land Forces in Northern Ireland.

(iii) The reasons for this systematic deceit are political, cultural and structural: political because Britain was engaged in not just a military but also a propaganda war in Ireland and an admission that British troops had massacred innocent civil rights protesters would have caused considerable damage both at home and abroad to the image of the British Army and the Government; cultural because, by reason of their training and ethos, soldiers instinctively tend to close ranks to protect their own and to defend the Army as an institution from attack by those perceived as the enemy, this instinct being shared and nourished by other key elements in the establishment, including the Government and the Judiciary; structural because the practices and procedures put in place by the Army and the Government facilitated, if not positively encouraged, the fabrication of evidence designed to protect these political and cultural interests.

The Army's political animus and the individual shooters' natural inclination to deny responsibility for murder are self-evident. It is proposed in this section to examine the cultural and structural aspects of the soldiers' systematic defence of their conduct, as evidenced in particular by the practices of the Special Investigation Branch (SIB) of the Royal Military Police (RMP) and by the Army Legal Services.

5.1.2 The Army Culture of Closing Ranks

5.1.2.1 In addition to the obvious reasons why any person is unlikely to incriminate himself, the rules and principles that are drilled into a soldier at every stage of his training and experience - in particular the importance of discipline, comradeship, loyalty and subordination of personal interest to the needs of the Army as a whole - all militate against candour where candour would be detrimental to the interests either of other individual soldiers or of the Army as an organisation.

5.1.2.2 In other words, soldiers close ranks to protect themselves individually and the Army as an organisation of which they are a member. Indeed the esprit de corps was so effectively fostered by the Army that soldiers not only closed ranks to protect those they knew to be guilty but they also regarded other soldiers as presumptively innocent in the face of evidence to the contrary. The effect is expressed as follows by a rifleman in the Royal Green Jackets (Soldier 160 at B1956.5 paragraph 31):

> "The thought that the Paras must have been shot at developed like osmosis. The virtues of loyalty and honouring the Code were drilled into us in training and we did not question whether the Paras had been fired upon – that's where the loyalty comes in, we all simply assumed that they had been fired at. We knew that the Yellow Card did not permit us to fire at anybody unless we positively identified a gunman. To us, it had to be the case that if the Paras fired they had been fired upon. Even if we hadn't heard any shooting, it was second nature to us to close ranks, almost like a collective security thing – in the reverse situation we would have expected them to do the same for us. I have been asked whether we all got together and just decided what we were going to do but we didn't have to; we just knew automatically that we had to help the Paras out when they were under pressure."

5.1.2.3. This may help to explain why so many soldiers in regiments other than the Parachute Regiment claimed to have heard civilian gunfire when they did not. Soldier 160 himself made a statement claiming to have heard machine gunfire both before and after the Paras entered the Bogside but he now admits that he did not. (B1956.4 paragraph 29) In addition to the soldiers who claim to have heard civilian gunfire, there were soldiers such as the observers in observation posts on the city walls and on the Embassy Ballroom building, as well as snipers in various locations, who were all well placed and well equipped with binoculars or magnifying rifle sights to see exactly what the Paratroopers did in the crucial period of fifteen minutes after they entered the Bogside. Yet most of them claim to have seen virtually nothing at all of any interest, let alone discreditable conduct on the part of paratroopers. This can only be regarded as evidence of a conspiracy of silence engendered by the perceived need to close ranks to protect the paratroopers.

5.1.2.4 The tendency to close ranks is and was a phenomenon recognised and practised at every level of the Army. In a memorandum to the AG (Adjutant General) dated 13th April 1972 (G130A.865.1) the VAG (Vice Adjutant General) reported complaints made personally to him by General Tuzo, the GOC NI, who had come to see him in connection with "matters concerning the Widgery Tribunal" and also to make a complaint about looting and other "misbehaviour" on the part of certain soldiers in Northern Ireland. In this context, the VAG recorded the following:

> "More generally, General Tuzo expressed his disquiet at what would appear to be a growing habit of commanding officers to cover up allegations made against their soldiers. He says it is extremely difficult for him to obtain the true facts when such charges are levelled by Police and/or civilians because commanding officers appear to feel it incumbent upon them to stand up for their subordinates in all circumstances and at all costs... .. He wondered whether it would be possible for commanding officers of units under orders to proceed to Northern Ireland to be more fully briefed than at present appears to be the case on the need for them to investigate in a totally unprejudiced fashion all charges levelled against their soldiers; instead of, as at present, taking the attitude "my soldiers right or wrong"" [Emphasis added] (G130A.865.1 to G130A.865.2)

5.1.2.5 The Deputy Assistant Provost Marshall (Special Duties) (INQ3) agreed that General Tuzo's complaint corresponded with his own experience (Day 256/186/14 to Day 256/186/16). In the "Brief for investigators engaged on inquiries into IS matters in Northern Ireland" drafted by Warrant Officer Wood and signed by the Assistant Provost Marshall, INQ1383, at CW1.46 Investigators were specifically warned that they would find that a Soldiers superior officers may be over eager to support their men's actions and try to incorporate statements such as "in my opinion Private ..... acted correctly when he fired on the man" in their evidence (CW1.51). When asked to confirm that "soldiers tended to close ranks when they were being questioned about the possibility of either themselves or other soldiers committing criminal acts", he said: "Of course, that is part of unit loyalty". He said "that goes without saying" and when it was suggested that this unit loyalty extended through all levels of the Army his reply was "I presume so" (Day 256/185/23 to Day 256/185/25).

INQ 1383, the Assistant Provost Marshall (head of the RMP in Northern Ireland), also agreed that one could rely on soldiers to "close ranks" (Day 304/151/8 to Day 304/151/12).

The tendency to close ranks has been demonstrated during the course of this Inquiry to cover not only matters directly touching upon the events at issue but also peripheral issues such as whether soldiers had access to private supplies of ammunition. Warrant Officer Wood, the Regimental Sergeant Major of 178 Provost Company (the SIB) stated frankly that there was so much "spare ammunition floating around at the time" that it was "a waste of time to check what ammunition was fired by asking the Quartermaster". "If a soldier was found in possession of a spare round in Aldershot, he would be court-martialled instantly, but it appeared to me that there was a different philosophy in Northern Ireland." (CW1.8 paragraph 47) Warrant Officer Wood recalled that the team from the SIB who were investigating at a later date covered the question of spare ammunition being used on Bloody Sunday but, surprisingly, he cannot recall the outcome of the investigation. The availability of private supplies of ammunition is confirmed by many other soldiers. However, it was flatly denied by a number of the SIB officers, including Sergeant Major INQ1831 (C1831.3 paragraph 19), Corporal Brobson / INQ 1868 (C1868.5 paragraph 41) and Corporal INQ2064 (C2064.3 paragraph 18). In other words, the practice of closing ranks applied not only to ordinary soldiers but to members of the SIB and involved denying anything that could have provided even indirect support for the allegations against the Army. While ordinary private, inexperienced soldiers may genuinely not have known about private supplies of ammunition, it is hardly conceivable that RMP soldiers charged with investigating such matters would have been completely unaware of the practice.

5.1.2.6 Even soldiers not overborne by an instinct to close ranks remain subject to other forms of pressure ranging from the risk of being ostracised to implicit or explicit threats of reprisal (as in the case of Soldier 027). Such a breaking of ranks would have been expected to spell the effective end of a soldier's career in the Army and even now the risk of reprisal remains constant.

5.1.2.7 Whether a soldier is actuated by a benign or by a malign instinct to close ranks, or by fear of the consequences of not doing so, the result is the same: a failure on the part of soldiers to tell the truth about what they witnessed on Bloody Sunday. This is manifested in a variety of ways, ranging from a feigned loss of memory to elaborate fabrication.

5.1.3. The Role of the Special Investigation Branch

5.1.3.1 Most of the soldiers rely heavily (and many of those who now claim a loss of memory rely exclusively) on contemporaneous accounts they gave to the Special Investigation Branch (SIB) of the Royal Military Police (RMP) and/or the Army Legal Services (ALS) and/or the Treasury Solicitor (TS - these statements were known as the SA statements) and/or the Widgery Tribunal hearings. Insofar as these accounts purport to justify shooting by any soldier, our submission is that they are untrue, primarily because they conflict with the preponderance of civilian and other evidence of the facts. However, in support of our submission that they are untrue, it is now proposed to examine the role of the SIB to demonstrate that the soldiers' accounts were given in circumstances and under conditions that were positively conducive to the fabrication of accounts favourable to the Army.

5.1.3.2. For ease of reference, Appendix 1 lists the RMP officers whose evidence is relevant to the SIB investigation into the events of Bloody Sunday.

Of central importance in understanding the role of the SIB is the evidence of INQ 3 (a Major in the SIB who was Deputy Assistant Provost Marshal (Special Duties) to the effect that there existed in January 1972 a formal policy whereby the RMP would "tend" to military witnesses and the RUC to civilian witnesses in the investigation of offences and incidents. The result was expressed by INQ 3 as follows:

> " With both the RMP and RUC sympathetic to the soldier, who after all was doing an incredibly difficult job, he was highly unlikely to make a statement incriminating himself, for the RMP investigator is out for managerial, not criminal purposes and, using their powers of discretion, it would seem to be unlikely that the RUC would prefer charges against soldiers except in the most extreme circumstances". (C 3.1 and see C3.10 paragraph 12)

5.1.3.3. In other words, none of the contemporaneous statements was made by a soldier after interview by a police officer anxious to test his account as a potential suspect in a criminal offence, even where (as in the cases of Michael Kelly and Gerard Donaghey) the bullets recovered from their bodies could be traced to particular soldiers and where a substantial body of civilian evidence pointed to unlawful killing. Indeed, not only were the soldiers' accounts not tested by an independent police officer, but a soldier who might otherwise have been tempted to tell the truth to a member of an outside police force in the privacy of a police interview would have been inhibited from doing so to another soldier from the SIB.

5.1.3.4 As Major INQ3 conceded during his oral testimony, the entire purpose of the policy agreement between the GOC and the Chief Constable was "to ensure that the conduct of soldiers could be protected from scrutiny" (Day 256/187/17 to Day 256/187/18). It should be noted that the practice of having soldiers interviewed only by SIB officers was deprecated by the Northern Ireland Court of Appeal in R v Foxford [1974] NI 181.

5.1.3.5. Warrant Officer INQ1835 of the SIB said in his Eversheds statement:

> " If a soldier made a comment to me such as "the command structure broke down that day" I would have put it in a statement but frankly it is not likely that a soldier would say that outside the barrack room. The Army is a family and a family looks after its own" (C1835.5 paragraph 32).

5.1.3.6 This recognises the unlikelihood of a soldier breaking ranks to make any remark critical of the Army but it is misleading insofar as it suggests that the SIB would record such criticism in a statement. If a soldier did say something to the SIB officer taking his statement that would either have incriminated himself or "given the Army a problem", the interview was stopped and the matter referred to either HQNI or Army Legal Services (C1835.5 at paragraph 31.) If an SIB Investigating Officer below the rank of Warrant Officer was conducting the interview and the soldier had said something incriminating, the interview would have been stopped and the matter referred to the Warrant Officer (per INQ2052 at Day 252/21/10). Even if the statement was taken by a solicitor from the Treasury Solicitors acting on behalf of the Widgery Tribunal, the interview would be stopped if the soldier appeared liable to incriminate himself, as appears from the case of Soldier V, discussed further below.

5.1.3.7. The reality is that, bearing in mind the magnitude of the events of Bloody Sunday and the inevitable realisation by the RMP that the Army was bound to come under severe scrutiny, the SIB and indeed the ALS personnel instructed to take statements from the soldiers involved were subject to exactly the same pressures that would have deterred those soldiers from making statements which would be damaging to the Army and which would provide ammunition for the enemy in "the propaganda war". The effect was that, when a soldier was asked to make a statement to the RMP, it was against the background that the soldier believed that what was expected of him was to provide evidence which could provide justification for the shootings. See, for example, the express recognition of this by Soldier 151 (Day 298/131/3 to Day 298/131/9) and (Day 298/106/1 to Day 298/106/3). By way of example, this soldier made a statement in which he purported to have witnessed a nail bomb exploding and a shot being fired but confirmed during his oral testimony that he witnessed neither. (Day 298/106/5)

5.1.3.8. Bearing in mind that Police officers were excluded entirely from the statement- taking process by virtue of the policy developed between the GOC and the RUC Chief Constable, the entire modus operandi of the SIB in taking statements not only rendered it unlikely that any soldier would make any admission of criminal responsibility but positively facilitated and encouraged the fabrication of false accounts. It was not the SIB investigators' job to "assess criminal responsibility." (CW1.48) The Assistant Provost Marshall, INQ1383, initially disputed this suggestion during his oral testimony (Day 305/106/10 to Day 305/106/12) but when it was pointed out to him that it appears in the Brief for Investigators drafted by Warrant Officer Wood and authorised by himself he accepted that this was so. (Day 305/108/13 to Day 305/108/20) As a consequence, it was not the SIB investigator's job to challenge or cross-examine a soldier about an account but simply to take a note about what he was saying. Major INQ3 agreed with this (Day 256/181/25).

5.1.3.9. A statement was taken from a soldier as witnesses, not a suspect, without caution. This was done because, firstly, the soldier was not expected to make any admission of criminal responsibility and, secondly, the investigator would not be trying to obtain any incriminating admissions. Major INQ3 accepted both these propositions (Day 256/182/1).

5.1.3.10. Major INQ3 also accepted that this was all explained to the soldier. Major INQ3 was questioned about the consequence of this procedure as follows:

"Q. So a soldier knew that really so long as he did not make any incriminating admissions, his account would not be tested and he would be in the clear as far as prosecution was concerned?

A. Possibly. That was up to him.

Q. There was certainly nothing to discourage a soldier from fabricating an account was there?

A. No.

Q. In fact, you can see how this procedure would have positively encouraged soldiers to fabricate accounts where the soldier had something to hide?

A. It is possible." (Day 256/182/24 to Day 256/183/10)

5.1.3.11. Even if a soldier volunteered an admission of criminal conduct, there were checks and safeguards against the soldier maintaining such an admission. First, if this happened the interview would be stopped. Secondly, the matter would be referred to an officer "for confirmation" (CW1.48). Thirdly, the matter would be referred to the Army Legal Services (C1835.5 paragraph 31). Fourthly, a caution would be administered.

5.1.3.12 The knowledge that the police would not get involved in an investigation meant that both the SIB investigator and the soldier being questioned knew that matters could be kept in-house within the Army and no criminal charges brought as long as no soldier insisted on claiming criminal responsibility.

5.1.3.13. These matters are, in our submission, sufficient to establish that the statements taken by the SIB investigators in the immediate aftermath of Bloody Sunday are, at the very least, liable to be inaccurate, misleading and incomplete. However, during the course of the Inquiry, evidence has emerged of a pattern of events suggesting that not only did the interviewees give false and incomplete accounts but the SIB interviewers themselves may have provided some of the false accounts, which they then required the interviewees to sign and adopt as their own. The following are examples.

5.1.3.14. Soldier 018, a member of the Anti-tank Platoon, made a statement on 4th February to the effect that he had seen F and G fire shots at

Rossville Flats. (B1487) In his Eversheds statement (B191.5 paragraph 42) he said:

".. .. I was not in a position to see whether there was a gunman in the flats when the shots were fired, nor could I see that they went through the window. The RMP told me that he needed to include this to substantiate details that had been provided by my colleagues to show that when they fired, they did not hit anybody. At the time I made my statement, I was led to believe the details about the location of the gunman in the flats and the area to which fire was returned were true. I had also heard the shots being fired from my position inside the pig. I therefore agreed to include the details in my statement".

5.1.3.15 Soldier 018's RMP statement was taken by INQ2120, who had also taken G's statement.

5.1.3.16 Soldier 005 made a statement to the RMP, also on 4th February, purporting to corroborate Soldier R's account of shooting at a pistol man in Rossville Flats. However, he told the Inquiry that he did not and could not have seen the gunman he claimed in his RMP statement to have seen. His testimony proceeded as follows (Day 338/165/21 to Day 338/166/11):

"Q And you have thirdly said that you did not tell the RMP that you saw a man with a pistol?

A. No.

Q I want to be clear, is it the case that the RMP made the story up?

A. To my mind, yes.

Q. And asked you to sign the statement.?

A. Yes.

Q. So all the material details in the statement were put in the statement by the military policeman taking the statement?

A. Yes

Q. And he presented this to you and said "sign this"?

A. Yes

Q. Did you protest about this?

A. No I just signed it.

5.1.3.17 Soldier 006 was asked why he had told the RMP that Mr Dillon was arrested for assault when he had not seen any assault. He was questioned as follows:

"Q. You did in fact tell the RMP, did you not, that Mr Dillon was arrested for assault; is that right?

A. 1972, were it .

Q. Yes. In fact it is at B1375, your RMP statement. The bottom of the page: "The youth's name was Dillon and he was arrested for assault".

A. The MP would have wrote that, yes.

Q. Did you tell the MP that?

A. I cannot remember now.

Q Would the MP have put that in if you did not tell him that?

A. He may have done yes.

Q Why would he have done that?

A. I do not know at the time. I think they just wrote it and we just agreed with it". Day 334/56/3 to Day 334/56/18

5.1.3.18 Private S also provided an RMP statement in which he claimed to have seen a gunman shot at by Sergeant O. He told the Inquiry that this wasn't true. When asked by the Chairman how that got into his statement, he said (332/72/21 to Day 332/72/25):

"A. Because it was probably inserted there for me, probably.

Q. MR MACDONALD By the RMP who took the statement?

A. Probably, yes, sir.

Q. And you went along with it?

A. Yes."

5.1.3.19 Soldier S had no option but to concede that his 1972 statements were untrue in this and other material respects. For example, he also admitted that he had seen no nail or acid bombs. When he was asked if he had been told by the RMP to put this in his statement, he said "probably" (Day 332/40/8). He may of course have said this simply to avoid admitting that he had lied to the RMP. As a shooter, he was anxious to convince the Tribunal that he was honest and that his account of his shots can be relied upon. However, 005, 018 and 006 did not have to admit that their RMP statements were false and they had little to gain by saying that they had been made up by the RMP.

5.1.3.20 A feature of this pattern is that the statements of those three soldiers were all made on 4th February. The statements made by soldiers 018 and 006 were both made to the same SIB investigator (INQ2120, now deceased), who also took the statement of G, part of which was supported by 018's statement. Soldier 018 made his statement at 19.15 hrs (B1487). Fifteen minutes later, Soldier 036 made a statement (B1629) and, thirty minutes after that, Soldier147 made a statement (B1886). Neither 036 nor 147 had made any statement before this but both now claimed to be able to corroborate the accounts given by F and G of "returning" fire at Rossville Flats even though, if this had been true, they would have been expected to have presented themselves to the SIB to make a statement on the night of the 30th or the early hours of the 31st January (per W.O. Wood, CW1.8 paragraph 46 and Day 383/171/14). At 15.10 on the same day, Soldier J had made a fresh statement (B269) claiming that he too had witnessed the shooting from Rossville Flats that had prompted F and G to fire even though he had not suggested this in his first statement.

5.1.3.21. On the same date, statements were taken from a number of other soldiers purporting to support the accounts given earlier by shooters. INQ2035 took a statement from Soldier U in which Soldier U alleged he saw a man with a pistol at the Rossville Street doorway of Block 1 firing shots towards the rubble barricade, striking two men, one being a middle-aged man waving his arm in the air at the same time as he was cradling a teenager on the barricade. This was clearly designed to suggest that Willie Nash and his father Alex had been shot by a civilian gunman. At 19.15 hours on the same date at Palace Barracks, Holywood, INQ2035 took a statement from Soldier 033 which in broad terms supported Soldier U's account of this alleged incident.

5.1.3.22 Forty minutes later, INQ2210 took a statement from Soldier 037 in which 037 also gave a similar account. (B1632) In his Eversheds statement (B1635), Soldier 037 said that the events of Bloody Sunday were still "very clear" in his memory and in B1636.003 paragraphs 24 to 26 he said that he "definitely did not" witness either this incident or the incident involving the removal of three bodies from the rubble barricade. He was sure about this because he was at the north-east corner of Block 1 watching the car park and, as he stressed more than once, could not have seen either incident. Soldier 037 was equivocal about the circumstances in which his RMP statement was made and was reluctant to accuse the SIB investigator who took the statement. However, during the course of questioning, he said this (Day 357/158/9 to Day 357/158/19):

"Q. Do you accept, first of all, that none of the details in this statement could have come from you?

A. Absolutely.

Q. Assuming that no one else was present at your interview apart from yourself and the RMP investigator, is that not right?

A. It certainly did not come from me.

Q. Therefore it must have come from the RMP investigator?

A. I would say that, yes.

Q. You would say that?

A. Yes."

5.1.3.23 Again, this soldier may be blaming the RMP in the wrong but he had made no other inconsistent statement, the falsehood was only discovered because he volunteered it to Eversheds and he had little to gain by disclosing it at all.

5.1.3.24. Also on the same date (4th February), at 20.30 hrs, Soldier 017 gave a statement to an unidentified SIB Officer in which he corroborated Soldier P's account of shooting a nail bomber in Rossville Street. (B1479) He gave a detailed account of seeing the nail bomber emerge from the crowd in front of the Rubble Barricade and seeing P shoot him. He had made no reference to this in his first statement (B1476) even though he had referred in that first statement to the crowd and had not suggested that they were doing anything other than throwing stones at the troops.

5.1.3.25 If the Tribunal is satisfied in only one case that an SIB statement-taker himself did indeed fabricate an account and have it signed by a soldier in order to strengthen the Army case, the entire body of evidence taken by the SIB must be regarded as tainted for this reason alone.

5.1.4 The Role of the Army Legal Services

5.1.4.1 Lt Col. Overbury, then Assistant Director of Army Legal Services (ADALS), was appointed to lead the Army Legal Services team representing the Army at the Widgery Tribunal. He made no bones about the fact that he was concerned primarily to protect the interests of the Army rather than to find the truth of what happened on Bloody Sunday. (Day 243/142/17 to Day 243/142/21) As a result of a controversial and, in our respectful submission, misguided ruling made by the Tribunal on 14th January 2004, following submissions made on Days 403-405, we have been prohibited from making allegations of impropriety on the part of Lt Col. Overbury in respect of his role in the process of talking soldiers' statements and presenting the Army's evidence to the Widgery Tribunal. We shall, therefore, let the evidence speak for itself.

5.1.4.2. According to Lt Col. Overbury, it was his duty to "cross-check statements" (CO1.41 paragraph 26). He read all the soldiers' statements and interviewed or re-interviewed a number of them. His assistant, Major Bailey, and solicitors seconded from the Treasury Solicitor's staff also sat in during the interviews of soldiers by Sir Basil Hall's team from the Treasury Solicitor's Department staffing the Widgery Inquiry.

5.1.4.3. In determining how Lt Col Overbury discharged his functions, the Tribunal ought to take into account the evidence indicating that, in addition to the obvious factors that would have disposed him to protect the interests of the Army, he was led to believe and understand that he had the licence and authority to do so without risk of subsequent censure. In this connection, we refer to a number of matters which must have given Army Legal Services confidence that material alterations in the accounts of soldiers who were liable to "give the Army a problem" would be effectively screened from close external scrutiny. In particular:

(i) The Attorney General appointed Counsel both for the Army and for the Tribunal (see the minute of 2nd February 1972 from the DUS (Army) at CO1.20 paragraph 4) and he made it clear to Lt Col Overbury's immediate line manager, the Director of Army Legal Services, that the Counsel for the Tribunal would be sympathetic to the Army: see the loose minute from the DUS (Army) of 7th February 1972 at CO1.25 paragraph 1(a), where it is recorded that "the Attorney General observed that he thought that we could take it that given the personalities involved the proceedings of the Tribunal should not be abrasive as far as the Army is concerned". (Emphasis added.)

(ii) The Attorney General expressed the view, before any evidence was heard, that the Army witnesses "should have nothing to fear" (CO1.25 paragraph 1(c)).

(iii) Lord Widgery was a "good choice for the Army" (see C1872.9 paragraph 2). For example, he was prepared to go to "extreme lengths" to protect the identity of soldiers (COl.12 paragraph 7) and indicated that even though he saw obvious difficulties in shielding witnesses he would accede to such an application if one were made by the Army (CO1.22). He was also "well aware of the effects his judgement could have on future operations and the morale of the security forces"(per Mr Gibbens QC, according to Col Dalzell - Payne at CO1.218 paragraph 7).

5.1.4.4 Moreover, the circumstances surrounding the material alteration of the accounts given by, for example, Soldiers V and F (including in particular the fact that counsel for the Widgery Tribunal did not even mention their previous inconsistent statements, let alone challenge their evidence on this basis) point to the conclusion that the Army was, at the very least, given a "nod and a wink" that soldiers could, with impunity, alter their evidence as required.

Soldier V

5.1.4.5. It appears from the note made by Mr Heritage (B821.2 and KH6.14) that Soldier V made an admission about shooting an alleged petrol bomber that was tantamount to an admission of murder or, at the very least, a breach of the Yellow Card. By virtue of the fact that he had been ordered to make a statement, both Col. Overbury and Major Bailey believed that he could not be prosecuted on the basis of this admission. However, the ALS team were clearly anxious to avoid any statement that would show that soldiers were at fault. The matter was taken up with Messrs Gibbens and Stocker (B821.01) and no warning was given, so that the soldier was still protected by the order. Notwithstanding this, the incriminating admission did not appear in the statement taken by the Treasury Solicitor and the account given by Soldier V in this statement was at odds both with his original RMP statement and the account he had given to Mr Heritage. (See B802).Col. Overbury claims not to know how this came about. The irresistible inference is that Soldier V was advised in private by someone in authority in such a manner that Soldier V decided to change his account and offer a fresh account which did not implicate him in any wrongdoing. It is obviously important for the Tribunal to decide who is likely to have furnished this advice since it would clearly impact on the reliability of other military evidence if the person in question had an influential role in the gathering and presentation of other such evidence. The list of candidates is not long.

5.1.4.6. Perhaps more importantly in this context, Soldier V's oral testimony to the Widgery Tribunal also differed from his original RMP statement and from the account given originally to Mr Heritage (B821.20) but neither Counsel for the Tribunal nor Lord Widgery nor Counsel for the Army raised this fact. In view of the controversy that had arisen between the Treasury Solicitor and the Army Legal Services over the issue of Soldier V's statement, it is inconceivable that Counsel for the Tribunal would have been unaware of the previous inconsistent statements. The only proper inference to be drawn from the fact that both Mr Stocker and Mr Gibbens failed to deal with this is that they had agreed not to do so. If they were prepared to engage in collusion in Soldier V's case for the purpose of concealing evidence detrimental to both him and the army, it is reasonable to conclude that

(i) they may have done so with other soldiers and in other ways, and

(ii) the Army may have known that the Tribunal (including the Chairman, his counsel and the other important personnel associated with it) was minded to turn a blind eye to such matters.

Soldier F

5.1.4.7 Soldier F made his first statement in the early hours of Monday 31st January 1972 (B121). It was a detailed statement made when events were still fresh in his mind. Lt Col Overbury said that he had no reason to believe that either F or any of the other soldiers was unfit to make statements in the early hours of the following morning. In this statement, F:

(i) made no reference to shooting anyone behind the Rubble Barricade;

(ii) made no reference to shooting anyone behind Block 2 (Joseph Place);

(iii) accounted for all 13 rounds fired in four different incidents; and

(iv) pointed out the location of his targets on a map (B124).

5.1.4.8 He made a second statement on 31st January 1972 (B126) in which he made no reference to shooting anyone else.

5.1.4.9 In a third (undated) statement (B129) he made no reference to shooting any other person, even though he did refer to gunmen at the rubble barricade.

5.1.4.10 He made a fourth statement on 15th February (B132) concerning arrests but did not take the opportunity to modify his substantive account.

5.1.4.11 His fifth and final statement (B135) was taken on 19th February by Col. Overbury. In it he suggested, for the first time, that

(i) he shot a person at the Rubble Barricade; and

(ii) he shot a person behind Block 2 (Joseph Place).

5.1.4.12 No satisfactory explanation has been offered as to what prompted soldier F's sudden recall of these additional shootings. There was nothing in his four previous statements that would have helped him do so. Nor did he apparently volunteer this additional statement. The inescapable inference is that the impetus for the final statement came from someone in the Army who appreciated the significance of the glaring gap in the Army's evidence and the need to plug it. Col. Overbury claims to have no recollection of the circumstances in which this statement came to be made but suggests that it was probably the result of the "cross-checking" exercise, the exercise for which he was responsible. (Day 243/56/19 to Day 243/56/23) The best he could suggest was that soldier F may have remembered the events more clearly when he was shown photographs of the area, all of which were already available of course when the earlier statements were made.

5.1.4.13 On 14th February 1972 Dr Martin indicated that the bullet recovered from Michael Kelly could be traced to a specific rifle (D550) but he did not intend to embark upon the necessary tests until all the rifles were provided to him. It appears that, as of 17th February, the tests had still not been completed (D628 paragraph 8) By 28th February, Dr Martin was in a position to draft a letter to the RUC indicating that the bullet had been matched with a particular rifle (D56) Incidentally, Lt. Col. Overbury said that no query was raised about the correctness of Dr Martin's conclusions (Day 243/159/2 to Day 243/159/4) and we know that "the best ballistics expert in the business" was available to the Army Legal Services Team (CO1.12 at paragraph 5). There is no evidence as to when the results of the tests were in fact known to Dr Martin or whether they were communicated to anyone (and if so whom) before the draft letter of 28th February.

5.1.4.14 Col Overbury denied that he would have received advice directly from Dr Martin or from any other source before 28th Febrauary but, in our submission, it is certainly feasible that the results could have been known by Dr Martin prior to 19th February and communicated orally to Lt Col. Overbury on or before that date.

5.1.4.15 Whether or not F's statement of 19th February was prompted by receipt of the information that the bullet recovered from Michael Kelly had been traced to his rifle, the fact remains that he made the statement in circumstances suggesting that someone in ALS was responsible to some degree for prompting the new account.

5.1.4.16 Moreover, neither Counsel for the Army nor Counsel for the Tribunal (Mr Read) raised or queried the manner in which F had come to give his account of shooting a person at the rubble barricade. This could not have been an oversight. At the very least, the failure of Counsel for the Tribunal to refer to the previous inconsistent statements of Soldiers V and F undermines Lt. Col Overbury's suggestion that there was "no point in persuading soldiers to change their accounts because all their statements were given to the Treasury Solicitor" (CO1.49 paragraph 51).

5.1.4.17 According to INQ 1872, Lt Col Overbury did most, if not all, of the interviewing of soldiers (C1872.2 paragraph 8). Significantly, he was responsible for taking statements from General Ford, Brigadier McClellan, Col. Wilford and Major Loden (CO1.6 paragraph 8).

5.1.4.18. In addition to interviewing Soldier F on 16th February, Col Overbury interviewed three soldiers from 22nd Light Air Defence Regiment, viz Soldiers 15, 40 and 134. Soldier 15 was acting as an observer in the observation post in the shirt factory in Sackville Street, from which he had a view along Rossville Street to the Rubble Barricade. In his RMP statement (B1414) he said that he saw a soldier positioned at the corner of Block 1, Rossville Flats and he saw this soldier shoot at and hit a man who was running towards a doorway in Block 1. This man fell in the doorway and was then dragged inside. This may have been Kevin McElhinney. On the face of it, this soldier had fired without justification at a fleeing man. However, after he was interviewed by Col Overbury on 16th February, Soldier 15 made a fresh statement in which he said that before the soldier fired, the man in question stopped, faced the soldier who fired and raised his right arm at shoulder height pointing towards the soldier. (B1422) As Col Overbury recognised (Day 243/210/11 to Day 243/210/14), the fresh statement allowed for the possibility of a justification for the shooting, on the basis that he may have been pointing a pistol at the soldier. Col Overbury said he did not recall pointing out to Soldier 15 that his first statement was potentially evidence of an illegal shooting and indeed did not explain how Soldier 15 had come to add this particular detail when being spoken to by him (Col Overbury) except that that was what the soldier said and that was what he wrote down. (Day 243/210/22)

5.1.4.19. Soldier 40 said in his RMP statement that he was in a derelict building in Upper Magazine Street looking over the back of the Rossville Flats when he saw a paratrooper fire from the gable end of Glenfada Park North along the front of Rossville Flats Block 2 in his (Soldier 40's) direction and hit a man who was standing with his back to Soldier 40 waving his arms.(B1653) Again, this was a clear statement to the effect that a paratrooper had shot a civilian for no apparent reason. The man in question may have been Barney McGuigan. However, after being interviewed by Col. Overbury, this soldier made a fresh statement (B1656) in which he said that the civilian was holding his arms above his shoulders with his fists clenched and he could not say whether he was holding anything. This new statement clearly opened the possibility that the civilian might have been carrying a weapon.

5.1.4.20 Soldier 134 was also in a derelict building in Upper Magazine Street. In his RMP statement, he said he saw a male civilian trotting across Glenfada Park towards the flats with a paratrooper behind him. The paratrooper knelt down behind a lamp post and fired one round at the man, who then fell to the ground. (B1823) Col. Overbury agreed that this was evidence of the man being fired on without cause by a paratrooper. (Day 243/214/23 to Day 243/215/1) Col Overbury claimed not to recall why he was asked to interview any of these three soldiers but he had the impression that one of the reasons was "to see if we could put something together that was more consistent." He denied that it was to try and put a spin on some evidence otherwise damaging to the Army. (Day 243/215/12 to Day 243/215/14) However, after he was interviewed the same day by Col Overbury, Soldier 134 also made a fresh statement in which he added detail in such a way as to raise the possibility that the man he saw trotting away may not have been the same person as the man who was shot.

5.1.4.21 The pattern that emerges from this evidence is one of radical alteration by soldiers of their original accounts so as to eliminate "problems for the Army". The question to be determined by the Tribunal is whether this was all spontaneous or was systematically engineered. If it was the latter, it must be decided who is likely to have been responsible and whether the person in question was in a position to engineer other aspects of the Army's evidence, in which case it would be difficult to regard any of it as safe.

5.1.4.22. Quite apart from the evidence of alteration of the accounts of specific soldiers, it appears from the evidence of Captain 219 that before the Widgery Inquiry a large number of officers and men of 1 Para were assembled in a hall in Palace Barracks and "briefed on what to say and how to say it". (B2162.8 paragraph 29) According to Captain 219:

> "The briefing was conducted by members of the battalion (I do not remember who) and by strangers from outside who I believe were lawyers. I do not know whether they were army or civilian lawyers. I remember sitting there feeling very upset – they were almost putting words into our mouths. I was very upset at the time and even now it upsets me. When Widgery reported I felt that the evidence had not got through to him". (Emphasis added)

It is common case that Col. Overbury addressed officers and men of 1 Para and formally ordered them to make statements to the Widgery Inquiry. If Captain 219's evidence about this episode is correct, the Tribunal will presumably wish to consider whether Lt. Col Overbury could have been one of those "strangers from outside" who conducted the briefing in question.

5.1.4.23 According to David Mills (M.108.2), Lt Col. Overbury regarded the Army case as a charade. As head of the Army Legal Services team at Widgery, he was in a good position to know.

5.1.5. Conclusion

5.1.5.1 It is our submission that the Tribunal ought to approach the assessment of both the contemporaneous statements of soldiers (including their oral testimony to the Widgery Inquiry) and their current testimony on the basis that their evidence is inherently unreliable and likely to be false on the material issues.

5.2 Royal Ulster Constabulary

5.2.1. Introduction and summary

5.2.1.1 It has always been contended on behalf of the families that one of the most scandalous aspects of Bloody Sunday is that the RUC completely abdicated its responsibility to investigate the conduct of the soldiers and to bring prosecutions. Even on the soldiers' accounts, they had been involved in a mass killing and, on the accounts of countless civilians (including journalists, photographers, priests and others as well as the Bogside residents), there was at least a prima facie case of unlawful homicide. The response of the Police was to prosecute marchers on the say so of soldiers who were obviously lying and to turn a blind eye to the conduct of the paratroopers. Not one was even interviewed.

5.2.1.2 .It was in these circumstances that, by notice dated 10th December 1999, we made two general allegations against the RUC, namely that they:

(i) failed to conduct any adequate investigation into the actions of soldiers; and

(ii) failed to ensure that all material was obtained from the Army, the RMP and the Treasury Solicitor to enable a full and proper investigation into the actions of soldiers.

5.2.1.3 In a letter of 11th May 2000 the Solicitor to the Inquiry notified us that the Tribunal was not minded to entertain these allegations. It took the view that exploring the failures of the RUC or its officers after the event would not be of any assistance.

5.2.1.4 While the Tribunal may not be prepared to entertain allegations against the RUC for the purposes of determining culpability, it is our submission that these and other matters are relevant to the Tribunal's assessment of RUC officers as witnesses since, not content with turning a blind eye, many RUC officers also succumbed to the temptation to make statements that helped to provide a justification for the shootings.

5.2.1.5 The reality is that the RUC was a sectarian force whose members not only had a natural sympathy with the Army as another branch of the security forces but were positively hostile towards Nationalists and Civil Rights marchers. Apart from previously breaking up Civil Rights marches with brutality, their members had themselves engaged in direct conflict with the residents of the Bogside (for example, during the Battle of the Bogside). They also had a track record of closing ranks and suppressing evidence (for example, in the "conspiracy of silence" that their own Chief Constable of the day said blocked the internal investigation into the attack on Samuel Devenney).

5.2.1.6 It is our submission that the RUC as a body could not and still cannot be trusted to tell the truth about what they witnessed on Bloody Sunday.

5.2.2. Background

5.2.2.1. The question of misconduct among members of the RUC is dealt with briefly by Professor Arthur in his report at E6.25, E6.27. The following is a chronology of relevant events concerning RUC conduct during this period:

Date	Facts
5th October 1968	Civil Rights march broken up in Duke Street.
4th January 1969	Police collusion in attack on Civil Rights march at Burntollet
4/5th January 1969	RUC incursion into St Columb's Wells and Leckey Road (recorded in Cameron Report)
19th April 1969	Samuel Devenney and others beaten in Devenney house in William Street.
12th August 1969	Apprentice Boys march, followed by RUC /Apprentice Boys assault on Bogside (Battle of Bogside)
Date	Facts
14th August 1969	British Army deployed
9th October 1969	Hunt Report on Police published
October 1969	Sir Arthur Young appointed Chief Constable of RUC
4th November 1970	Sir Arthur Young issues statement that the internal (Drury) Police investigation into the assault on Samuel Devenney was blocked by a "conspiracy of silence" among police officers.

5.2.2.2 The RUC in 1972 was a predominantly Protestant, sectarian force which, despite the fact that the Chief Superintendent in Derry was a Catholic, had on more than one occasion manifested its animosity towards the Catholic residents of the Bogside. The RUC incursion into the Bogside on the night of 4th /5th January 1969 was investigated by the Cameron Commission, which reported that their investigations

> "have led to the unhesitating conclusion that on the night of 4th /5th January a number of policemen were guilty of misconduct which involved assault and battery, malicious damage to property in streets in the predominantly Catholic Bogside area giving reasonable cause for apprehension of personal injury among other innocent inhabitants, and the use of provocative sectarian and political slogans".

5.2.2.3 It was these events which led to the creation of Free Derry, a slogan which was painted on a gable wall of the Bogside on 5th January 1969. It was the failure of internal police inquiries to uncover the culprits responsible for the beating of Samuel Devenney in April 1969 which led to the RUC Chief Constable complaining of a "conspiracy of silence" within his own force. (E6.26). It is submitted that the police officers involved in Bloody Sunday saw it as their duty to rally round the soldiers in order to protect the army and Security Forces generally from criticism about their conduct on the day.

5.3.3 Conduct on the day

5.3.3.1 The RUC on Bloody Sunday had a support role, in more ways than one. It is common case that the Army was in charge of the operation to prevent the march from leaving the Bogside with the RUC involved only in peripheral duties such as patrolling the approaches to the containment area and processing the prisoners. As such, they were not involved in the arrest operation itself and few of them were eye-witnesses.

5.3.3.2 Nevertheless, many of them supplied witness statements in which they claimed to have heard civilian gunfire, including weapons such as Thompson sub-machine guns, which were distinctively IRA weapons, rather than Army SLRs. Many of these police officers were equipped with personal radios. Yet not one report of civilian shooting was made at the material time by a police officer. The police log of radio transmissions records that at 16.16 paratroopers were moving down Rossville Street and that the area was clear. The next two entries concerned the movements of a bus. At 16 .20 hrs, it was noted that William Street and Rossville Street were clear. At 16.21, it was logged that a press man had reported a 13 year old child lying dead on the street near Butcher's Gate. The first report of shots was at 16.23 but it is clear from a further entry at 16.25 that this related to a report of shooting from the Bogside Inn (W160). It was also clear from the Porter transcript of the RUC transmissions that the shooting had been initially directed at soldiers on the City Walls Serial 377, (W185). It apparent from the Porter transcript that throughout this period the Police were primarily concerned with the movement of civilians outside the Bogside area, which was their primary area of operation, and most of them had little idea of what was going on inside the Bogside.

5.3.3.3 On this ground alone, it is submitted that the Tribunal ought to attach no weight to the evidence of those police officers who claimed after the event that they heard gunfire other than Army gunfire. Some say they now don't remember this but do not resile from their 1972 statements.

5.3.3.4 The role of the police officers at Fort George is discussed in Section 16. As appears in that review of their evidence, most of them claim to have been unaware that soldiers subjected the prisoners to various forms of ill-treatment. The truth, as Joseph Lynn pointed out in his statement, is that many of the police officers enjoyed the spectacle. (AL39.7 paragraph 33) Not only were the police not prepared to intervene but they actively participated in the process by taking statements (that they must have known to be false) from soldiers, some of whom claimed to identify a multiplicity of civilians.

5.3.3.5 The reaction of police officers on Bloody Sunday to the fatal shootings was summed up by CSM 202, when he said:

> "The Battalion headquarters were situated in the grounds of a police station. I recall that there were policemen at the side of the road clapping at the headquarters as Major Loden went into the command and control cabin. I suspected that this reaction was because of the number of civilians who had been killed. I was not proud of this reaction from the RUC; I felt uneasy about it" (B2111.020 paragraph 133).

5.3.3.6. A solicitor, Patrick Fahy, was at the march and was later stopped near the Craigavon Bridge by a police patrol. Mr Fahy commented to one of the policemen that he believed some people had been shot dead. The policeman's reply was: "There was not half enough of the bastards shot dead". (AF1.1)

5.3.3.7 INQ 2107, an officer in the 22 LADR also gave evidence to the effect that the police were "elated" to hear of civilian casualties (Day 371/47/7 to Day 371/47/21). He noted this fact in his journal at the time (C2107 paragraph 14)

5.3.3.8 In addition, a number of Police officers filed reports dated 5th February 1972, apparently in response to a request to this effect. By way of example of the contents and objects of those reports, three police officers – Messrs Carson, Gawley and McVeigh – filed reports in almost identical terms claiming that they had seen a car with a body in it "ramming the barricade", i.e. Barrier 20, when it was quite clear from a substantial body of other evidence that this was simply not true. (Day 216/10/9 to Day 216/26/15) The clear inference is that not only did the police officers fabricate this account but they did so in collusion with each other.

5.3.3.9. It should also be remembered in this context that, as is discussed in Section 5.2, the Chief Constable of the RUC had entered into a formal agreement whereby soldiers involved even in fatal shootings would be interviewed by the RMP rather than by Police officers. There could hardly be a clearer indication that, as far as the police were concerned, soldiers could literally get away with murder.

5.3.3.10 An example of the current standards of police officers is the case of William McGreeghan. In support of his application for screening, he claimed that he was living and working in Northern Ireland but it emerged, quite fortuitously, that he had been living and working out of the jurisdiction for several years. (Day 219/34/8 to Day 219/45/19)

5.3.3.11 It is for these reasons that in our submission, insofar as police officers claim to have heard civilian gunfire or nail bombs or other matters that would tend to justify shooting by the Army, their evidence is inherently suspect by virtue of their status as police officers.

5.4 Photographers

5.4.1 As the Tribunal knows there were a large number of photographers present in Derry on Bloody Sunday. Both amateur and professional photographers using still and cine film captured many images of that day – from the gathering of the crowd at Bishop's Field in the cine film taken by Willie McKinney who was shot dead on Bloody Sunday which appears in video 32, to the horror of the image of the murdered Barney McGuigan lying dead on the street in a pool of his own blood P728.

5.4.2 A significant number of very helpful photographs were taken by amateur photographers, such as that taken of Michael Bridge by Sam Gillespie P188, and the cine film of the removal of the bodies from Glenfada Park and Gerry McKinney lying where he fell taken by Michael Rodgers which appears in video 52.

5.4.3 The failure of the army to produce the photographs taken by its photographers, who were undoubtedly present on the ground on Bloody Sunday has been addressed in section 4.3.

5.4.4 However, the photographs that are available to the Tribunal are invaluable, both in themselves as a record of what took place on that day, and also as an aid to the interpretation of other evidence and as an aid to witnesses in giving their evidence. They are the "eye of reality" rather than the "eye of faith" Day 072/142/13 to Day 072/142/14.

5.4.5 The value of photographs is well illustrated by those provided by Trevor McBride which show scenes in sector 4. Mr McBride was a freelance photographer who had been asked to cover the march for the Daily Mirror. Among the photographs he took that day are some of the few available photographs in sector 4 including the only photographs of the bodies in Glenfada Park. The shocking photographs which appear at P438 and P439 show two bodies and the legs of a third lying along the southern end of Glenfada Park North where they fell. These photographs were not before Lord Widgery's Tribunal which perhaps contributed to his confusion and led to his inability to distinguish between those who fell in Glenfada Park and those who fell in Abbey Park.

5.4.6 While by their nature still photographs record only a split second in time the large number of photographs in the Inquiry's possession can be pieced together to provide an indication of how events developed on the ground. The Tribunal also has a large amount of actuality footage shot by television crews who were present and which shows, inter alia, the movement of support company into the Bogside and the initial deployment of the soldiers once they debussed.

5.4.7 What the photographs and film footage show is that at no time does any soldier appear to be acting in a manner that suggests he is under fire. The photographs taken of soldiers in Rossville Street provide a good illustration of this

5.4.8 Quite apart from the value of their photographs as an independent record of the events of the day, the photographers themselves are obviously important eyewitnesses to those events. Not one photographer provides support, either photographic or otherwise, for the soldiers' case that

(i) they were justified in opening fire;
(ii) that those they shot were armed or acting in a manner that led soldiers to believe they were under threat;
(iii) that those they shot were in close proximity to someone who was armed or acting in a manner that led soldiers to believe they were under threat;
(iv) that gunmen and bombers were shot dead and/or injured and their bodies "spirited away".

5.4.9 The Interpretation of Photographic Material

5.4.9.1 This is a matter that the Tribunal can undertake itself, with the aid of the other evidence before it and having heard the evidence of many of the relevant photographers. This is the standard approach in all manner of proceedings as can be seen from R v Murphy [1990] NI 306, R v Stevens [2002] NI 361.

5.4.9.2 Those representing the soldiers have argued for a certain interpretation of a large number of photographs and indeed the Inquiry has had many photographs enhanced, often in an effort to clarify what an individual in a photograph is carrying. It is submitted that, with the exception of "Fr Daly's gunman" which is accepted and has been public knowledge for quite some time, none of the enhanced photographs shows any individual carrying anything more sinister than a stone.

5.4.9.3 It should also be noted that no similar interpretation was urged upon Lord Widgery in respect of the photographs that were before him.

5.4.10 Removal of Photographs/Missing Photographs

5.4.10.1 Those representing the soldiers have, on occasion, indicated during questioning that they believe that certain photographs are missing from a sequence. In addition, allegations appear to have been made against certain photographers during the course of their oral evidence that they have removed photographs that may show civilian gunmen/bombers from sequences of photographs taken by them.

5.4.10.2 When Ciaran Donnelly gave evidence he suggested that some of the photographs taken by him behind the rubble barricade and before he entered Glenfada Park North were missing Day 071/34/17 to Day 071/35/8. However when he was questioned by Arthur Harvey QC the following exchange took place

"Q. You come up eventually Rossville Street and you go behind the barricade; did you see anything behind the barricade which would have justified five people being shot dead by the army?

A. No.

Q. The army, according to the evidence that they have given in the past and intend to give in the future, would indicated that behind that barricade they alleged there were at least three riflemen, at least three people with blast bombs, one person with a sub-machine gun and three people with pistols. Did you see any of that?

A. If I had seen any guns or if any blast bombs had gone off, I would have left the area immediately." Day 071/50/18 to Day 071/51/6

5.4.10.3 Coleman Doyle also indicated that some of the film he shot that day was missing Day 072/149/24 to Day 072/150/18. However again his evidence was that when he was in Rossville Street in the vicinity of soldiers "I saw nobody shooting at them [the soldiers], or I did not even hear a bomb" Day 072/137/20 to Day 072/137/21.

5.4.10.4 Larry Doherty indicated that he had and the newspaper he worked for had given negatives out on loan over the years but that he had supplied the Inquiry with all the photographs in his possession except for two which were missing Day 070/110/25 to Day 070/111/11.

5.4.10.5 Robert White who was an amateur photographer indicated in his written evidence to the Tribunal that "Photographs numbered 14, 15, 19 and 23 are not attached to this statement. When these negatives were developed I was asked to destroy these photos as they showed people rioting and could be used as evidence against them. I have kept no copies of these negatives." AW11.3 paragraph 14.

5.4.10.6 When he gave oral evidence Mr White indicated that he was "terrified that anybody would get jail" and "it was an automatic sentence of six months for rioting" Day 137/98/7 to Day 137/100/4. It was never suggested to Mr White that those photographs he destroyed might have shown anything other than rioting.

5.4.10.7 In any event, Mr White had previously said that while he was at the rubble barricade he did not see anyone there throwing nail bombs or armed with a rifle or a pistol Day 137/90/22 to Day 137/91/2.

5.4.10.8 Eamon Melaugh gave evidence that he had given many of the negatives of his photographs to John Lloyd from Time Out and most were not returned. These photographs included, he said, some of bodies on the barricade. Understandably counsel to the Inquiry was sceptical about this claim Day 143/58/13 to Day 143/60/2.

5.4.10.9 The following passage appears in the Sunday Times insight article

"The photographer, Fulvio Grimaldi, also saw this gunman. He also is certain that the gunman did not appear until after the Army had killed Duddy and wounded others.."
L213

5.4.10.10 When he gave evidence Mr Grimaldi denied that he had told this to the Sunday Times team Day 131/43/15 to Day 131/43/9. He also said that he was never aware of photographing a gunman Day 131/44/25. He denied that he had taken and withheld the photograph an enhanced copy of which appears at E14.004 Day 131/47/8 to Day 131/47/15. When interviewed by Paul Mahon Mr Grimaldi appeared to admit to taking the photograph but indicated that he did not see the man fire and did not think he was aware the man had a gun X4.48.52 to X4.48.53.

5.4.10.11 Whatever view one takes of Mr Grimaldi's evidence it is clear that his actions have had no effect on the Tribunal's search for the truth of what happened on Bloody Sunday. The Sunday Times team were aware of its existence, a copy of the photograph is in the Inquiry's possession and the Tribunal has heard much evidence about the man depicted therein, including receiving written evidence from that man himself.

5.4.11 Sequencing

5.4.11.1 As with other witnesses the memories of the photographers who have given evidence have faded and/or distorted as a result of the passage of time. As a result of this not only their testimony as to what they saw may be confused but also the sequence in which they took their photographs. This can be seen, for example, from the evidence of Coleman Doyle Day 072/144/10 to Day 072/144/16.

5.4.11.2 Problems about the sequence in which photographs were taken is often remedied, however, by a study of the contact sheets that have been provided to the Inquiry.

5.4.11.3 In addition photographers may have been using more than one camera and therefore the shots taken from one camera may be interspersed with shots from another (see for example the evidence of Coleman Doyle Day 072/152/3 to Day 072/152/12).

5.4.12 Conclusion

5.4.12.1 It is submitted that the photographic evidence available to the Tribunal is an invaluable tool in the search for the truth about Bloody Sunday. We submit that

(i) The photographic evidence provides no support for the soldiers' case that they were justified in opening fire;

(ii) The evidence of the photographers provides no support for the soldiers' case that they were justified in opening fire and;

(iii) There are no "missing photographs" of significance save those that have not been produced to the Inquiry by the Army.

5.5 Journalists

5.5.1 Introduction

5.5.1.1. This section is intended as a general comment on the evidence emanating from journalists which is before the Tribunal and the approach that should be adopted towards its assessment.

5.5.1.2. The Tribunal has received a large amount of material from journalists. It can be categorised in different manners but principally it can be divided into evidence from those who were present on the day and evidence from those who conducted investigations after the event.

5.5.1.3. Those who were present on Bloody Sunday are a distinct category of eyewitness to the events of the day. They are a distinct category because they were clearly there for a certain purpose i.e. as observers and to a certain extent were trained as such.

5.5.1.4. In addition, there have been a number of investigations conducted by journalists after the event which have generated a huge amount of material now before this Tribunal. These include the investigation of the Sunday Times Insight team which was conducted within a matter of weeks of the event and that conducted by the Praxis films team in 1991.

5.5.1.5. Those investigations alone have provided a large amount of material to this Inquiry which has often clarified and supplemented the evidence of many of those who have given evidence.

5.5.1.6. Clearly it would be ideal if the Tribunal could immediately and without equivocation rely on the evidence of all the journalists who have appeared before it. However, it is obviously the case that the evidence of journalists must, in common with the evidence of civilians, soldiers and others be properly assessed and the Tribunal give it such weight as is appropriate in light of that assessment.

5.5.1.7. It is obviously not the case that all of the evidence given by journalists can be classed as beyond reproach. Journalists are equally as fallible and subject to emotion as other classes of witness. What should set them apart is

(i) their ability to observe and record events;

(ii) their ability to comment on a situation with objectivity and;

(iii) their ability to recognise, if appropriate, where objectivity is being compromised, by whom, and for what reasons.

5.5.1.8. In light of this there are two particular issues that must be weighed in the balance when assessing the evidence of journalists. Given that they can be identified as a distinct category of witness the Tribunal must be particularly careful not to elevate them to a status which dispenses with the need to properly assess their independence and accuracy.

5.5.2. Independence

5.5.2.1. It is beyond doubt that the vast majority of the journalists who were present on Bloody Sunday and those who conducted investigations into the events of Bloody Sunday were independent witnesses and journalists of integrity and the Tribunal should be reluctant to dismiss their evidence, or the evidence gathered by them, without very good reason. However, it is also possible that some journalists were disproportionately influenced by political pressure, their own agendas or that they were manipulated by the governmental publicity machine and that such influence coloured the information presented by them.

5.5.2.2. That the media could come under considerable pressure from the government and the army in 1972 can clearly be seen. John Barry has said "INSIGHT'S articles on Northern Ireland had brought criticism of a vitriol hard now to comprehend" M3.2 paragraph 9. In addition the Tribunal is aware of the reaction of the Ministry of Defence to the critical article about the Parachute Regiment in Northern Ireland published in the Guardian in the week before Bloody Sunday[1]. John Barry has recognised this when he says that it is important that journalists were "intent on finding out what was actually happening rather than merely regurgitating the British Army's version of events..." M3.1 paragraph 4.

5.5.3. Accuracy

5.5.3.1. When Peter Pringle gave evidence the following exchange took place

[1] See Simon Hoggart's statement at M41.2 paragraphs 5 to 6 and also the documents attached at M41.6, M41.7 and M41.8

"Q... When you are dealing with individuals who are not to be named as sources, again you have to be extremely cautious in relation to the information that is being supplied to you?

A. Correct.

Q. Some people may be simply mendacious?

A. Absolutely.

Q. Some people may want to inflate their own self-importance in events that go on around them?

A. That is correct.

Q. And some people no matter what they tell you will deny it later to any other person who asks?

A. They may do.

Q. And one of the dangers really apparent after 30 years is that people simply forget?

A. Correct.

Q. When they forget they sometimes forget even talking to journalists at all?

A. Correct." Day 190/143/22 to Day 190/144/15

5.5.3.2. Therefore one of the issues that must be considered by the Tribunal is the accuracy of the account recorded by the journalist. In this context accuracy has double significance in that the Tribunal must examine not only the journalist's methodology but also any information that may affect the veracity of the source.

5.5.3.3. Where an independent record of an account exists such as a tape or film recording, that will obviously speak for itself, however when reliance is placed on notes which are simple hearsay or perhaps even "double" or "triple" hearsay they must be treated with more caution.

5.5.3.4. In addition, where no recording of the contact with the source exists then the journalist's methodology must be examined along with the reliability of the source and any corroboration that exists for the information concerned.

5.5.3.5. It is also clear that people will often be prepared to divulge certain information to journalists where they would not be prepared to divulge the same information to other individuals or official bodies, such as this Inquiry. There may be a number of reasons for this including the following

(i) The individual may be expressly told that his/her identity as the source of the information will not be revealed;
(ii) S/he may assume such confidentiality;
(iii) The sensitivity of the information;
(iv) The individual has fears for his/her safety should s/he be identified as the source or in some way connected with the information;
(v) S/he may be giving information which suggests misconduct or the commission of criminal acts by him/herself or another;
(vi) S/he may simply feel at ease with the journalist;
(vii) S/he may feel that the journalist is sympathetic to his/her point of view;
(viii) S/he may believe that provision of the information, even if it is incriminating, will have no consequences for him/herself or others.

5.5.3.6. The result of this may mean that the content of a journalist's note or even the assertion that an interview or conversation took place may be hotly disputed by the claimed subject. Where such information is hotly disputed the journalist's integrity and accuracy is clearly a live and important issue.

5.5.3.7. The Tribunal must also be clear that articles and conclusions have been adequately sourced and corroborated. The drawing of definitive conclusions from one source is not thought to be good practice. In this regard the Tribunal is referred to the manner in which Mr Clarke and Ms Johnson conducted their task Day 387/198/3 to Day 387/205/20.

5.5.4. Journalists present on Bloody Sunday

5.5.4.1. Having said all that however, and having noted above the general points that can be made about evidence from journalists, the evidence from journalists who were on the ground on Bloody Sunday is clear.

5.5.4.2. No journalist has reported seeing anything that provided justification for the deaths and injuries that occurred on Bloody Sunday. Nor does their evidence corroborate that of the soldiers.

5.5.4.3. In this regard the Tribunal is referred, for example to the evidence of the ABC cameraman Barry Fox whose footage can be seen on Video 48. He says "I did not see or hear any civilian gunmen or nail bombs and I did not see, hear, sense or feel any incoming fire towards the soldiers or in my direction. At the time I was completely open minded as to what had happened, but clearly, what had happened was a mess that the Army was going to have to explain." M115.12 paragraph 63.

5.6 Civilian Evidence

5.6.1 Introduction

5.6.1.1 This section is intended as a general comment on the evidence emanating from civilians that is before the Tribunal. It will provide a brief outline of the sub-categories of evidence within this category and provide a broad outline o four submissions on the civilian evidence before the Tribunal and the approach that should be adopted towards its assessment.

5.6.1.2 The Tribunal has directly and indirectly received a huge amount of evidence from civilians. Broadly speaking the civilian evidence supports the following conclusions:

(i) Paratroopers entered the Bogside in at speed in vehicles and drove through the crowd.

(ii) They immediately began assaulting unarmed civilians and then opened fire indiscriminately and without justification.

(iii) A small number of isolated shots were fired by gunmen on the day which had no impact whatsoever on the activities of the Paratroopers.

(iv) No nail bombs were thrown at the Paratroopers.

(v) No acid bombs were thrown at the Paratroopers.

(vi) The Paratroopers illegally arrested and unlawfully detained civilians and unlawfully assaulted many of them.

(vii) A number of Paratroopers shot from the hip.

(viii) A significant number of Paratroopers were "hyped up" and / or aggressive.

(ix) Some Paratroopers obstructed medical personnel and then gloated over casualties.

5.6.2 Categories of Civilian Evidence

There are three main categories of civilian evidence.

5.6.2.1 1972 Civilian Evidence

(i) Transcripts of Interviews given by civilians to persons associated with the Civil Rights Association on the evening of Bloody Sunday in its immediate aftermath to persons such as Kathleen Keville.

(ii) Some unsigned "statements" that were typed up as a result of these interviews.

(iii) Statements that were taken by local teachers, priests, nuns, Civil Rights activists and sometimes taken by the witnesses themselves in the weeks after Bloody Sunday.

(iv) Statements prepared by the Order of Malta in the aftermath of the killings.

(v) Civilians provided statements to the Treasury Solicitor at the Widgery Inquiry and, depending on whether they were called to give evidence or not, there may be transcripts of their oral evidence to that Tribunal.

(vi) Civilians provided interviews over the course of the months following Bloody Sunday to the Sunday Times Insight Team journalists.

5.6.2.2 This evidence is clearly of importance as it was obtained very close to the actual events themselves.

5.6.2.3 Many of those witnesses who gave evidence before this Inquiry were among the five hundred or so who provided statements after the events of the day in 1972. The decision to have a statement taking exercise and the manner in which statements were collected in 1972 offer a unique insight not only into event itself, but also the alienated status that the vast majority of the people of Derry who had been witness to the events of Bloody Sunday felt in respect of the agencies of law and order. By providing written statements in 1972, people knowingly exposed themselves to the risk of possible arrest or prosecution. It was however clear to many that what they had witnessed, demanded the creation and presentation of some form of official record. It seems astonishing today that this responsibility fell to people such as students, teachers, civil servants, the clergy and local nuns for collation by voluntary bodies such as the Civil Rights Association and the National Council for Civil Liberties.

5.6.2.4 Having said that, this material has been invaluable to the present Inquiry as it has allowed witnesses to be able to refresh their memory in relation to the events that they witnessed. The 1972 material can and has been used as tools in order to expose discrepancies between statements provided by witnesses many years apart and reconcile differences. It enables the Tribunal to assess whether support is given or doubt should be cast on subsequent and more recent testimony.

5.6.2.5 Obviously many of these statements are very brief, lack clarity and were not taken by trained statement takers. Many of the statements appear to have been taken quickly in the course of a short period of time, without a period of reflection so that careful amendments, if required, could be made. It also has to be remembered that many witnesses who provided statements were undoubtedly recovering from the psychological impact of the events that they had witnessed often just days before and were making their statements in an atmosphere of extreme emotion.

5.6.2.6 In 1972, David Mills was a Producer for the BBC current affairs programme "24 Hours" and was sent by the BBC to go to Derry to prepare a programme on the findings of Widgery Tribunal in the context of the material that was available to him. He spent about four of five weeks in Northern Ireland doing research for the Widgery programme M108.11 paragraphs 1 to 4.

5.6.2.7 Whatever the reliability or accuracy of the stories he was being told, this was Mr Mills' impression:

> "I went to the Bogside and spoke to many people in their homes. I never felt threatened or sensed any personal danger. People wanted to talk, they did not want to hide anything. I did all the research myself, interviewing the key witnesses, such as Father Daly... My strong impression was that people had nothing to hide and there was no attempt to conceal anything. For example, I was told that a civilian had been seen with a gun and that a group of Officials had come into the Bogside but had left quickly" M108.13 paragraph 11

5.6.2.8 Interviews Provided Subsequent to 1972

(i) Interviews given to the media and various researchers over the course of the decades after Bloody Sunday. This includes the Praxis Material for Secret History; Interviews to Peter Taylor for Inside Story, Channel 4 and other documentaries.

(ii) More recently, interviews given to Paul Mahon, Don Mullan and Jimmy McGovern / Stephen Gargan have become available.

5.6.2.9 The overriding impression when considering this material is that despite the passage of time there is still a basic consistency in relation to the general propositions that emerge from the eyewitness accounts given by civilians, namely, that the Paratroopers went on a killing spree in the Bogside and then lied about the threat that they claimed to have faced in an attempt to cover up their murderous activities.

5.6.2.10 In any event the Inquiry has this material and the Tribunal can compare these accounts with any statements or evidence that was given in 1972.

5.6.2.11 Evidence given by Civilians to this Inquiry

(i) Hundreds of civilians have given statements to the Inquiry's statement takers, Eversheds. Professional lawyers have interviewed them over the course of many hours with the assistance of photographs, actuality footage and their own legal representatives. Time for reflection, consideration and amendment to draft statements and opportunity to make supplemental statements where necessary has been afforded.

(ii) The Tribunal has had the benefit of tested oral evidence if it has seen the need to call these witnesses and is in a position to assess their demeanour and truthfulness directly.

5.6.2.12 Quite apart from those factors referred to above, the level of reliability, which can be placed upon individual testimony, will vary from one witness to the next. All witnesses to the Inquiry have been exposed to factors that will understandably impinge upon the accuracy of their recollection.

5.6.2.13 The passage of time remains the dominant factor affecting accurate recall. In addition, subliminal influences, such as television, film and conversation, casually reinforced over a thirty-year period have all served to distort to varying degrees the accuracy of memory. It should also be recalled that for many of these people, the shocking and traumatic impact of the events themselves serves to impose its own potential limitations.

5.6.2.14 For the most part however a common thread of consistency unites virtually all the civilian witnesses who gave evidence before the Inquiry. They have been unable to forget the killings and woundings that they witnessed. With few exceptions the civilian witnesses have striven to provide a truthful and unbiased account of their experiences on that day. This has been largely reflected in the manner in which they were questioned by the interested parties.

5.6.2.15 As a category of witness, their evidence finds corroboration and therefore gains weight when considered along with the evidence of most of the journalists who were present on the day. Their evidence marries with the objective evidence of photographic material, the actuality footage and the audio material such as the North tape.

5.6.2.16 As a category of witness, they have come forward, some with reluctance and misgivings after the experience of the Widgery Tribunal and many at the request of the Families and Wounded to tell their story. The vast majority of civilian witnesses before this Tribunal were ordinary people who witnessed extraordinary events. They have done their best and tried to recall what they saw and experienced and unlike many of the soldiers they have not been afflicted with a collective amnesia:

> "Q. Does it strike you as rather odd that we are now in a situation where the people of Derry cannot forget what happened that day and the paratroopers cannot remember; is that the situation?
> A. I can appreciate that, but a lot, a lot of time has gone on since 31 years ago.
> Q. It is a very curious paradox; is it not?
> A. It certainly is, yes.
> Q. That those who have most to account for appear to have the most defective memories of them all; is that not right?
> A. If you say so.
> Q. Well, do you not agree with that? As far as you are concerned, that is the case?
> A. Then okay.
> Q. You have no explanation for that?
> A. No.
> Q. None at all?
> A. None at all. As I said, it was 31 years ago and since that event, I have been involved in a lot of experiences, of similar cases."

5.7 Priests

5.7.1 It is submitted that this category of witness requires special attention. In 1972 the Catholic Church was regarded and recognised as one of the most conservative institutions in Ireland. The attendance of priests at a Civil Rights March provided the moral endorsement for what many perceived as basic political demand. Traditionally their role in Irish Society was one in which they were implacably opposed to the IRA and generally in the early years of the Conflict were quite supportive of the forces of "law and order". One witness in particular described Father Mulvey as being "an anti-republican priest" AD26.4 paragraph 17. The clergy throughout the Troubles ritually condemned killings, IRA operations and called for Catholics not to support or join it. By way of example the Inquiry has OS8.45, which is the Lost Lives entry concerning the killing of Patrick Duffy in 1973. It is submitted that this is demonstrative of the type of fundamental disagreement and opposition that existed between the Catholic Church and the IRA.

5.7.2 It might be said that because they ministered to the people of the Creggan, Long Tower and the Bogside that these witnesses are biased and that their evidence should be approached with caution. However the answer to such a submission is simple: when it comes to good and evil, right or wrong, priests do not occupy a neutral middle-ground. They have a duty by their calling and their conscience to explain what they saw and make moral judgments thereon. What they saw on 30th January 1972 was "wilful murder" V4b/0.00 to 1.32.

5.7.3 It is clear from the photographic evidence and the actuality footage that the Clergymen can be seen to have been in the centre of events on Bloody Sunday:

(i) Father Daly was the Rossville Flats car park P627, P628, EP26.12 and P629, but he saw only one man armed with a handgun. The footage at V1/4.57 to 5.14 of him among the group carrying Jackie Duddy has become an iconic image of Bloody Sunday. He later gave an interview south of Block2 V1/8.06 to 9.20.

(ii) Father Carolan can be seen helping John Johnston into his VW beetle car at Columbcille Court V3/6.39 to 6.45.

(iii) Father Mulvey was in Abbey Park, the area north of Block 1 EP4.50, V3/6.00 to 6.39 and the Rossville Street area south of the Rossville Flats P426, P527, P528, P529, P530, P532, V1/7.28 to 8.00.

(iv) Father Irwin was with Father Mulvey when he was at the area north of Block1 EP4.50.

(v) Fathers Bradley P423, P426, P491, P435 and O'Keefe P435, P491, were at the southern end of the Glenfada Park gable facing onto Rossville Street, the Rubble Barricade but who also could see events in the Glenfada Park North Courtyard. Father Bradley later returned to Rossville Street V1/7.28 to 8.00.

(vi) Father O'Gara was at the south of Block2 P734, P733, P732 and in Joseph Place P842 to P829, P838, P839.

5.7.4 When one sees the Clergymen in the photographs and in the actuality footage one cannot be help but be struck by the fact that these men were genuinely horrified by what they saw the Paratroopers do to the civilians in Rossville Street. Not one of these witnesses described events that remotely correspond with the suggestion of being caught up in a "gun battle". Not one of these witnesses said that a bomb of any type exploded in the Bogside on Bloody Sunday and only Father Mulvey said that he heard a small amount of automatic fire H15.12. It is clear beyond peradventure that these witnesses described events during which everyone present had become the focus of an attack rather than the innocent or potential victim of an armed exchange.

5.7.5 From the outset the priests who witnessed events have openly acknowledged the presence of civilian gunmen. What is clear from their evidence on this topic is that civilian gunmen did not influence the conduct of the Parachute Regiment. Civilian gunfire took the form of isolated shots rather than any concerted attack on soldiers, went unnoticed by the soldiers and did not elicit any response.

5.7.6 It is not proposed to consider the evidence of each of these witnesses in detail but taking their evidence collectively this was their own assessment:

> "We accuse the Colonel of the Parachute Regiment of wilful murder. We accuse the Commander of Land Forces of being an accessory before the fact. We accuse the soldiers of shooting indiscriminately into a fleeing crowd, of gloating over casualties, of preventing medical and spiritual aid reaching some of the dying. It is untrue that shots were fired at the troops in Rossville Street before they attacked. It is untrue that any of the dead or wounded that we attended were armed. We make this statement in view of the distorted and, indeed, conflicting reports put out by Army officers. We deplore the actions of the Army and Government in deploying a unit such as the Paratroopers who were in Derry yesterday. These men are trained criminals. They differ from terrorists only in the veneer of respectability that a uniform gives them." V4b/0.00 to 1.32
> Father Anthony Mulvey, Press conference attended by Derry Clergymen 31st January 1972.

5.7.7 These priests represented the conscience of an oppressed community. Their presence supplied comfort, courage and support. Dennis Bradley summed up part of this role in the following way:

> "As priests we were therefore on the streets all the time. It was a sort of unwritten rule for the clergy that you went out on the streets on such occasions. There were also frightened people in their houses and people who could be calmed down and sometimes it was possible to speak to groups of youths and rioters and calm things down. You knew the routine. Also the Army got to know you."H1.4 paragraph 8

5.7.8 Other priests who gave evidence before the Tribunal echo this role.

After Michael Kelly was shot and given the last rites Dennis Bradley describes the atmosphere, which followed in this way:

> "It was pure panic. Chaos. People were shouting, running. There was shooting and the penny was beginning to drop. I began to understand that something terrible was happening out there in Rossville Street." H1.9 paragraph 23

5.7.9 The level of fear and panic provoked by what he clearly perceived to be the activities of the advancing soldiers is summed up by the recollection contained in H1.10 paragraph 25:

> "Three things stick in my memory of these moments. First the three bodies at the Barricade. Secondly I was vaguely conscious of Paddy O'Donnell who was wounded beside me. Thirdly there was a man in panic who had become hysterical. I had a strong feeling that I was duty bound to go out to the Barricade but I was terrified of being shot. I was afraid and someone held me back. I remember being terrified that they might stop holding me back. I was conscious of my own survival."

5.7.10 In relation to Michael McDaid, John Young and William Nash, Dennis Bradley related both how these youths could not have been armed and the intensity of the gunfire that was directed at the Barricade:

> ""I was aware of the dead boy nearest to me on the barricade. I did not see anything in his hands. He was only a few yards away but it was just not possible for anyone to have taken away a weapon he might have had. I knew that if I got out there I would be dead. No one went out there. There was too much firing. The gunfire was intensive. That was definitely its heaviest period that afternoon." H1.12 paragraph 28

5.7.11 This description of event provides a forthright outline of how Dennis Bradley in the calling of his vocation faced the biggest challenge of his role as a priest. Minutes beforehand, one of his colleagues, the then Father Edward Daly faced a similar test. Father Daly confirmed the role that many priests provided during these occasions:

> "It was my custom during those years to go to Rossville Street and William Street when there were disturbances occurring or when disturbances threatened. I went there because there were large numbers of elderly people resident in that area, especially in Kells Walk, Glenfada Park and Columbcille Court. They were often frightened and they were particularly discomforted and alarmed when CS gas was used or when there was explosions or gunfire." H5.1 paragraph 4

5.7.12 Father Daly's experiences highlight just one of a number of courageous and highly distinctive actions on that day:

> "I was quite paralysed by fear and I lay were I was and I looked back again and I could see this boy who had been hit beside me lying on the ground and blood pouring out over his shirt. So I decided there and then to kind of try and get to him and minister to him and I took a handkerchief from my pocket. I waved it while I lay on the ground then I decided to pick myself up and I just in a crouched position ran over towards this boy and got down on my knees beside him. I then lay down beside him." H5.12

5.7.13 Father Daly then recalled in graphic detail how Charles Glenn a Volunteer in the Knights of Malta joined him. He described Charles Glenn's attempts to save the life of Jackie Duddy in the following way:

"He tried to use some time of pad or other to staunch the flow of blood from this wound on his chest and I remember he started to weep and said "Father, are we going to be killed." I remember actually I wept too with him. We both wept together for quite some time and we were very, very frightened." H5.13 to H5.14

5.7.14 It will be recalled that when Father Daly was describing this event before Lord Widgery he volunteered a description of an incident in which he saw a civilian gunman wearing a brown jacket fire two or three shots at soldiers from the gable end of Chamberlain Street. Motivated by a genuine and real fear for the safety of himself and those around him he screamed at the man to "Go away" who responded by leaving the scene. WT4.11.D-F, H5.19 to H5.20

5.7.15 It is important to note that this account was offered without prompting or encouragement from either his Counsel or the Tribunal itself. This illustrates the truthful nature of his evidence and how in particular it reflects on all the priests who were present on that day. Significantly, Father Daly during the period that he came under fire failed to see any other activity, which would have justified the use of firearms at that time. It is particularly worth noting that it was never at any time suggested to him that he saw or heard more than he alleged or that he was attempting to conceal matters from the Tribunal that would have justified the behaviour of the soldiers.

5.7.16 Apart from Father Daly, the only other clergyman who witnessed a civilian gunman was Father Tom O'Gara. This is what he told the Treasury Solicitor:

"A young man appeared from the Cathedral side of Kells Walk unknown and unseen by soldiers, drew a pistol from his pocket leaned over a wall at the end of Kells Walk and fired three shots quickly. The soldiers didn't even recognise his presence and he disappeared. This was the only weapon I saw throughout that day. The man wore a "longish" coat. He was completely separated from the main crowd even those around the Barricade on Rossville Street. There was at no stage any gunfire from behind me or beside me. I am certain the revolver was fired after the troops opened fire." H19.5 to H19.6

5.7.17 The witness later related the same incident to Lord Widgery WT7.86 B-C

The witness went on to recount that he observed this incident from a distance of approximately 70 yards away and how during this period he failed to see any other men with firearms that day. The witness however expressed a firm belief as to the ultimate responsibility for events in the Bogside in the following exchange with Mr Gibbens QC:

"Q. You had indeed shared the very strong views held by Father Daly and the other priests about this matter?
A. Yes.
Q. Where you party to saying that you charged the Colonel of the Parachute Regiment with wilful murder?
A. I am party to saying that.
Q. Where you party to saying that you accused the Commander of Land Forces as being an accessory before the fact?
A. Yes.
Q. Do you still hold to that?
A. I do.
Q. That is your belief is it?
A. Yes." WT7.87 F-G; WT7.88 A

5.7.18 A number of other priests including Father Carolan, Father McIvor, Father Mulvey, Father McLaughlin, Father Kieran Doherty and Father O'Keefe provide a series of recollections consistent with the atmosphere and images that have been highlighted by the references above. All of them provided evidence, which clearly demonstrated that the activities of the Army on this occasion were vastly disproportionate to any perceived or actual threat on the ground.

Father McIvor accurately recalls:

> "I notice a youth of about fifteen throwing stones at the roof of the GPO sorting office. It was then that I saw that a soldier was lying on the front edge of the roof with a rubber bullet gun. I did not see him firing any rubber bullets but his colleague standing behind him fired a number at the youth and into the crowd. One bullet in fact hit me on the right leg. CS gas was also fired. The soldier who had been lying down stood up and changed his rubber bullet gun for a rifle. He then made as though to shoot at the youth who was still throwing stones, also a bottle. His threats had no effect and he retired to the back of the roof. Some 5 to 6 minutes later, two shots at least rang out which I am sure came from the area of the Sorting Office and the Presbyterian Church. I did not actually see how fired the shots. Two people, one either side of me and about fifteen yards from me fell to the ground wounded. I was told that there John Johnston, aged about 57 and Damien Donaghy aged 17. Another priest, Father Carolan attended to them." H11.9

5.7.19 The importance of this witness in relation to events in Sector 1 was highlighted during the course of the Widgery Tribunal when asked the following question:

> "Q. Did you hear any further shooting at that time?
> A. At that stage, no, I did not hear any further shooting.
> Q. Had you heard any shooting before the two shots you have told the Tribunal about?
> A. No, the first two shots I heard in William Street were the first shots that I heard that afternoon. WT4.50 B

5.7.20 The confidence expressed by this witness in respect of the sequence of shots in William Street was reasserted with equal certainty before this Tribunal Day 055/22/8 to Day 055/23/1.

In keeping with virtually all the other witnesses in this category, the witness went on to confirm the witnesses that he did not hear any nail bombs nor did he see any petrol bombs explode that day WT4.50 D.

5.7.21 It is proposed in this section to restrict all comments in respect of this category of witness for the purposes of providing an overall general impression of the evidence. The important and overriding feature of this evidence concerns the unanimity of agreement to the effect that even where gunmen were identified, they were small in number and their activities and actions provided neither the justification nor the reason to open fire as they did.

We rely on the evidence of the clergymen for the following propositions:

i) The first shots in this area came from the Army (Father Carolan H3.8; Father McIvor WT4.50.B; Father McLaughlin H13.5 paragraph 9)

ii) No nail bombs exploded in this area at all. (Father Carolan H3.2 paragraphs 8 to 9; H3.9; Father McLaughlin H3.13; Reverend Brother Egan H8.1, Father McIvor H11.9, WT4.53 D-E)

iii) There were no weapons near Damien Donaghy or John Johnston when they were shot. (Father Carolan H3.9, Father McLaughlin H13.5 paragraph 10,)

i) No nail, petrol or acid bombs exploded in this area whilst Bishop Day was there (Bishop Daly Day 75/57/19 to Day 75/58/3)

ii) During the period Bishop Daly tended to Jackie Duddy there were no shots fired towards the soldiers position with the exception of the pistol shots fired by OIRA4, of which the Paratroopers were unaware. (Bishop Daly H5.4 paragraph 18, H5.6 paragraph 24)

5.7.23 Sector 3

(i) Apart from the pistol man witnessed by Father O'Gara at the northern end of Kells Walk, no other fire was directed at the Paras in this area. Again this gunfire was unseen and unnoticed by the Paras. (Father O'Gara H19.5 to H19.6)

(ii) Michael Kelly was shot first on the Rubble Barricade. (Fathers Bradley H1.41 and O'Keefe H21.21, H21.46 paragraph 13)

(iii) After John Young, Michael McDaid and William Nash were shot on the Barricade, firing was so intensely directed at this area that the priests could not get access to them (Fathers Bradley H1.12 paragraph 28, H1.9 paragraph 23 to H1.10 paragraph 24 and O'Keefe H21.47 paragraph 16)

(iv) When John Young, Michael McDaid and William Nash were shot it is submitted that even if weapons had been present at the Barricade the civilians present could not have removed them due to the concentration of fire (Fathers Bradley H1.12 paragraph 28, H1.9 paragraph 23 to H1.10 paragraph 24 and O'Keefe H21.47 paragraph 16).

(v) There were no missing casualties on the Rubble Barricade (Fathers Bradley H1.41 and O'Keefe H21.22, H21.46 paragraphs 13 to 15)

(vi) There were no gunmen, nail bombers or petrol bombers on the Rubble Barricade (Fathers Bradley Day 140/180/15 to Day 140/182/9 and O'Keefe H21.21, H21.52 paragraph 34)

(vii) There was no firing from the Rubble Barricade or explosions in Rossville Street (Fathers Bradley Day 140/180/15 to Day 140/182/9, H1.41 and O'Keefe H21.21, H21.52 paragraph 34)

(viii) Kevin McElhinney was unarmed as he crawled from the Rubble Barricade to the entrance of Block1. Nor was anyone else crawling from the Rubble Barricade to Block1 who was armed (Father O'Keefe H21.22, H21.47 paragraph 17)

(ix) There was no-one firing from the entrance to Block1 (Father O'Keefe H21.52 paragraph 34)

(x) John Young, Michael McDaid and William Nash were initially denied spiritual aid (Fathers Mulvey WT4.28F to WT4.30A, H15.13 and Irwin H9.6)

(xi) John Young, Michael McDaid and William Nash were denied medical aid (Fathers Mulvey H15.13 and Irwin H9.6)

5.7.24 Sector 4

(i) There were no armed men at the southern end of Glenfada Park North (Fathers Bradley H1.42 and O'Keefe H21.22, H21.52 paragraph 34)

(ii) There was no firing at soldiers in Glenfada Park (Fathers Bradley Day 140/180/15 to Day 140/182/9 and O'Keefe H21.48 paragraph 18)

(iii) There were no nail bomb explosions or petrol bomb explosions in Glenfada Park North (Fathers Bradley Day 140/180/15 to Day 140/182/9 and O'Keefe H21.52 paragraph 34)

(iv) There were no missing casualties in Glenfada Park North (Fathers Bradley H1.42 and O'Keefe H21.80)

(v) William McKinney, Joe Mahon and Jim Wray were denied spiritual aid by the Anti-tank Platoon in Glenfada Park North (Fathers Bradley H1.14 paragraph 33 H1.42 and O'Keefe)

(vi) There were no missing casualties in Abbey Park (Fathers Mulvey, McLaughlin H13.2, H13.7 paragraph 24; Father O'Doherty H17.8)

5.7.25 Sector 5

i) There were no missing casualties in Sector 5 (Father O'Gara H19.6)

5.8 IRA Evidence

5.8.1 Introduction

This section is intended to set out the position of the Families and Wounded whom we represent in respect of evidence in relation to the involvement of both wings of the IRA on Bloody Sunday. Our clients have always been clear that it was essential that all witnesses who had anything to contribute to establishing the truth must provide that evidence to the Inquiry. On any appraisal of that evidence, it is clear that whatever the IRA involvement it had no impact on what occurred in the areas where our clients were killed and wounded.

5.8.2 On 27th November 2000 in the course of his opening statement, Counsel for the Soldiers complained for the first time about what he perceived as being a wholly and exceptional process of one-sided discovery Day 051/7/12 to Day 051/7/15.

5.8.3 The Families of the deceased and Wounded have consistently called for all those who had relevant evidence to give to come forward and tell the Tribunal. Arthur Harvey QC on 8th February 2001 made the following appeal during a pause in the evidence of Mr William Harley:

> "...If the truth of what occurred on 30th January 1972 is ever to be established, told and acknowledged, now is the time to do it.
> By "our clients", I refer to all of the 27 families represented by this Inquiry and urge anyone whoever has anything to contribute, to come forward and do so now and, indeed, are deeply saddened that some individuals have not done so.

This morning the Tribunal offered an opportunity to interested parties to make suggestions which would assist the Tribunal in establishing that truth.... We believe that there are genuine positive steps that we can take in conjunction with this Inquiry which will assist... I genuinely believe that there is a deep-seated commitment of these families which has to be brought home and brought to bear on those who are reluctant, for whatever reason, to come forward which they must realise, they must acknowledge, as this Tribunal stated, the only vindication of what occurred in relation to these families must be the whole truth, even its unpalatable aspects." Day 077/87/12 to Day 077/89/11

5.8.4 On the same day the Families made a strong appeal through the media that it was incumbent on former members of the IRA to give evidence to the Inquiry.

5.8.5 An article published three days later in The Sunday Tribune stated that a number of Official IRA members would come forward after a direct appeal by the journalist Eamonn McCann. When he gave evidence, Mr McCann said:

"I went to a number of people at that point and after the appeal which had been made here, and put it to them, telling them that I proposed to write about this and asking them to speak to me and I put it to them in robust terms that many people in Derry would not understand if they did not come forward." Day 087/55/2 to Day0 87/55/8

5.8.6 Mr McCann in his evidence said that his belief was that the only people who could provide the Tribunal with accurate reliable information as to the activities of the IRA on Bloody Sunday were members of the IRA and that no-one other than the members of those organisations could give credible accounts of what they did Day 087/55/9 to Day 087/56/2. The witness confirmed that he had been aware of the feelings of the Families in relation to this aspect for a very long time. He further acknowledged that the Families had been exceptionally anxious to use whatever moral or other persuasive forces they had available to them to get these witnesses to come forward Day 087/56/20 to Day 087/57/12.

5.8.7 The position of the Families represented by Madden & Finucane was accurately summarised by Mr McCann when he was questioned by Arthur Harvey QC:

> "I think it is the feeling of the families that for as long as IRA members do not come forward, then for as long as IRA members do not come forward, then they are in effect polluting the truth about Bloody Sunday by not clearing up what they are doing." Day 087/57/13 to Day 087/57/17

5.8.8 During the period of 2001 to 2003 the Tribunal on a number of occasions voiced its disquiet at the fact that there had been a dearth of evidence coming from those persons who had been members of the IRA at the relevant time. Lord Saville made a direct appeal on 20th June 2002 Day 224/158/3 to Day 224/159/12.

In addition:

(i) The Lawton team again set out their concerns by way of a detailed written submission on 16th April 2003.

(ii) Lord Saville repeated his request for witnesses who fell into this category to come forward on 8th July 2003 Day 358/1/1 to Day 358/3/19.

(iii) We received on 10th July 2003 from the Inquiry two lever arch files of Intelligence material that are found in the INT bundle.

(iv) Counsel for the Soldiers again raised, this time orally, their unease in respect of the lack of evidence about the activity or inactivity of IRA on 24th September 2003 Day 371/220/1 to Day 371/229/6.

(v) In reply on the same date Counsel for the Tribunal Mr Clarke QC informed the interested parties that the Intelligence documents that are found in INT bundles were the result of a major exercise that took place with the assistance of the Security Agencies and the PSNI. Much of that material was the direct result of the antecedents exercise, although some was not. Mr Clarke QC further informed us that once the material was assembled and redacted, the Inquiry embarked upon a process of communicating with relevant individuals, who could be traced in an effort to obtain statements from them and also, where relevant, addressing with them any Article 2 considerations that arose in relation to the deployment of that material. By that stage the Inquiry was in contact with a number of individuals who had instructed solicitors with a view to providing statements and giving evidence Day 371/229/10 to Day 371/232/5.

5.8.9 In a letter dated 11th March 2004 the Solicitor to the Inquiry confirmed the position in respect of the Inquiry's efforts to secure the co-operation of 82 witnesses who were or may have been involved in the Official IRA, the Provisional IRA and Na Fianna at the relevant time. It emerged that the Inquiry managed to trace 68 potential witnesses who may have been in a position to assist. Of this number, 50 co-operated with the Inquiry to the extent that they were asked to do so and whilst two were not willing to be interviewed by Eversheds, they still attended to provide oral evidence. We were informed that 7 apparently refused to co-operate, including PIRA9 who is to be referred to the High Court for his disobedience of a witness summons. Of the other six, two are resident outside of the jurisdiction and the remaining four were considered not sufficiently important to issue a witness summons.

5.8.10 Red Mickey Doherty, who later died, was among seven who were unable to assist for medical reasons.

The remainder are set out in the letter, which was sent to all the interested parties.

5.8.11 This represents a significant engagement by these witnesses with the Inquiry. It is generally acknowledged that this was the first time that Republicans have of their own accord given information publicly in respect of the structures, practices, modus operandi, weaponry and operational activity of the organisation to what they would consider as being a British Legal body (Evidence of PIRA 24 Officer Commanding Derry Command Provisional IRA) Day 427/114/2 to Day 427/114/12.

5.8.12 The Inquiry heard from and tested orally evidence from over thirty witnesses who had evidence relevant to either the IRA or Na Fianna.

5.8.13 Evidence was given and tested in respect of the following areas:

(i) Extent of weaponry, membership, intelligence, structures and modus operandi;
(ii) The extent of assurances that were provided to NICRA;
(iii) Orders for the day;
(iv) Movements on the day;
(v) Armed activity on the day and deployment of weapons;
(vi) So-called "Missing Casualties";
(vii) The role and access of Na Fianna to weaponry and explosives;

(viii) Relationship with the opposite wing of the IRA and "joint operations"

(ix) The use of the Rossville Flats as a prime location for snipers

5.8.14 In light of this evidence it is submitted that:

(i) There was no intention by the IRA to use this Civil Rights March to attack the British Army.

(ii) The activities and actions of either wing of the IRA did not, in any meaningful way, impact on the activities and actions of the Paratroopers. Rather, there appears to have been a number of attacks on the Resident Battalions on the City Walls and at Barrack Street.

(iii) The activities and actions of either wing or the IRA did not, in any meaningful way, impact on the murders and wounding of our clients.

(iv) OIRA1 fired his shot at the Paras on the northern side of William Street after the shooting of Damien Donaghy and John Johnston. In all probability this was the "drainpipe shot". It is difficult to speculate upon the precise impact that the incident involving the "drain pipe shot" and OIRA1 would have had upon the events of the day. It should be recalled that within the timescale of events this incident occurred some time before troops entered the Bogside. The Tribunal's attention is drawn to the fact that when soldiers directly involved in this particular incident supplied initial accounts about their experiences on the day, all of them chose to omit any reference to the experience. There is an obvious inference to be drawn from the failure of the Paratroopers who were in the vicinity of the Presbyterian Church to record this in their first RMP statements. Clearly on the evening of Bloody Sunday, they did not attach the same significance to this event, which was later represented as an incident of greater importance, when it came to the provision of subsequent accounts. In no sense did they regard it as the opening shot in a gunbattle.

(v) Neither wing of the IRA opened fire from the Rossville Flats on the Paratroopers as they entered the Bogside.

(vi) The only firing that was directed towards the Paratroopers in Sector 2 was by OIRA4 who opened fire with his handgun and this was unnoticed by all the Paratroopers. It is clear from all the military evidence that his presence did not in any way cause or contribute to the actions of soldiers already within the vicinity of Rossville Flats. It will be recalled that Jackie Duddy had already been shot and it is therefore difficult to envisage how the event could cast any blame or responsibility on the deceased or wounded.

(vii) The only firing that was directed towards the Paratroopers in Sector 3 was from the man with the handgun that fired from the northern end of Kells Walk and who was witnessed by Father O'Gara. Like the OIRA4 incident, this firing was again unnoticed by the Paratroopers in Rossville Street.

(viii) The incident concerning Father O'Gara's gunman has yet to be explained in evidence by an IRA witness.

(ix) There was no firing by the IRA from the Rubble Barricade or from the entrance to Block 1 or from the southern end of Block1.

(x) There was no firing by the IRA at Paratroopers in Glenfada Park North or Abbey Park.

(xi) There was no firing by the IRA at Paratroopers from the area of Joseph Place or Sector 5.

(xii) There were no youths with nail bombs in Glenfada Park North.

(xiii) There was no armed activity by Na Fianna at all on Bloody Sunday.

(xiv) No nail bombs were thrown or exploded at all on Bloody Sunday.

(xv) No petrol bombs were thrown or exploded at all on Bloody Sunday.

(xvi) No acid bombs were thrown or exploded at all on Bloody Sunday.

(xvii) There seems little doubt that both wings of the IRA made a deliberate decision to distance themselves from the march itself. All the evidence appears to imply that the subsequent response by members of both wings of the IRA is consistent with an organisation that had been caught "on the hop". Many of their members gave evidence to the effect that they had attended the demonstration in an individual capacity. This evidence went unchallenged. There has been other evidence to suggest that members of the Provisional IRA were subjected to recrimination and criticism for what was perceived by some as an abject failure to protect the community.

(xviii) It will be recalled that when OIRA1 discharged a "retaliatory" round, he was surrounded by a group of people included three Provisionals, Sean Keenan, PIRA1 and RM1 who vigorously challenged his use of a weapon irrespective of the reasons. Similarly in relation to the OIRA4 incident, Gerry Doherty, a member of the Provisional IRA assisted in preventing OIRA4 from discharging further shots whilst in the vicinity of the Chamberlain Street gable. It is respectfully submitted that these incidents fall considerably short of identifying any combined or planned military response to the presence of the Parachute Regiment on the streets of Derry. In fact they actually suggest the opposite to be the case.

(xix) It is remarkable that, given the speed with which members of the Parachute Regiment seized control of the entire area, they remained unable or incapable of arresting anyone in possession of a firearm. In addition, they failed to recover an abandoned firearm, a nail bomb, blast bomb or even a petrol bomb.

5.8.15 We deal below with evidence from civilian and media witnesses concerning the presence of civilian gunmen or nail bombers on Bloody Sunday but by way of conclusion it is respectfully submitted that the actions or activities of both wings of the IRA had little or no impact on the tragic events of Bloody Sunday. The absence of any independent or corroborating evidence to suggest otherwise, for example the capture of a firearm, the death of an IRA Volunteer or a press or military photograph confirming the presence of any armed resistance to the Paras seems to provide conclusive proof that any allegation to the contrary is patently untrue.

6. HISTORICAL BACKGROUND

6.1. Introduction and Summary of Submissions

6.1.1. No examination of the circumstances surrounding the march that took place in Derry on 30th January 1972 would be complete without some comment on and analysis of the historical background to that march and the political context in which it took place. This has been recognised by the Tribunal who have commissioned and received reports from two academics, Professor Arthur of the University of Ulster and Professor Bew of Queens University, Belfast.

6.1.2. This section provides an analysis and critique of the experts' reports as well as a short narrative of the events that shaped Northern Ireland in general and Derry in particular between the formation of the state and the end of 1971.

6.1.3. The reports provided by the two experts engaged by the Inquiry are of some assistance in providing a context in which the events leading up to Bloody Sunday can be placed. So far as the political decisions that were made in the weeks and months before Bloody Sunday are concerned however, they are not a substitute for the documents in the Tribunal's possession and the evidence it has heard. A more detailed study of the immediate political context in which relevant decisions were made and the march took place appears at section seven.

6.1.4. As far as the historical background to the events of Bloody Sunday is concerned it can be seen in the background to the civil rights campaign in Northern Ireland and the policies and actions of the Stormont government since the formation of the state.

6.1.5. Unionist government of Northern Ireland was characterised by a determination to maintain the unionist and Protestant ethos of the state.

This led to discrimination against the Catholic minority in all areas of life. In Derry, public employment, housing and the local government franchise were areas of particular grievance, such grievances found to be justified by the Cameron Commission.

6.1.6. The actions of the Northern Ireland administration and their effects were exacerbated by the failure of the UK government and Parliament to intervene on questions relating to the government of Northern Ireland.

6.1.7. As a result a civil rights movement was established in Northern Ireland, composed of many different and mainly local groups. One of the methods employed by the movement for drawing awareness to its campaign was marches. These began in 1968 and met with fierce opposition from the Unionist government and people in Northern Ireland.

6.1.8. The reaction to the civil rights campaign in Northern Ireland and the marches held by that movement brought divisions within Unionism to the fore. Many characterised the civil rights movement as a front for subversive activity designed to overthrow the Northern Ireland state and were opposed to any move towards reform.

6.1.9. Violent disturbances and public disorder became more and more frequent in Northern Ireland. Media coverage of the civil rights campaign led to pressure on the UK government which, in turn, put further pressure on the Northern Ireland government to introduce reforms which would satisfy the minority.

6.1.10. Also at this time the composition of the RUC and the 'B Specials', their perceived unity of purpose with certain elements of unionism and their actions in the policing of marches and public disturbances led to a total loss of confidence within the Catholic community for the police. This was particularly apparent in areas such as the Bogside in Derry.

6.1.11. Particularly serious disturbances and violence between the police and civilians at the "Battle of the Bogside" in Derry in 1969 led to the deployment of troops there and in Belfast shortly afterwards. While initially welcomed by most of the Catholic people, support amongst them for the troops soon waned and turned to hostility with their increasingly aggressive actions including the shooting of civilians in disputed circumstances with apparent impunity, house searches and the use of CS gas and rubber bullets.

6.1.12. The deployment of troops in Northern Ireland meant that the UK government could no longer stay outside the affairs of Northern Ireland and became increasingly and directly involved in the search for a solution.

6.1.13. The split in the republican movement and the escalation of the IRA campaign brought further pressure on the Northern Ireland government from unionists. Perceived lack of progress on security led to the resignations of Prime Ministers O'Neill and Chichester-Clarke by which time "the Troubles" were well under way. The introduction of internment exacerbated the situation and breathed new life into the, at that stage dormant, civil rights movement. Its renewed campaign of marches began at the very end of 1971 and it was the events arising out of such a march on 30th January 1972 that became Bloody Sunday.

6.2. The Experts

6.2.1. Professor Arthur's report can be found at E6 and Professor Bew's at E7. The experts' comments on each others report and their responses to these comments and to questions from the interested parties can be found at E17. Neither Professor Arthur nor Professor Bew has given oral evidence before the Tribunal. A brief outline of the background was also provided by counsel to the Inquiry, Christopher Clarke QC in his opening statement Day 1/23/8 to Day 1/31/10.

6.2.2. Professors Arthur and Bew were requested to provide expert advice on the "political and other relevant circumstances prevailing in Northern Ireland in the period prior to Bloody Sunday." They were informed that the Tribunal wished to have "a dispassionate account of these circumstances concentrating on the period from the start of the troubles, with particular reference to the months leading up to 30 Jamuary 1972, including for example discussion of the civil rights movement, internment and the reactions to it. The state of order in Londonderry and in the rest of Northern Ireland in the preceding months would also be relevant as background."[1]

6.2.3. By way of letter dated 24th August 1998 we raised a query about the appointment of Professor Bew and his ability to provide a "dispassionate account" as follows

> "Mr Bew has been reported in the press as being a member of the so-called "Cadogan Group" which has close links with the Unionist Party. The group has been described as part of a Unionist Party advisory team. Perhaps you would ask Mr Bew if, indeed, he is a member of this group and to declare his party political affiliations before he is engaged"

6.2.4. The letter also stated that, so far as we were aware, "Mr Arthur is not so linked with any political party but again perhaps he can likewise be asked about his political affiliations before engagement". No reply was received to that letter.

6.2.5. The final version of Professor Arthur's report was delivered to the Inquiry in January 2000[2]. The preface to Professor Bew's report is dated January 2000[3]. Both authors were furnished with the first version of Bundle G in September 1999, at the same time as the interested parties, and with an updated version of the bundle in March 2000[4]. The reports were therefore based on the material available to their authors, at the very latest, in January 2000. In January 2000 Bundle G comprised 3 volumes of documents, that being the second generation of the bundle. The Tribunal will be aware that Bundle G has, at time of writing, reached generation 34 and comprises 6 volumes.

6.2.6. At the outset therefore we submit that both reports can only be of value in providing a historical context in which the events leading up to Bloody Sunday can be placed. Since the reports were delivered the Inquiry has undertaken almost four years of investigation including hearing evidence from a large number of witnesses and the assimilation of hundreds of thousands of documents. While there is merit in using the reports as a guide to historical background, as to which the Tribunal has heard relatively little evidence, they are of lesser assistance when it comes to examining the immediate political and military context in which the events of Bloody Sunday occurred, which the Tribunal, having heard the evidence and examined all of the available documentation, can do for itself[5].

6.2.7. Professor Arthur states that the "major concern of his paper" is the "security and political milieu which operated in Northern Ireland in the period before Bloody Sunday" E6.0006. He appears to have approached the task allocated to him by the Inquiry from a broad historical perspective with some reliance on the documents provided to him by the Inquiry where appropriate. Professor Bew on the other hand, after providing some historical background by way of introduction, embarks on a narrative and analysis of the (at that stage incomplete) Bundle G documents.

6.2.8. Professor Bew accepts that himself and Professor Arthur approached their task in different ways. Professor Arthur appears to recognise that his function in providing a report to the Tribunal is to supply a backdrop against which the Tribunal's task can be conducted and not to abrogate that task by attempting to reach conclusions about why the events of 30th January 1972 took place. He therefore does not presume to reach such conclusions. Professor Bew, on the other hand, concludes his report by reaching at least three definite conclusions from the material which was supplied to him. Quite apart from the fact that these conclusions are based on incomplete material it is submitted that reaching such conclusions goes beyond the task for which the experts were appointed by the Tribunal.

6.2.9. Indeed Professor Bew's approach to his task and the conclusions he reaches are all the more surprising when it is remembered that in the preface to his report he states

6.2.10. "I should emphasise that the conclusions in the latter part of the report...are drawn on the basis of the papers included in the Planning and Intelligence Bundle which has been circulated to the interested parties. I have not seen other potentially relevant material, notably some security service papers, and that inevitably tempers the firmness of my conclusions" E7.0002.

6.2.11. Professor Arthur's analysis of the historical background to Bloody Sunday emphasises the following points

i) The historical significance of Derry to unionists and its strategic importance to the British;
ii) The post-war political, economic and social realities in the city which he describes as "bleak" due to gerrymandering, unemployment, housing, emigration, the high birth rate and the concentration of modernisation in the area East of the Bann;
iii) The localised and vibrant nature of the civil rights movement
iv) The events of 1969, including the attack on the Peoples Democracy (PD) march from Belfast to Derry, the establishment of Free Derry, the death of Samuel Devenney, the deployment of troops on the streets in Northern Ireland and the split in the Republican movement

v) The actions of the RUC as outlined in the Hunt and Cameron reports and the transfer of responsibility for security to the GOC

vi) The events of 1971 in Northern Ireland generally including the escalation of the IRA campaign and the nature of army operations. In Derry, the deaths of Beattie and Cusack and the introduction of internment

vii) The failure of the British Conservative government which came into power in 1970 to take action in respect of Northern Ireland due perhaps to lack of time on the part of the Prime Minister and lack of interest on the part of the Home Secretary

6.2.12. Professor Bew emphasises

i) The psyche of Derry unionists

ii) Gerrymandering

iii) Tension between border unionists and other, more liberal, unionists in the East of Northern Ireland

iv) Unemployment in Derry and west of the Bann generally

v) The concerns of certain influential Derry unionists that industrial development in the city should not come at the expense of unionist hegemony

vi) The housing problem in the city which was exacerbated by the allocation of housing to Catholics only in the South Ward

vii) The recommendation of the Lockwood committee that Northern Ireland's second university be situated in Coleraine and not in Derry viii) The British interest in Northern Ireland, which by the time of the election of Edward Heath's government in 1970, is said to be that Britain has no selfish, strategic interest of its own in Northern Ireland, its actions there are based on the will of the majority of the people in Northern Ireland.

6.2.13. Professor Bew then addresses the documents provided to him by the Inquiry. It is surprising, especially given the Inquiry's letter of instruction, that Professor Bew's paper contains little reference to the civil rights movement, and no analysis of its emergence, character or actions.

6.2.14. From a reading of their reports and follow up comments it is clear that the experts engaged by the Inquiry fundamentally disagree on some of the issues. Professor Bew, in his comments, accepts much if not all of the content of Professor Arthur's report E17.1 paragraphs 1 to 2. Professor Arthur, on the other hand, has produced a robust critique of Professor Bew's report which he indicates presented him "with several difficulties" E17.2 paragraph 1 not least of which were Professor Bew's "interpretation of many aspects of the historical background", his report's "elision of history" and inadequate presentation of some of the evidence E17.2 paragraph 1. Professor Arthur's overall impression is that Professor Bew's report "is not a measured piece of work" E17.2 paragraph 1.

6.2.15. As to his particular criticisms, Professor Arthur considers Professor Bew's assertions that there were genuine attempts by the NI government to address the unemployment problem in Derry to be unsupported. He further considers that Professor Bew exaggerates the dichotomy between the frontier mentality and liberal unionism E17.2 paragraph 5 and that he exaggerates the radicalism of Nationalism in Derry and, on this issue, extrapolates from a few explicit examples to make more generalised points. E17.2 paragraph 5.

6.2.16. Professor Arthur has further commented that the second section of Professor Bew's report relies too heavily on the documents provided by the Inquiry and, as a result, lacks perspective. In addition, he considers that that section contains a number of contradictions and that some of Professor Bew's judgments therein are questionable E17.2 paragraph 5.

6.2.17. Professor Arthur notes in particular two claims made by Professor Bew which he describes as "astounding" E17.2 paragraph 4 and "amazing" E17.2 paragraph 6 respectively. The first is Professor Bew's claim that "The Catholic complaint about housing in the city [i.e. Derry] was not based on the fact that houses were not allocated to Catholics but that Catholics were only allocated houses by the Corporation in the South Ward where a new Catholic household would not threaten unionist control of the corporation" E7.0012. Professor Arthur comments "it was as if Catholics would rather forego housing altogether unless it embarrassed the unionist corporation. It takes no account of the nature of overcrowding in the South Ward and a serious lack of housing." E17.2 paragraph 4.

6.2.18. The second is Professor Bew's claim that "The army's conventional though not absolute reluctance to use lethal force – before Bloody Sunday – had set a gold standard which was then used to condemn its activity on Bloody Sunday" E7.0024. Professor Arthur counters "The logic appears to be that if the army had used the lethal force it used on Bloody Sunday before that date, then it could not have been turned into a propaganda effort after Bloody Sunday. It does not seem to me to be unreasonable that the reason why people were so shocked by the events of Bloody Sunday was because they had made the assumption that in a liberal democracy certain civilised standards were upheld". After references to the deaths of Annette McGavigan, Beattie and Cusack, William McGreanery and Kathleen Thompson, Professor Arthur concludes on this issue "Given the circumstances surrounding these deaths I would be surprised if anyone in nationalist Derry were under any illusions about the army's use of lethal force and would not have been impressed by the so-called 'gold standard'" E17.2 paragraph 6.

6.2.19. Professor Arthur also criticises Professor Bew's evidence which he says is based on "a select reading of State papers....". Finally, he is scathing about Professor Bew's "..implicit assumption of Bloody Sunday as propaganda..."E17.2 paragraph 7.

6.2.20. Professor Bew's reply acknowledges that Professor Arthur appears to "be unhappy with the broad thrust of my analysis. This is to suggest that on the basis of these papers there is no firm evidence of a conspiracy stretching to the British cabinet and the most pressing causes arise out of a "local dialectic". However he provides no real challenge based on the papers here to such an analysis." E17.3 paragraph 2. However, Professor Bew goes on to admit that there are certain things which would be relevant to such an analysis which are "beyond my remit but not beyond the remit of the Enquiry" E17.3 paragraph 2.

6.3.1. Whatever their differences, the experts appear to agree, and we submit, that from the foundation of the state of Northern Ireland in 1921 its government was characterised by a determination to preserve the Unionist and Protestant nature of the state and its institutions. As a result the minority Catholic/Nationalist population was shamelessly discriminated against. This was accepted as "common knowledge" by Sir Edward Heath, British Prime Minister at the time of Bloody Sunday, when he gave evidence before the Tribunal Day 283/75/25 to Day 283/76/23 and Lord Carrington who admitted that "The Catholics had considerable and legitimate grievances" Day 280/1/25 to Day 280/2/1.

6.3.2. The system for elections to the Northern Ireland Parliament at Stormont, a simple majority 'first past the post' system, meant that the government was comprised of members of the Unionist Party alone. As the report of the Cameron Commission noted the Government of Northern Ireland had "since it was established been a Unionist (and therefore Protestant) Government"[6].

6.3.3. Further, manipulation of the electoral arrangements at local government level in certain areas provided for unionist majorities in areas which, in terms of population, had natural Catholic majorities. Such a situation pertained in Derry. In addition voting in local government elections was restricted to "occupiers of dwelling houses and their spouses, and thereby excluded sub-tenants, lodgers and children, so that about a quarter of those entitled to vote at Stormont elections were not entitled to vote in local elections" Day 1/24/1 to Day 1/24/5.

6.3.4. As noted by Professors Arthur and Bew, the second largest city in Northern Ireland and sited on its western edges, Derry was and is of tremendous historical, political and strategic importance to Unionists. In order that they might retain control of local government in Derry (where the population was 60% Catholic), and hence of Derry itself, electoral boundaries introduced in 1936 for that very purpose were rigorously adhered to with no alteration to allow for population changes or housing needs[7].

6.3.5. The Cameron Commission's report, which included in its work an examination of the electoral arrangements in Derry, accepted that the complaint that in these areas the electoral system was weighted against non-Unionists was "abundantly justified"[8]. While similar arrangements existed in other parts of Northern Ireland the Commission considered Derry to be the "most glaring case"[9].

6.3.6. Again, as pointed out by Professors Arthur[10] and Bew[11], discrimination against Catholics in the allocation of housing and public employment was widespread. The Cameron Commission found that:

> "Council housing policy has also been distorted for political end in the Unionists controlled areas to which we specifically refer. In each, houses have been built and allocated in such a way that they will not disturb the political balance. In Londonderry County Borough a vast programme has been carried out in the South Ward – and Catholics have been rehoused there almost exclusively. In recent years housing programmes declined because the Corporation refused to face the political effects of boundary extension, even though this was recommended by all its senior officials....[12]"

6.3.7. The Cameron Commission also found that within Unionist controlled councils powers of appointment were used "in a way which benefited Protestants"[13] and that in Derry in October 1968 "only thirty per cent of Londonderry Corporations administrative, clerical and technical employees were Catholics. Out of the ten best-paid posts only one was held by a Catholic..."[14]

6.3.8. Quite apart from this, the general employment situation in Derry was appalling. In February 1967 unemployment in Derry stood at 20.1%. This at a time when the British average was 2.6% and the average in Northern Ireland was 8.1%[15]. In November 1971 the figure was 13.2% while the Northern Ireland average was 8.4%. Even this figure masked the reality that in Derry male unemployment stood at 18.3% while the figure for female unemployment was 4.8%[16].

6.3.9. It is also clear that the experts are in agreement that the unemployment situation in Derry was clearly not helped, and may have been deliberately hindered, by the lack of inward investment to the city. Professor Arthur cites the reports of the Matthew[17], Benson[18] and Lockwood[19] commissions as examples of the isolation of Derry and the area west of the Bann[20]. It is further common case that the fears of unionists in Derry that an increase in opportunities for employment in the city could lead to an influx of workers from the south, thereby destabilising the finely balanced unionist control of the city were, at the very least, of some influence in bringing this situation about[21].

No figures for the rates of unemployment broken down by religion have been given although in Northern Ireland, The Political Economy of Conflict Bob Rawton and Naomi Wayne (1988) the Northern Ireland unemployment figures for 1971 are given as 17.3% of Catholic men unemployed compared to 6.6% of non-Catholic men. For women the figures were 7% for Catholics and 3.6% for non-Catholics at Appendix 6

6.3.10. In addition to these socio-economic effects of Unionist rule in Northern Ireland the Civil Authorities (Special Powers) Act (Northern Ireland) 1922 LAW2.1-21.provided wide powers in respect of the maintenance of order and preservation of peace in the jurisdiction. The Cameron Commission noted the "remarkable width" of these powers and that certain of them "are in conflict with the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, in particular Article 10 (against arbitrary arrest) Article 12 (the right to be presumed innocent until proven guilty) Article 13 (against subjection to interference with personal privacy, home or correspondence and Article 20 (freedom of opinion and expression)"[22].

6.3.11. As has been seen, during the life of the Northern Ireland government, the UK Parliament and government adopted a policy of non-intervention in relation to matters that were said to be "internal" to Northern Ireland[23].

6.3.12. The Unionist government in Northern Ireland therefore had an unfettered discretion in relation to the creation and implementation of such policies as it wished on matters allocated to it under the Government of Ireland Act without fear of censure or sanction from London Day 283/76/7 to Day 283/76/15.

6.4. The Civil Rights Movement

6.4.1. It was a combination of the policies devised and implemented by the Northern Ireland government since the creation of the state, the determination to maintain the status quo with the resulting consequences for the Catholic population of Northern Ireland and the policy of non-intervention by the British government that led to the birth of the civil rights movement.

6.4.2. A number of theories have been advanced for the timing of its emergence such as the growth of a "Catholic middle class" and the use of street demonstrations in other parts of the world at that time to press for change[24]. Whatever the reason for the timing, it is clear, as recognised by Professor Arthur, that in the late 1960s the emerging civil rights "movement" encompassed a number of regional and local groups having broadly the same aim but in some cases different strategies.[25]

6.4.3. The Northern Ireland Civil Rights Association was formed after a meeting in Belfast on 29th January 1967. As acknowledged by Professor Kevin Boyle, former press officer for NICRA giving evidence before the Tribunal, it was a "very broad brush affair" involving "many strands", the initiative having come from the Republican Clubs and the local Communist Party Day 123/93/5 to Day 123/93/22[26]. Quite apart from this movement towards a Northern Ireland wide group, a number of autonomous local groups were already well established e.g. the Campaign for Social Justice in Northern Ireland based in Dungannon.

6.4.4. Professor Boyle has indicated that "NICRA was a political movement which was an important initiative on civil liberties and was not party political or subversive." Day 123/98/10 to Day 123/99/6. Further, it took as its model the London-based National Council of Civil Liberties. As events unfolded the organisation grew throughout Northern Ireland and developed branches changing from essentially a Belfast based organisation Day 123/10511 to Day 123/105/23.

6.4.5. The aims of NICRA were outlined in its constitution as "to assist in the maintenance of civil liberties, including freedom of speech, propaganda and assembly. The Association shall advance measures for the recovery and enlargement of such liberties and shall take steps as the Association shall deem necessary to that end." [27].

6.4.6. It has been noted that:

> "These objectives said nothing about concrete grievances over discrimination in housing, employment and the electoral franchise. They underline the character of NICRA at this stage as an organisation which, like the NCCL, was concerned with the defence of legal and constitutional rights and the grievances of individuals, not with militant protest."[28]

6.4.7. Professor Boyle was also a member of another group which had been set up to press for change, Peoples Democracy – "an alliance of student socialists and the unaligned" KB2.10 paragraph 5, Day 123/107/13 to Day 123/107/16. Largely because of its age profile, he says, Peoples Democracy was more radical and it would be fair to say that they viewed NICRA as middle aged and middle class Day 123/108/14 to Day 123/108/21.

6.4.8. The Manifesto of the Peoples Democracy group made a number of demands including calls for "one man, one vote", an end to repressive legislation including the repeal of the Special Powers Act and a centrally drawn up points system for the allocation of housing.[29]

6.4.9. In addition, during the course of the civil rights campaign a number of local groups were set up in Derry. These included the Derry Housing Action Committee (DHAC), the Derry Citizens Action Committee (DCAC) and the Derry Citizens' Defence Committee (DCDC).

6.4.10. The Derry Housing Action Committee (DHAC) was a small radical group set up in November 1967 to campaign for improvements to housing in Derry. The group was made up of radical socialists, republicans and nationalists. One of the prominent members of the group was Eamon McCann. The tactics of the group were to take direct, non-violent, action against those organisations responsible for housing in Derry, particularly the private landlords and Londonderry Corporation which was responsible for much of the publicly rented housing in the area.

6.4.11. The Derry Citizens' Action Committee (DCAC) was established on 9 October 1968 and was made up of representatives from a number of groups which at that time operated in Derry. Ivan Cooper was the first chairman and John Hume was deputy chairman. The DCAC organised a number of protests in Derry in 1968 and 1969.

6.4.12. Derry Citizens' Defence Committee (DCDC) was set up in July 1969 with the aim of defending the Catholic areas of Derry against what it viewed as attacks by members of the Royal Ulster Constabulary (RUC) and the 'B'-Specials. The DCDA was active in erecting barricades, organising patrols of what became known as 'Free Derry'.

6.4.13. It had been hoped by some that a campaign for civil rights could be a unifying factor that would transcend party political and other divisions

[29] This manifesto, dated February 1969, appears as Appendix XII to the Cameron Report

"Here was...this new civil rights movement arguing for change, for democratic civil rights changes for the whole community, but it met resistance, largely led by the Loyalist groups, in particular by Ian Paisley....it was an age of innocence; there was a hope that these new ideas of civil rights could be the basis for solidarity and co-operation between both traditions, but it was not, it was not so" (Evidence of Professor Kevin Boyle 123/107/20 to Day 123/108/10)

6.4.14. Unionists did not accept the premise of the civil rights movement and opposed the reform it sought. Attempts to undermine the movement and the legitimacy of its aims were made by characterising it as a front for violent and subversive elements. Giving oral evidence before the Tribunal Lord Kilclooney, the former Minister of State at the Northern Ireland Ministry of Home Affairs John Taylor, made it clear that the Unionist view of the civil rights campaign was that it was a means of overthrowing Northern Ireland and forcing Northern Ireland into a united Ireland Day 196/102/12 to 196/102/24. He further indicated that it is still his view of the people who attended civil rights demonstrations that while some would have had a genuine concern for civil rights most "would have been people who wanted a united Ireland" Day 196/103/5.

6.4.15. That such views were widely held is also clear from the findings of the Cameron Commission. In its report that Commission accepted the legitimacy of many of the causes championed by NICRA and stated

6.4.16. This catalogue of grievance deserves, in our judgment, to be seriously regarded in any analysis of the immediate causes of the disturbances. We disagree profoundly, having heard much evidence, with the view which professes to see agitation for civil rights as a mere pretext for other and more subversive activities...[30]

6.4.17. There appear to have been two distinct stages to the civil rights movement in Northern Ireland. The first from the time of the formation of NICRA in 1967 to 1969 during which period reforms were promised and/or introduced that appeared to meet some of the demands of the civil rights campaign. The second was prompted by the introduction of internment in August 1971 and spawned the rent and rates strike and a new round of marches at the very end of that year and into the next, including the march in Derry on 30th January 1972.

6.5.1. Following the incident in Caledon, Co. Tyrone where a Catholic family squatting in a house were evicted and a new house in the same area allocated to a 19 year old unmarried Protestant woman who worked for a local Unionist Parliamentary candidate, the first civil rights march was organised from Coalisland to Dungannon in August 1968.

6.5.2. Police originally raised no objection to the march. The Cameron Commission's report notes that Mr John Taylor MP (now Lord Kilclooney), among others, told police that there would be trouble if the procession entered Market Square in Dungannon and concludes "We think it is to be inferred from [his] own evidence that whether these local Unionist leaders would have organised, they at least would not have discouraged, the organisation of a counter demonstration if the march had been allowed to enter Market Square. Such counter demonstration, if organised, would almost certainly have led to an outbreak of violence – as persons occupying positions of such public responsibility cannot have failed to appreciate."[31]

6.5.3. As it happened, Ian Paisley's Ulster Protestant Volunteers advertised a public meeting to be held in Market Square on the same day as the march.[32] Police took a decision to re-route the march and the marchers dispersed after holding a meeting.

6.5.4. The organisation of loyalist counter demonstrations to coincide with planned civil rights marches was to become a frequent occurrence during the life of the civil rights movement. Indeed such a demonstration had been planned, by the Democratic Unionist Association in Derry, for Bloody Sunday although it was cancelled on 29th January, the day before the march. The effect of such a tactic was to immediately cause a policing issue around the civil rights march and to heighten the potential for disorder.

6.5.5. A second civil rights march took place in Derry on 5th October 1968. It was organised by NICRA and the DHAC (Derry Housing Action Committee). The march was banned but a significant number of people defied the ban to march in any event. The marchers were subjected to the indiscriminate use of batons and water cannon when they became trapped between two cordons of police.[33] Professor Arthur notes that it was "the [NI] Cabinet's decision to table a motion of congratulation to the RUC for their action which caused real outrage".[34] The nature of the Cabinet's support for the police is thrown into sharp relief when it is remembered that the Cameron Commission's verdict on the RUC action was that

> "The police handling of the demonstration in Londonderry on 5 October 1968 was in certain material respects ill co-ordinated and inept. There was use of unnecessary and ill controlled force in the dispersal of the demonstrators, only a minority of whom acted in a disorderly and violent manner."[35]

6.5.6. During this time Prime Minister Terence O'Neill began to consider options for reform that might pacify those involved in the civil rights movement. As a result of a meeting with British Prime Minister Harold Wilson a five point plan was produced which included provision for a points system for the allocation of public housing, revision of the Special Powers Act and the abolition of Londonderry Borough Council and its replacement by a non-elected Development Commission. These proposed reforms were announced in November 1968 and although they were not seen as any more than "empty gestures" by NICRA[36] their announcement was closely followed by Captain O'Neill's "Ulster at the Crossroads" television address in December 1969. NICRA decided to give O'Neill one last chance and they declared a "truce" for one month without marches or demonstrations to give the promised reforms a chance to work and to attempt to defuse the growing chances of sectarian violence.[37]

6.5.7. Many unionists opposed O'Neill's plans for reform and saw him as capitulating in the face of pressure from UK Prime Minister Harold Wilson and the Labour government.

> "The year ended peacefully. In the period from August to December the civil rights campaign had managed to split the Unionist cabinet, arouse concern at British cabinet level, bring thousands of people demanding civil rights on to the streets and produce a general public awareness of the lack of democracy and a political programme for its introduction. On the negative side it had aroused extreme Protestant reaction as a result not only of the marches but also of the Government's political reactions and it had given rise to an impatient group of students seeking instant revolution in a text book society. In the light of the influence of the organisation since its beginnings, this four month period put NICRA in the vanguard of the struggle for civil and human rights in N. Ireland." [38]

6.6.1. 1969 began with another march, this time organised by the Peoples Democracy group. They set out on New Years Day 1969 to march from Belfast to Derry but met with fierce resistance from unionists along the way, culminating in a serious attack at Burntollet bridge just outside Derry.

6.6.2. Allegations were made that police did not adequately protect the marchers from attack. Further allegations were made that police mingled freely with attackers at Burntollet and that they failed to take any or adequate action against those who were clearly involved. An internal inquiry into these allegations against the police headed by County Inspector Baillie was held in private and its report never published.[39]

6.6.3. Professor Arthur has noted

> "A few hours later when the depleted PD marchers arrived in Derry rioting against the police began. At 2.00 a.m. the following morning a police contingent invaded the Bogside and wreaked havoc"[40]

6.6.4. The Cameron report concluded that:

> "Available police forces did not provide adequate protection to People's Democracy marchers at Burntollet Bridge and in or near Irish Street, Londonderry on 4th January 1969. There were instances of police indiscipline and violence towards persons unassociated with rioting or [38] Ibid.

disorder on 4th/ 5th January in Londonderry and these provoked serious hostility to the police, particularly among the Catholic population of Londonderry, and an increasing disbelief in their impartiality towards non-Unionists"[41]

6.6.5. Specifically in relation to the night of 4th/5th January the Commission reached the "unhesitating conclusion" that:

> "...a number of policemen were guilty of misconduct which involved assault and battery, malicious damage to property in streets in the predominantly Catholic Bogside area giving reasonable cause for apprehension of personal injury among other innocent inhabitants, and the use of provocative sectarian and political slogans."[42]

6.6.6. In the aftermath of the Burntollet march the legend "You are now entering Free Derry" was painted on the gable wall of a house in the Bogside area of Derry, barricades were erected and vigilante groups were formed to ensure the defence of the area. Free Derry was established.

6.6.7. In March and April 1969 a number of public utilities near Belfast were damaged by explosions. At first these explosions were blamed on the, at that stage dormant, IRA. In fact it soon became clear that it was the work of Protestant paramilitaries. The Scarman report concluded "We are satisfied that, though the perpetrators of these outrages cannot, with one exception, be identified they were the work of Protestant extremists who were anxious to undermine confidence in the government of Captain O'Neill. At the time it was widely thought that the explosions were the work of the IRA, though it is quite clear now that they were not."[43]

6.6.8. There was further violence in Derry in April 1969 following the banning of a proposed march from Burntollet to Derry. On 19th April 1969, during the midst of such disturbances, the RUC entered the Bogside and the home of Samuel Devenney. During the course of what can only be described as a savage attack Mr Devenney was severely beaten by police officers and a number of his children and a family friend present in the house were also beaten. Mr Devenney died in July 1969.

6.6.9. Although this time period was, strictly speaking, outside its remit, the Cameron Commission felt that it would be unrealistic, given its task, to ignore it. Their report said:

> "...we were presented with a considerable body of evidence to establish further acts of grave misconduct among members of the RUC including, on this occasion also, serious allegations of assault occasioning personal injury and of malicious damage to property. We regret to say that there appears to us to be ample prima facie evidence to support such charges and we are definitely of the opinion that it is in the interest of the RUC and of the public that these should be rigorously probed and investigated."[44]

6.6.10. Despite this recommendation it was only a year after the attack on Mr Devenney that Sir Arthur Young, then head of the RUC, announced that Scotland Yard detectives, headed by DCS Kenneth Drury, were being brought in to take over an inquiry into allegations of police brutality in the Devenney case.

6.6.11. The Police Ombudsman for Northern Ireland investigated aspects of the incident involving the Devenney family as a result of a complaint from them in 2001. During the course of this investigation her office was provided with a copy of the previously unavailable "Drury report". That report found no evidence that the police action in the Devenney house "could be justified in any way" and stated that such "code of conduct can never be condoned in any force responsible for the preservation of law and order".[45]

6.6.12. Northern Ireland Prime Minister Terence O'Neill had called a general election for Northern Ireland for February 1969 in an attempt to bolster his position which was coming under intense pressure from Unionists, particularly within his own party. As a result of O'Neill's policies Brian Faulkner had resigned as Deputy Prime Minister for Commerce in January 1969. Although his party was successful in those elections deep divisions still existed within the party itself. On 28th April 1969, after the attacks on the public utilities, Terence O'Neill resigned as Prime Minster of Northern Ireland. He was succeeded by Major James Chichester-Clark on 1st May 1969.

> "One of the new Prime Minister's first acts was to announce an amnesty for all offences connected with demonstrations since 5 October 1968, one consequence of which was to release Dr Paisley and Major Bunting from goal. On 8 May the Civil Rights Association announced the suspension of its civil disobedience campaign in view of the amnesty."[46]

6.6.13. By July 1969 it was clear that the police no longer had the ability to police the Bogside area of Derry.[47]

> "The agenda was shifting away from civil rights towards RUC brutality and the need to defend nationalist areas" [48]

6.6.14. However the most serious disturbances were yet to take place there. Tension was high in all areas in the approach to the marching season. Disturbances took place in some areas of Belfast and in Derry on 12th July 1969. There were also serious Protestant riots in Belfast in early August in which "determined"[49] attempts were made by those involved to enter Catholic areas.

6.6.15. A decision was taken to allow the Apprentice Boys parade planned for 12th August 1969 in Derry to proceed. The Scarman report delivered to Parliament in April 1972 concluded that "The disturbances which have troubled Northern Ireland since the summer of 1969 are certainly related to the violence which began in Londonderry on 12 August 1969".[50]

6.6.16. On 12th August 1969 rioting began in Derry and police, joined by a significant number of Protestant civilians, entered the Bogside. Given the actions of the police in Derry in the previous months it is hardly surprising that Lord Scarman noted that "thereafter there was complete unanimity in opposition to the police force". [51]

6.6.17. Commonly known as the "Battle of the Bogside" the following days saw more and intense disturbances in Derry as the people of the Bogside attempted to prevent further incursions by police and others. During the night of 12th August 1969 CS gas was used against the crowds.

6.6.18. As a result of concerns about the unprecedented situation in Derry, Irish Taoiseach Jack Lynch addressed the people of Ireland. He called on the British government to request an UN Peacekeeping Force, announced the setting up of field hospitals on the border and declared that the Irish government will "no longer stand by and see innocent people injured or even worse".

6.6.19. By 14th August 1969 the police were no longer able to continue and "exhausted and discredited"[52] they were, that afternoon, relieved by the deployment of the army on the streets of Derry.

6.6.20. The violence spread across Northern Ireland. Unprecedented disturbances in areas of Belfast led to a number of civilian deaths and to the deployment of the army there on the afternoon of 15th August 1969[53].

6.6.21. A direct response to these events was the meeting in London between the UK and Northern Ireland Prime Ministers on 19th August 1969 after which it was announced that the GOC Northern Ireland would, with immediate effect, assume overall responsibility for security operations. In addition, the two Governments agreed to a joint Declaration on the principles which should govern their future actions. These included the following:-

(i) A commitment that Northern Ireland should not cease to be a part of the United Kingdom without the consent of the people of Northern Ireland

(ii) An affirmation from the United Kingdom Government that responsibility for affairs in Northern Ireland is entirely a matter of domestic jurisdiction.

(iii) That the UK government had ultimate responsibility for the protection of those who live in Northern Ireland and that troops would be withdrawn when law and order was restored.

(iv) In the context of the commitment of troops to Northern Ireland the Northern Ireland Government re-affirmed "their intention to take into the fullest account at all times the views of Her Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom, especially in relation to matters affecting the status of citizens of that part of the United Kingdom and their equal rights and protection under the law".

[53] See Parts VII and VIII of the Scarman Report

(v) The UK government welcomed the movements made by the Northern Ireland government towards reform and both Governments agreed that it was vital that the momentum of internal reform should be maintained.

(vi) "The two Governments ... have re-affirmed that in all legislation and executive decisions of Government every citizen of Northern Ireland is entitled to the same equality of treatment and freedom from discrimination as obtains in the rest of the United Kingdom irrespective of political views or religion. In their further meetings the two Governments will be guided by these mutually accepted principles."

(vii) A commitment to take all possible steps to restore normality to Northern Ireland to ensure the progression of economic development.

6.6.21.1. Move towards reform appeared to continue apace and, following a visit by the Home Secretary James Callaghan to Northern Ireland at the end of August 1969, it was announced that the Government of Northern Ireland had:

"sought the co-operation of the Home Secretary in setting up Joint Working Parties of officials of the two Governments to examine the extent to which the Government of Northern Ireland's present practice or pledged commitments adequately ensure:

(i) the fair allocation of houses by public authorities;

(ii) the avoidance of any discrimination in any form of public employment and;

(iii) the promotion of good community relations by methods including: the prohibition of incitement to religious hatred and to report to the Government of Northern Ireland within a matter of weeks."[54]

6.6.22. Given the events of that year and particularly those of August 1969 the actions of the police in Northern Ireland had become a focus of attention. Many of the civil rights marches drew media attention, and confrontations between marchers and the police were televised.

6.6.23. The composition of the police reinforced the belief now held by many that they were a partisan force that would be used to suppress the political demonstrations of those opposed to the Northern Ireland government.[55]

6.6.24. On 26th August 1969 the Advisory Committee on Police in Northern Ireland was appointed "to examine the recruitment, organisation, structure and composition of the Royal Ulster Constabulary and Ulster Special Constabulary and their respective functions and to recommend as necessary what changes are required to provide for the efficient enforcement of law and order in Northern Ireland".

6.6.25. The resulting report[56] published in October 1969 noted that as far as the RUC was concerned "Roman Catholics only constitute approximately 11% of the members...and of this percentage the great majority are probably men whose fathers had served in the police. The net percentage of Roman Catholic recruits from outside these sources is thus very small indeed".[57]

6.6.26. In 1969 the only remaining class of the original three Ulster Special Constabulary classes was "Class B". The "B Specials" had always been a part time force whose members were recruited from and deployed in the areas in which they lived. In 1969 they numbered around 8,000 men and were deployed for military type duties such as mounting armed guards of certain installations and road checks.[58] It was common knowledge and confirmed by the Hunt report[59] that among the force "no Roman Catholic is a member".

6.6.27. The Hunt report recommended that the RUC be relieved of all military type duties and that the Ulster Special Constabulary be replaced by a locally recruited part time force under the control of the G.O.C.[60]

6.7.1. At the Sinn Fein Ard Fheis in January 1970 the party split, leaving what became known as Official Sinn Fein and Provisional Sinn Fein. A similar split had occurred in the IRA at the end of 1969, and for the same reasons, when the army convention voted to end the policy of abstentionism.

6.7.2. In June 1970 a general election in the UK saw the formation of a Conservative government under Edward Heath. Reginald Maudling was appointed Home Secretary.

6.7.3. July 1970 brought increased street disturbances in Belfast and after an arms find in the Falls Road area the army sealed the district and imposed a curfew which lasted from 3rd July until the morning of 5th July when it was broken by a march of women and children carrying food through army lines. During the curfew intensive searches were carried out of houses in the area. There were numerous allegations of ill-treatment of residents and three civilians were shot dead by the army

[60] paragraph 183

"While this may have been regarded as a success from a purely military perspective, politically it represented a turning point in the relationship between the army and the nationalists, convincing many in the Catholic population that the army had adopted an adversarial attitude towards them."[61]

6.8.1. 1971 saw increased action by the IRA. Twenty eight people had died in 1970. In 1971 the death toll was one hundred and eighty. Ninety four were civilians, forty four were soldiers, eleven were RUC and five UDR. Twenty three republican and three loyalist paramilitaries were killed. Of the deaths, republican paramilitaries were responsible for one hundred and seven and the army for forty five, loyalist paramilitaries for twenty two and the RUC for one.[62]

6.8.2. Apart from this there was a large increase in the number of shooting incidents and explosions the figures for which stood at 213 and 153 respectively in 1970 and rose dramatically to 1,765 and 1,022 in 1971.[63] Rioting also intensified as the year went on[64].

6.8.3. The attendant pressure on the Northern Ireland government from those within its own party and others such as Ian Paisley was fierce as a result of the increasing disorder. March 1971 brought the resignation of Major Chichester-Clarke and the elevation three days later, after a party leadership election, of Brian Faulkner to the post of Prime Minister.

6.8.4. In addition, the Army, originally welcomed as the protectors of the Catholic people, were now regarded with hostility – a feeling which increased throughout 1971:

> "...the temptation to get results by almost any means became a very high priority and a premium was put on improving local intelligence. Hence increasing house searches: 'It was announced in Stormont that 1,183 houses and flats in Belfast had been searched by security forces between 30 November 1971 and 9 January 1972. In 47 of them arms, ammunition and radio equipment were found'. That means that nothing was found in 1,136 residences. We can imagine that the occupants were not best pleased by these incursions. In addition, the use of riot-control agents such as CS gas and rubber bullets antagonised local communities. More pertinently, it was the nature of the Army 'as a closed institution unaccustomed to direct contact with the civilian population [which] increase the likelihood that individual soldiers would be guilty of misconduct...Individual soldiers...soon realised that any breaches of discipline would be concealed by their colleagues or condoned by their officers.'"[65]

6.8.5. The shooting of civilians by the army in disputed circumstances raised the temperature even further. On 8th July 1971 Seamus Cusack and Desmond Beattie were shot dead by soldiers in Derry. Their deaths aroused much controversy not least because, contrary to eyewitness reports, the army claimed that the two men were armed with a rifle and nail bombs respectively when shot[66]. Acquitting the soldier who shot Seamus Cusack of murder Mr Justice Gibson later concluded that Cusack was probably not armed.[67] The SDLP, then the opposition at Stormont, withdrew from the Parliament after their call for an independent inquiry into the deaths was rejected by the NI government.

6.8.6. Others killed by the army in Derry in controversial circumstances in the latter part of 1971 were Hugh Herron on 9th August, Annette McGavigan on 6th September, William McGreanery on 14th September and Kathleen Thompson on 6th November.

6.8.7. Perhaps the most significant event. to take place in 1971 was the introduction of internment. Operation Demetirus (Internment) was launched across Northern Ireland on the morning of 9th August 1971[68]. It provoked widespread rioting and disturbances with 13 people shot dead on 9th August alone, nine of them by soldiers. The fiercest disturbances came in north and west Belfast. After the initial disturbances had subsided the apparently random nature of the many arrests, the fact that the power was initially exclusively directed at Catholics and the actions of soldiers during the arrest operations led to sustained protests against the use of internment and calls for it to be brought to an end. Quite apart from the use of the power of internment itself, allegations of ill-treatment began to emerge from those who had been arrested.

6.8.8. Professor Kevin Boyle in his evidence to Tribunal stated:

> "In the period between 1970 and the end of 1971 the Civil Rights Association did not organise many mass demonstrations. However, following the introduction of internment in August 1971, the movement was resuscitated." Day 123/110/2 to Day 123/111/1.

[68] Further consideration will be given to the political context in which internment was introduced and its effects in section seven

6.8.9. NICRA's first response to the introduction of internment was Professor Boyle's presence at a meeting on the morning of 9th August 1971 in Dungannon with various politicians. That meeting called for civil disobedience and initiated the rent and rates strike Day 123/111/2 to Day 123/111/13

6.8.10. While the rent and rates strike was co-ordinated by NICRA there was, at that time, no plan to take the protests on to the street. Professor Boyle has said that it was not confrontation with the security forces that the association feared but rather the violent side of loyalism Day 123/112/24 to Day 123/113/5. This fear was well founded given the events of the previous months.

6.8.11. When the rent and rates strike failed to have the desired effect NICRA issued an ultimatum to the authorities that marches would be held unless internment was ended without further negotiations.

> "We intend to encourage more and more methods of expressing total withdrawal from the State and we also intend bringing the civil disobedience campaign into the streets in a programme of marches throughout Northern Ireland. The campaign will begin on New Year's Day with a mass rally march to Falls Park in Belfast" NICRA press release December 1971 GEN 5.25.

6.8.12. The march organised for 30th January 1972 in Derry was part of this campaign.

Baron Grey of Naunton, GCMG, KCVO
Governor of Northern Ireland

THE SUBMISSION

1. On 27 August 1969 both Houses of Parliament of Northern Ireland resolved that it was expedient that a Tribunal be established for inquiring into a definite matter of urgent public importance: that is to say, the acts of violence and civil disturbance which occurred

(1) during the month of March 1969 at the electricity substation, Castlereagh;

(2) during the month of April 1969 at Kilmore, Co Armagh; Silent Valley, and Annalong, Co Down, and Clady, Co Antrim;

(3) during the month of April 1969 at or near ten Post Offices in the City of Belfast;

(4) during the months of July and August 1969 in the cities of Londonderry and Belfast;

(5) during the months of July and August 1969 in the town of Dungiven;

(6) during the month of August 1969 in the City of Armagh and in the towns of Coalisland, Dungannon and Newry; and and resulted in loss of life, personal injury or damage to property.

2. By Warrant of Appointment, also dated 27 August 1969, Your Excellency appointed the three signatories to this Report to be a Tribunal for the purposes of the inquiry mentioned in the Resolution of the two Houses of Parliament, and further appointed the first signatory to this Report as chairman of the Tribunal. The Warrant provided that the Tribunals of Inquiry (Evidence) Act 1921 should apply to the Tribunal.

3. By a further Warrant given on the 11 December 1970 Your Excellency varied the terms of the Warrant of Appointment of 27 August 1969 by revoking the appointment of Mr Lavery and Mr Marshall in so far as their appointment related to the acts of violence and civil disturbance which occurred—

(1) during the month of March 1969 at the electricity substation, Castlereagh;

(2) during the month of April 1969 at Kilmore, Co Armagh; Silent Valley, and Annalong, Co Down, and Clady, Co Antrim;

(3) during the month of April 1969 at or near ten Post Offices in the City of Belfast;

(4) during the months of July and August 1969 in the town of Dungiven;

(5) during the month of August 19[illegible] in the towns of Coalisland, Dungannon and Newry; and

(6) during the 17, 18 August 1969 at Crossmaglen, Co Armagh;

but not further or otherwise and by declaring that in relation to the acts specified above the Tribunal should consist of the Chairman alone.

4. The effect of the Resolutions of the two Houses of Parliament and the two Warrants of Appointment is, therefore, as follows. A Tribunal consisting of all three of us has been established to inquire into the acts of violence and civil disturbance which occurred in 1969 during the months of July and August in the Cities of Londonderry and Belfast and during the month of August in the City of Armagh. Our Chairman, sitting alone, has been the Tribunal established for inquiring into all the other acts of violence and civil disturbance listed in the Resolutions of the two Houses of Parliament.

5. Accordingly, the inquiry into the disturbances in Londonderry, Belfast and Armagh has been conducted by all three signatories to this report. The inquiry into the other matters has been conducted by our Chairman alone. Nevertheless, for the sake of clarity and continuity of exposition, we have incorporated the findings of these two inquiries into one report. In so far as the report deals with the acts of violence and civil disturbance occurring in Londonderry, Belfast and Armagh, it is the report of all three of us and the findings are those of the Tribunal of three. In so far as the report deals with the other matters, the report and its findings are the responsibility of our Chairman.

6. The application to our proceedings of the Tribunals of Inquiry (Evidence) Act 1921 meant that our inquiry was to be judicial in character. We were given thereby powers, rights and privileges vested in the High Court in respect of the enforcing of the attendance of witnesses, examining them on oath and the compelling of the production of documents. We came under an obligation not to refuse to allow the public to be present at our proceedings, unless in our opinion it was in the public interest expedient to sit in private for reasons connected with the subject-matter of the inquiry or the nature of the evidence. We were given power to authorise representation by counsel, solicitor, or otherwise of persons appearing to be interested in our proceedings. Witnesses called before us were entitled to the immunities and privileges of a witness before the High Court.

7. A number of procedural problems of varying importance had to be resolved by the Tribunal and some of them are discussed in Appendix I. But we would emphasise that throughout our inquiry we have borne in mind the judicial and public character conferred upon our proceedings by the application of the Act of 1921. In particular, we were concerned to ensure that persons, whose conduct was criticised in written statements furnished by those whom the Tribunal proposed to call as witnesses, should be given notice of the allegations against them and have a full opportunity, with the aid of legal representation if necessary, of dealing with them.

8. The Parliamentary Resolutions do not in terms require us to make any report. But Your Excellency's Warrant of Appointment empowered us to make reports from time to time as we judge expedient. We have decided to make only one report. It will be observed that on some, but not all, of the matters referred to us we have made findings. We would emphasise that we have considered ourselves entitled to make findings only in those instances in which we have felt sure that we know the truth. We have been at pains to indicate those matters on which we have made positive findings.

9. We first sat in Belfast on 5 September 1969. We conducted hearings in Londonderry in the months of September to December 1969. To hear witnesses concerned with the Armagh and Newry disturbances, and the Crossmaglen incident, we sat in Armagh. All other hearings were conducted in the Royal Courts of Justice, Belfast, where we sat, though not continuously, from January 1970 to the end of June 1971. The Tribunal inspected the scene of each disturbance covered by the report. The details of the hearings and the witnesses called are set out in Appendix IV.

10. The Tribunal was greatly assisted in its work by both solicitors and counsel instructed to appear before it. But for the skilled and sustained work of both counsel and solicitors instructed on behalf of the Tribunal, an investigation as complex and detailed as this inquiry proved to be could never have been completed. We are equally indebted to counsel and solicitors who appeared for those to whom we gave leave to be represented: their thorough cross-examination of witnesses and well prepared final submissions illumined much that was obscure, and ensured that a full hearing was given to all persons affected by the inquiry. The list of representations is to be found in Appendix VII.

11. We wish to record the admiration and appreciation that we feel for the work of our Secretary, Mr. A. J. Green, our Assistant Secretary, Mr. W. T. McCrory, our legal assistant, Mr. J. A. W. Strachan of the English Bar, and the administrative and clerical staff. Their dedicated work over a period exceeding two years calls for more than the personal thanks of the three of us: it needs to be recognised as a public service of outstanding merit. The best tribute, however, is quite simply to place on public record that our staff have consistently and often under severe pressure devoted to the work of the Tribunal the zeal and intelligence that we, citizens of the United Kingdom, have come to expect of our civil service.

12. Copies of the record of our proceedings, which includes the evidence, the exhibits and the final submissions of counsel, together with a detailed chronology prepared by the secretariat for the use of the Tribunal, have been deposited with the British Museum, the Public Record Office of Northern Ireland, Queen's University, Belfast, New University of Ulster, and the Institute of Advanced Legal Studies, University of London.

PART I—GENERAL SURVEY

INTRODUCTORY

Terms and abbreviations

1.1 A few remarks are needed about terms. We have not been able to avoid describing groups as Catholic or Protestant. These terms are used only as labels indicating well understood community identifications. No more meaning should be given to the terms than that.

Members of the RUC and USC are referred to in the report by their titles during the disturbances.

At that time the basic RUC ranks were Constable, Sergeant, Head Constable, District Inspector, and County Inspector. The RUC was headed by the Inspector General, assisted by the Deputy Inspector General. The Belfast force was controlled by the Commissioner for Belfast, and a Deputy Commissioner. In the report we normally abbreviate basic titles to Const, Sgt, HC, DI, and CI. We sometimes refer to the IG, DIG and D/Commissioner.

The basic ranks in the USC were Special Constable, Special Sergeant, Sub-District Commandant, District Commandant and County Commandant. In the report we normally abbreviate these titles to S/Const, S/Sgt, SDC, DC and CC. There were also full-time Sergeant Instructors. These are normally described as Sgt/Instructors.

CHAPTER 1—THE COURSE OF EVENTS

Antecedent events

1.2 An accurate assessment of the 1969 disturbances requires some knowledge of events in the Province since unrest developed in 1968. These initial events have been described in the Report of the Cameron Commission*, and we feel we can deal with them briefly.

1.3 In June 1968 the local Member of Parliament (NI), exposed a case of house allocation in Caledon in which there was discrimination in favour of an unmarried Protestant girl. The agitation which started over this case caught the imagination of the non-Unionist minority in the Province and greatly increased the standing and influence of the Northern Ireland Civil Rights Association†. Events elsewhere in the world, particularly perhaps the student riots in France in the early summer of that year, encouraged the belief that a policy of street demonstrations at critical places and times could achieve results, if only because they would attract the attention of the mass media. The Government of Northern Ireland felt the pressures that NICRA and others were able to create, and responded first by outright resistance, and then by concessions. Thus Mr Craig, the then Minister of Home Affairs (NI), banned a demonstration scheduled to take place in Londonderry on 5 October. The ban was defied and a violent clash between police and demonstrators occurred. Further unrest followed in Londonderry. Then a reform programme was announced by the Government in November; but it was regarded as inadequate by the minority, and did not efface or diminish their feeling that the police would be used as a partisan force to suppress the political demonstrations of those opposed to the Northern Ireland Government.

1.4 Undoubtedly, the Government was faced with a familar dilemma. If it stood firm it attracted violent opposition. Yet to promise reform after threats to law and order was a recipe to encourage further demonstrations and counter demonstrations, and to increase rather than diminish the risk of confrontations between minority groups and the police. In 1969 this dilemma of the Government became more pronounced.

1.5 "The Peoples Democracy" (the origins of which are described in Cameron, chapter 5) staged a march from Belfast to Londonderry. It reached Londonderry on 4 January after harassment and violence at Burntollet Bridge. A riot followed in Londonderry, which gave rise to allegations of police violence and partiality. The police were excluded from the Bogside area of the city for a few days because of the high feeling against them. The Government announced an inquiry by County Inspector Baillie into the allegations against the police, but the announcement did little to assuage feeling. The investigation was held in private and the report was not published. But there is no doubt that some breakdown of police discipline did occur on 4/5 January.

1.6 The reform programme had left opposition activists dissatisfied, but at the same time it had evoked hostility from some Protestants. Of their counter-demonstrations the most notable was one organised by Dr Paisley and others in Armagh on 30 November 1968. Later he and Major Bunting were convicted of unlawful assembly for their part in this affair and sentenced to three months' imprisonment. Their appeal was heard on 26 March 1969 and dismissed.

1.7 There had been a Stormont general election in February, after which Captain O'Neill remained Prime Minister, although in his own constituency he had defeated Dr Paisley only by a narrow majority. There were serious Catholic riots in Londonderry on 19 and 20 April, in which a Mr Devenny was seriously injured.* Again there were prima facie grounds for supposing that some police indiscipline had occurred. There were also some consequential disturbances in Belfast.

1.8 While the Catholic minority was developing confidence in its power, a feeling of insecurity was affecting the Protestants. They became the more determined to hold their traditional summer parades, particularly those in Londonderry and Belfast. In these circumstances sectarian conflict was to be expected, unless the police were strong enough to prevent it.

*He died three months later—We refer to his death and funeral in Chapter 10 at page 64.

1.9 But the police were not strong enough. The overall strength of the RUC was approximately 3,200. It included a Reserve Force of 8 platoons which was used for riot control. Each of these platoons had about 30 members. In addition to the RUC there was available the USC, whose total strength was about 8,500. Of the USC some 300 had been fully mobilised for duties with the RUC. The rest were part-time volunteers, who, for reasons to which we refer later, could not be effectively used in the event of sectarian conflict. No other police were available: in particular, in 1969, it was not, in practice, possible to reinforce the RUC from other police forces in the UK.

1.10 Behind the police stood the Army. While in the last resort the Army is available to support the civil power, its use creates as many problems as it solves. Moreover, in Northern Ireland there is the added problem that, while law and order are the responsibility of the Northern Ireland government,* the operational control of the Army has always remained with the UK government.

1.11 Thus, when sectarian disturbances erupted in 1969, the only effective instrument of control available to the Northern Ireland government was the RUC. If they called out the USC, they ran the risk of deepening the conflict: if they called for the aid of the Army, they had to submit to the operational control of Whitehall. We are satisfied that these difficulties were present in the minds of the Minister for Home Affairs (NI) and his police advisers and influenced their decisions in July and August.

Outline of the disturbances

1.12 The "definite matter of urgent public importance" which the Tribunal was established to investigate might appear to include all the acts of violence and civil disturbance occurring between March and August 1969. Any such interpretation of the two resolutions would be false. Serious disturbances did occur during this period which are not included in the resolutions. To mention three instances, serious disturbances occurred in Londonderry during April, in Lurgan and Strabane during August, but are excluded from our inquiry.

1.13 On the last day of March and during the month of April there occurred a number of explosions at electricity and water installations in the Province. We are satisfied that, though the perpetrators of these outrages cannot, with one exception, be identified, they were the work of Protestant extremists who were anxious to undermine confidence in the government of Captain O'Neill. At the time it was widely thought that the explosions were the work of the IRA, though it is quite clear now that they were not. On 28 April Captain O'Neill resigned and on 1 May was succeeded by Major Chichester Clark. One of the new Prime Minister's first acts was to announce an amnesty for all offences connected with demonstrations since 5 October 1968, one consequence of which was to release Dr Paisley and Major Bunting from gaol. On 8 May the Civil Rights Association announced the suspension of its civil disobedience campaign in view of the amnesty.

*Government of Ireland Act 1920. Sections 4 and 8, subject however to the saving in section 75.

1.14 Although for a time the Province enjoyed a more peaceful atmosphere, tension was still high, particularly in areas where Republican feeling ran strongly—Londonderry and the Ardoyne district of Belfast. In May there were some disturbances in the Ardoyne near Hooker Street, and on the 29th of that month there was a meeting between the Ardoyne Citizens' Action Committee and senior police officers.

1.15 Meanwhile, the Protestant community was determined, notwithstanding the agitation of the minority groups, to hold its traditional summer ceremonies. The danger of the situation was that, as a result of recent events, the minority was not inclined to let the marches go by without protest. This feeling was naturally more acute in certain areas where there was a difficult local situation. Thus, in June there were troubles associated with an Orange church parade and a ceremony of unfurling a new banner at the Orange Hall in Dungiven, a predominantly Catholic town. But the situation did not become serious in the Province as a whole until July, when the approach of the traditional marches of the 12th heightened tension everywhere. Disturbances which arose by way of minority response to Protestant marches occurred on 12 July in Londonderry, Dungiven, and in Belfast in the neighbourhood of Unity Flats and in the Ardoyne.

1.16 The full consequences of these disturbances were not understood at the time but only emerged in the course of evidence before the Tribunal. In Londonderry, where the disturbances had been particularly severe, the Derry Citizens' Action Committee,* which was associated with, but not part of, NICRA, and had been the focal point of the expression of minority views and actions, was superseded by a more aggressive body known as the Derry Citizens' Defence Association. This body took over the function of "defence" of the Bogside.

1.17 Protestants too were becoming more turbulent. Angry Protestant crowds had with difficulty been dissuaded from entering Dungiven on 12 and 13 July to protect the Orange Hall. In Belfast there was high feeling, out of all proportion to the incident itself, as a result of a minor injury to a boy in the procession that passed Unity Flats on 12 July. At the same time the Shankill Defence Association, a body recently formed and previously of no great influence, began to emerge on the streets under the leadership of Mr McKeague. This body was active in assisting Protestant families to move out of Hooker Street and there is evidence which we accept that it encouraged Catholic families to move out of Protestant streets south of the Ardoyne. This movement constituted a retreat into their own areas by outlying members of the two communities, for the sake of security.

1.18 There was serious rioting by Protestants on the Shankill Road near Unity Flats in the early days of August. In the course of these riots, the Protestant mobs made a determined attempt to invade Unity Flats, and also appeared in force on the Crumlin Road. They were successfully resisted by the sustained efforts of the police, who incurred the anger of some sections of Protestant opinion by their baton charges up the Shankill Road. It is significant that during these Protestant riots of early August two senior policemen, the Commissioner and Deputy Commissioner for Belfast, concluded that the police were unable any longer to control serious disturbances in the City of Belfast. Both these officers felt the time had come to call the Army to the aid of the civil power.

1.19 On 12 August the traditional Apprentice Boys' Parade was due to take place in Londonderry. The Minister of Home Affairs and his senior police advisers had to decide whether or not to ban it. Believing that all sections of responsible opinion in Londonderry were anxious to keep the peace and that, in particular, the Apprentice Boys on one side, and the Bogside leaders on the other had made detailed arrangements for stewarding, the Minister decided not to intervene, but to allow the parade to proceed. The parade itself was well controlled and orderly but, as it passed through Waterloo Place, some stones were thrown out of William Street in the direction of the police and the parade. The stone-throwers were young hooligans, but their actions released the strong feeling of the Bogside to an extent that the few stewards available were quite unable to control. From this small beginning developed not only three days of disturbance in Londonderry, but the many disturbances elsewhere, including in particular the very serious disorders in Belfast.

1.20 It must be remembered that people were influenced not only by such major events as the Londonderry riot, but also by their own local situations. For instance, the Civil Rights Association had been picketing the Local Authority Offices in Dungannon for many months. On 11 August they were forestalled by the Protestants. Later that evening, after a meeting of the Civil Rights Association, a Catholic riot developed which was dispersed only after baton charges by the police down Irish Street. There were allegations of police brutality and there is no doubt that these allegations disturbed not only the Catholic population of Dungannon, but also the people living in the neighbouring village of Coalisland. On 12 August there was a serious riot in Coalisland, while on the 13th rioting again broke out in Dungannon.

1.21 On the 13th the disturbances spread to other centres. There was serious trouble in the Falls Road area of Belfast. At the same time there were riots in Dungannon, Dungiven, Newry and Armagh. The scale of the riots in Londonderry was such that they were beyond the ability of the police to suppress or control. It became clear to those in authority that the aid of the Army would have to be sought. At five o'clock on 14 August the Army entered Londonderry.

1.22 We are satisfied that the spread of the disturbances owed much to a deliberate decision by some minority groups to relieve police pressure on the rioters in Londonderry. Amongst these groups must be included NICRA, whose executive decided to organise demonstrations in the Province so as to prevent reinforcement of the police in Londonderry. We were told that they intended to exclude Belfast from their plans; but we have no doubt that some activists, so far from accepting the decision, did co-operate with some in Londonderry to call for demonstrations in Belfast. There is clear evidence of such a call being made in Divis Street on the 13th.

1.23 On the night of the 14th, the worst violence of the 1969 disturbances occurred in Belfast, notably in the Ardoyne and on the Falls Road. The police, who believed by now that they were facing an armed uprising, used guns, including Browning machine-guns mounted on Shorland armoured vehicles. Four Catholics were shot dead by police fire: one Protestant was killed by a shot fired by a rioter in Divis Street. Catholic houses were burnt by Protestants, especially in the Conway Street area. The only clear evidence of direct IRA participation in these riots occurred at St Comgall's School in Divis Street, where automatic fire was directed against the police. On the same night there was a riot in Armagh, as a result of which a Catholic man was killed by USC fire.

1.24 By the morning of 15 August the police were exhausted. They failed to control the violence which broke out that day on the Crumlin Road and in the Clonard area of the city. Nor did they prevent the burning of factories by Catholics and public houses by Protestants. It has to be admitted that the police were no longer in control of the city. On the evening of the 15th, the Army entered the Falls Road, but not the Crumlin Road, which was the scene of a serious confrontation between Protestants and Catholics. Two people—one Protestant and one Catholic—died by civilian shooting in Belfast on 15 August. Catholic houses were burnt that night by Protestants at Bombay Street (Falls Road area) and Brookfield Street (Crumlin Road). On the evening of 16 August, the Army entered the Crumlin Road and thereafter the disturbances died away. In some riot areas barricades remained. Defence committees began to exercise de facto authority in several Catholic areas. So far as the Falls Road district is concerned we are satisfied that the disturbances produced the committees rather than the committees the disturbances.

CHAPTER 2—THE ORIGIN AND NATURE OF THE DISTURBANCES

2.1 It is possible to reach some general conclusions as to the origin and nature of the riots and other disorders which disturbed the Province in the spring and summer of 1969. At the time both the Prime Minister (NI) and Cardinal Conway* issued public statements. On 14 August the Prime Minister declared in the House of Commons:—

> "This is not the agitation of a minority seeking by lawful means the assertion of political rights. It is the conspiracy of forces seeking to overthrow a Government democratically elected by a large majority. What the teenage hooligans seek beyond cheap kicks I do not know. But of this I am quite certain—they are being manipulated and encouraged by those who seek to discredit and overthrow this Government".†

On 23 August the Cardinal, together with the Bishops of Derry, Clogher, Dromore, Kilmore, and Down and Connor, issued a statement which included the following:—

> "The fact is that on Thursday and Friday of last week the Catholic districts of Falls and Ardoyne were invaded by mobs equipped with machine-guns and other firearms. A community which was virtually defenceless was swept by gunfire and streets of Catholic homes were systematically set on fire.
>
> We entirely reject the hypothesis that the origin of last week's tragedy was an armed insurrection".‡

The conspiracy theory

2.2 In our judgment there was no plot to overthrow the Government or to mount an armed insurrection. But, although there was no conspiracy in the sense in which that term is normally used (for it is not possible to identify any group or groups of persons deliberately planning the riots of 1969), yet it would be the height of naivety to deny that the teenage hooligans, who almost invariably threw the first stones, were manipulated and encouraged by persons seeking to discredit the Government. While accepting that the major riots that occurred in Londonderry, Belfast, Armagh and Dungannon were not deliberately planned, we are satisfied that, once the disturbances started, they were continued by an element that also found expression in bodies more or less loosely organised, such as the People's Democracy, and various local Defence Associations, and in associating themselves with bodies such as NICRA and the several Action Committees. The public impact of the activities of this element was tremendously enhanced by the coverage given by the mass media of communication.

2.3 The matters remitted to us do, however, include some acts of violence which were planned. The explosions at the public utility installations in March and April resulted from the criminal conspiracy of certain extreme Protestants concerned to undermine confidence in Captain O'Neill's administration. It is highly probable, though direct evidence is lacking, that the bomb attacks on the Belfast post offices in April were planned by Republican elements as a diversionary tactic to relieve the Bogside where heavy rioting was in progress. Finally, the attack on the Crossmaglen police station in August was an IRA operation planned and carried out from a base in the Republic.

2.4 But the riots are a different matter. Neither the IRA nor any Protestant organisation nor anybody else planned a campaign of riots. They were communal disturbances arising from a complex political, social and economic situation. More often than not they arose from slight beginnings: but the communal tensions were such that, once begun, they could not be controlled. Young men threw a few stones at some policemen or at an Orange procession: there followed a confrontation between police and stone-throwers now backed by a sympathetic crowd. On one side people saw themselves, never "the others", charged by a police force which they regarded as partisan: on the other side, police and people saw a violent challenge to the authority of the State. These attitudes were the creature of recent events. Their own interpretations of the events of 1968 and early 1969 had encouraged the belief amongst the minority that demonstrations did secure concessions, and that the police were their enemy and the main obstacle to a continuing programme of demonstrations, while the same events had convinced a large number of Protestants that a determined attempt, already gaining a measure of success, was being made to undermine the constitutional position of Northern Ireland within the United Kingdom. In so tense a situation it needed very little to set going a major disturbance.

The IRA

2.5 Undoubtedly there was an IRA influence at work in the DCDA in Londonderry, in the Ardoyne and Falls Road areas of Belfast, and in Newry. But they did not start the riots, or plan them: indeed, the evidence is that the IRA was taken by surprise* and did less than many of their supporters thought they should have done.

*A letter from the head of RUC Special Branch to the Minister of Home Affairs is set out at Appendix V (C).

2.6 The IRA had, we were assured, [illegible] for subversion*: no doubt, it always has had: but, in so far as it participated in the disturbances under review, its members joined in after they had begun. The incident of the shooting from St. Comgall's School, in its timing and its uniqueness, illustrates the point: as do the violent and futile actions of the IRA in Newry and Crossmaglen.

2.7 There is evidence, however, of preparations for "defence" by the DCDA in Londonderry, a body which certainly included some IRA members. But, as our review of the Londonderry disturbances reveals, the basic pattern was reaction to, and not the initiating of, the course of events. The DCDA did not organise the disturbances: but it made quite elaborate preparations to keep the police out of the Bogside, if necessary by violence, in the event of disturbances erupting on the streets. The true difference between the IRA in Belfast and the DCDA in Londonderry was that the DCDA was ready, while the IRA was not.

NICRA

2.8 The NICRA did not plan the rioting but it did help to spread the disturbances on 13 August. Several of its prominent members were Republicans and there were various links with IRA personalities. We accept the statements of Mr Kevin Boyle and Mr Frank Gogarty† that they regarded the August disturbances as disastrous. When Mr Boyle was asked whether they provided an opportunity which might be exploited to attain his ends, he said:—

> "No, quite the reverse. I am quite convinced that the events in August 1969 put back my ideals much further than they put back the Unionist Government's."

But equally we accept Mr Gogarty's own assessment of his Association's responsibility for the Protestant backlash of 14 and 15 August:—

> "In this matter I am afraid that we all on the Executive under-estimated the strength of militant Unionism at this time, and had we foreseen the holocaust which did occur in mid-August we most certainly would not have entered on such an enterprise as we did, but . . . we underestimated the influence which possibly many right-wing Unionist politicians had when they slandered our Association as subversive. We did not really believe that this slander would have been believed as strongly by many Protestants as it seems it was."

In that sense NICRA bears a heavy, albeit indirect, responsibility for the horrors that occurred on 14 August.

Politicians of the opposition

2.9 There is no evidence to implicate the leaders of the political opposition. Men like Mr Hume, Mr Ivan Cooper, Mr G Fitt, however strong their words on a political platform, consistently opposed violence. The political feeling they engendered no doubt played a part in the build-up of the tension which gave rise to the disturbances, but, where speech is free, this is a danger that has to be accepted. Miss Bernadette Devlin was, however, an exception. Although her participation was limited, her principal activity being associated with the burning and the manning of the Rossville Street barricade in Londonderry, she must bear a degree of responsibility, once the disturbances had begun, for encouraging Bogsiders to resist the police with violence. Yet her role was a minor one, and we have no evidence that she was a party to any plot to subvert the state or stir up insurrection.

The Protestant invasion theory

2.10 Protestant participation in the disorders under review was largely that of violent reaction to disturbances started by Catholics, though there were exceptions.* Their reaction was particularly fierce in Belfast in mid-August, when it took the form of violent eruptions into Catholic areas—the Falls, Divis Street, and Hooker Street. These eruptions, the course of which we trace in detail later in the Report, may with some justice be described as "invasions"—given the "ghetto" pattern of so much of Belfast.

2.11 Yet when one looks at the Protestant side of the sectarian divide, it is not very different from the Catholic side. There was no province-wide organisation sponsoring a policy of disturbance. The Orange Order and its lodges were determined to hold their parades and ceremonies, although well aware of the risks of violent reaction. Many Orangemen enjoyed provoking their opponents —just as those opponents enjoyed jeering at and disrupting Orange processions. The opportunities for communal disturbance were plentiful: but, while many Orangemen did little or nothing to reduce them, there was no riot or battle plan.

2.12 The only centre where there was evidence of a Protestant organisation actively participating in the riots was Belfast. Members of the Shankill Defence Association participated in the disturbances on the Crumlin Road and in the Falls, including the Protestant eruptions into Divis Street, Clonard and Brookfield Street, which led to the burning of Catholic homes; but this is not to say that the organisation planned the burnings, and we have no acceptable evidence that it or any other organisation was party to any such plan. The truth, we believe, was simply that, at a time when communal feeling was high, violent events released violent passions which men such as Mr McKeague did nothing to assuage and which proved to be beyond the ability of the people's leaders or the police to control.

2.13 Nevertheless, just as on the other side of the sectarian divide loomed the sinister shadow of the IRA, so among the Protestants there lurked extremists eager to identify themselves with the Ulster Volunteer Force of 1912, the year of the "Ulster Covenant".† The evidence suggests that these men really directed their activities against the moderates of the Unionist party, paying little or no attention to the IRA or the political Opposition. Thus, the public utility explosions in April, which the Tribunal is satisfied were the work of these extremists, were directed against the Unionist government of the day.

*e.g. Belfast 2-4 August.

†The graffiti "UVF" appear as frequently on the blank walls of Belfast and other centres as do the graffiti "IRA". But the phenomenon establishes nothing, since on both sides of the sectarian divide there are to be found many to whom the distinction between myth and fact is not always visible.

2.14 Our inquiry and the evidence t[illegible]ave not revealed the existence of any "UVF" organisation comparable with the command structure of the IRA. Nevertheless it is to be noted that in 1966 the Government of Northern Ireland placed the UVF on the list of illegal organisations, where it still remains.

2.15 The name of Dr Paisley has been linked with these extremists. A major submission made on behalf of some who were represented before the Tribunal was to the effect that Dr Paisley by his actions and speeches must be held largely responsible for the disturbances. Those who live in a free country must accept as legitimate the powerful expression of views opposed to their own, even if, as often happens, it is accompanied by exaggeration, scurrility, and abuse. Dr Paisley's spoken words were always powerful and must have frequently appeared to some as provocative: his newspaper was such that its style and substance were likely to rouse the enthusiasm of his supporters and the fury of his opponents. We are satisfied that Dr Paisley's role in the events under review was fundamentally similar to that of the political leaders on the other side of the sectarian divide. While his speeches and writings must have been one of the many factors increasing tension in 1969, he neither plotted nor organised the disorders under review and there is no evidence that he was a party to any of the acts of violence investigated by us.

General conclusion

2.16 Thus, a study of the Protestant side of the disturbances reveals the same basic pattern as that of the Catholic—communal disturbances erupting without plan or premeditation during a summer when the traditional Protestant marches and ceremonies, following immediately after the massively publicized and vividly remembered events of the period August 1968 to April 1969, provided a series of occasions for the eruption of violence which neither the political leaders nor the forces available to the NI Government could prevent or suppress.

2.17 One final comment needs to be made. The absence of any sustained heavy shooting by civilians, save for the firing from St. Comgall's school on the night of 14/15 August, was a feature of the disturbances. While weapons were fired on occasions by Protestants and by Catholics the rarity of organised gunfire, which is well evidenced by the very few police casualties attributable to bullet or pellet injury, combines with the other more direct evidence discussed in this chapter to support the conclusion that in 1969 there was no organised campaign of armed insurrection by one side or of armed vengeance by the other.

CHAPTER 3—THE RUC AND THE USC

The RUC

3.1 In a very real sense our inquiry was an investigation of police conduct. Criticism was directed against the higher direction of the RUC, the manner of their employment on the streets during the disturbances, the use of CS gas, the use of guns, and the behaviour of individual policemen. We deal with these criticisms as they arise for consideration in our detailed discussion of the disturbances. At this stage we direct attention only to criticisms of general importance.

3.2 Undou[illegible]istakes were made and certain individual officers acted wrongly on occasions. But the general case of a partisan force co-operating with Protestant mobs to attack Catholic people is devoid of substance, and we reject it utterly.

3.3 We are satisfied that the great majority of the members of the RUC was concerned to do its duty, which, so far as concerned the disturbances, was to maintain order on the streets, using no more force than was reasonably necessary to suppress rioting and protect life and limb. Inevitably, however, this meant confrontation and on occasions conflict with disorderly mobs. Moreover, since most of the rioting developed from action on the streets started by Catholic crowds, the RUC were more often than not facing Catholics who, as a result, came to feel that the police were always going for them, baton-charging them —never "the others".

3.4 In fact the RUC faced and, if necessary, charged those who appeared to them to be challenging, defying, or attacking them. We are satisfied that, though they did not expect to be attacked by Protestants, they were ready to deal with them in the same way, if it became necessary. The Shankill riots of the 2/4 August establish beyond doubt the readiness of the police to do their duty against Protestant mobs, when they were the disturbers of the public peace.

3.5 But it is painfully clear from the evidence adduced before us that by July the Catholic minority no longer believed that the RUC was impartial and that Catholic and civil rights activists were publicly asserting this loss of confidence. Understandably these resentments affected the thinking and feeling of the young and the irresponsible, and induced the jeering and throwing of stones which were the small beginnings of most of the disturbances. The effect of this hostility on the RUC themselves was unfortunate. They came to treat as their enemies, and accordingly also as the enemies of the public peace, those who persisted in displaying hostility and distrust towards them.

3.6 Thus there developed the fateful split between the Catholic community and the police. Faced with the distrust of a substantial proportion of the whole population and short of numbers, the RUC had (as some senior officers appreciated) lost the capacity to control a major riot. Their difficulties naturally led them, when the emergency arose, to have recourse to methods such as baton-charges, CS gas and gunfire, which were sure ultimately to stoke even higher the fires of resentment and hatred.

3.7 There were, in our judgment, six occasions in the course of these disturbances when the police, by act or omission, were seriously at fault. They were:—

(1) The lack of firm direction in handling the disturbances in Londonderry during the early evening of 12 August. The "Rossville Street incursion" was undertaken as a tactical move by the Reserve Force commander without an understanding of the effect it would have on Bogside attitudes. The County Inspector did understand, but did not prevent it. The incursion was seen by the Bogsiders as a repetition of events in January and April and led many, including moderate men such as Father Mulvey, to think that the police must be resisted.

(2) The decision by the County Inspector to put USC on riot control duty in the streets of Dungannon on 13 August without disarming them and without ensuring that there was an experienced police officer present and in command.

(3) The similar decision of the County Inspector in Armagh on 14 August.

(4) The use of Browning machine-guns in Belfast on 14 August and 15 August. The weapon was a menace to the innocent as well as the guilty, being heavy and indiscriminate in its fire: and on one occasion (the firing into St Brendan's block of flats where the boy Rooney was killed) its use was wholly unjustifiable.

(5) The failure to prevent Protestant mobs from burning down Catholic houses:—

(a) in the Conway Street area on the night of 14/15 August:
members of the RUC were present in Conway Street at the time, but failed to take effective action;

(b) in Brookfield Street on the night of 15/16 August:
a police armoured vehicle was in the Crumlin Road when Brookfield Street was set on fire, but made no move.

(6) The failure to take any effective action to restrain or disperse the mobs or to protect lives and property in the riot areas on 15 August during the hours of daylight and before the arrival of the Army.

3.8 The conduct which we have criticised was due very largely to the belief held at the time by many of the police, including senior officers, that they were dealing with an armed uprising engineered by the IRA. This was what all their experience would have led them to expect: and when, on 13 August, some firing occurred and a grenade was thrown in Leeson Street, Belfast, their expectation seemed to them to have materialised. In dealing with an armed uprising, the usual restraints on police conduct would not be so strong, while more attention would naturally be given to the suppression of the insurgents than to the protection of people's lives and property. In fact, the police appreciation that they had on their hands an armed uprising led by the IRA was incorrect. Direct IRA participation was slight; and there is no credible evidence that the IRA planned or organised the disturbances.

3.9 But there was a more fundamental cause for these failures. Police strength was not sufficient to maintain the public peace but the Inspector-General acted in August as though it was. The Commissioner and Deputy Commissioner for Belfast had learnt the lesson, at the time of the Protestant riots in early August, when they reached the view that, without the aid of the Army, order could not be ensured on the streets of Belfast. But it is clear from the advice given to the Minister of Home Affairs (NI) on the issue whether or not to ban the Apprentice Boys' parade and from his own evidence given to the Tribunal that the Inspector-General did not share this view. It was not until he was confronted with the physical exhaustion of the police in Londonderry on the 14th and in Belfast on the 15th that he was brought to the decision to call in the aid of the Army. Had he correctly appreciated the situation before the outbreak of the mid-August disturbances, it is likely that the Apprentice Boys' parade would not have taken place and the [illegible] would have been sufficiently reinforced to prevent disorder arising in the city. Had he correctly appreciated the threat to Belfast that emerged on 13 August, he could have saved the city the tragedy of the 15th. We have no doubt that he was well aware of the existence of political pressures against calling in the Army; but their existence constituted no excuse, as he himself recognised when in evidence he stoutly and honourably asserted that they did not influence his decisions.

3.10 The criticisms we have made should not, however, be allowed to obscure the fact that, overall, the RUC struggled manfully to do their duty in a situation which they could not control. Their courage, as casualties and long hours of stress and strain took their toll, was beyond praise; their ultimate failure to maintain order arose not from their mistakes, nor from any lack of professional skill, but from exhaustion and shortage of numbers. Once large-scale communal disturbances occur they are not susceptible to control by police. Either they must be suppressed by overwhelming force, which, save in the last resort, is not acceptable in our society and was not within the control of the NI Government; or a political solution must be devised. There are limits to the efficiency of the police and the criminal law: confronted with such disturbances the police and the ordinary processes of the criminal law are of no avail.

The USC

3.11 There were grave objections, well understood by those in authority, to the use of the USC in communal disturbances. In 1969 the USC contained no Catholics* but was a force drawn from the Protestant section of the community. Totally distrusted by the Catholics, who saw them as the strong arm of the Protestant ascendancy, they could not show themselves in a Catholic area without heightening tension. Moreover they were neither trained nor equipped for riot control duty.

3.12 Nevertheless the USC was the only reserve† available to the NI Government if events should develop which over-extended the RUC. Accordingly, in July the Minister for Home Affairs (NI) had authorised their use in riot control without firearms, but with batons. After USC protest, he revised the instruction by allowing officers and NCOs to carry arms.

3.13 On 13 August the Prime Minister indicated in a broadcast that USC would not be used for riot control but on the 14th an instruction was issued to the effect that they could be so used, but equipped "where possible" with batons. It was not until the 15th that USC were expressly instructed to report for duty with their firearms.

3.14 The effect of the difficulties and the instructions set out above was that the USC were largely held in reserve in July and only hesitantly committed in August. They were not used at all during the July disturbances in Londonderry but did appear on the streets of Dungiven on 13 July when a party of USC without provocation fired over the heads of a crowd emerging from the Castle ballroom.

*Report of the Advisory Committee on Police in Northern Ireland, Cmd 535 (the Hunt Report).

†Save for the Army, which was not, however, under NI control. See Part VI.

3.15 When in early August the Sh[illegible]ts exposed the weakness of the police when threatened by Protestant as w[illegible]as Catholic rioting, the decision was taken to use the USC for patrol duties in the Shankill. They were successful in this predominantly Protestant area at a time when the RUC were not welcome —because of their firm action against the Protestant mobs at the beginning of the month. The USC performed their patrol duties unarmed.

3.16 Until 14 August USC were also used in Belfast to protect licensed premises which, being largely Catholic owned and managed, were at risk from Protestant hooligans when communal tension was high. Again, they did the job well—as is evidenced by the destruction of so many public houses as soon as they were withdrawn.

3.17 On 14 August, the day that a broadcast call for their report to duty to their nearest police station went out, USC appeared on the streets of Londonderry, Belfast, Dungannon, Armagh, and Newry.

3.18 In Londonderry they appeared in some numbers at Waterloo Place and Bishop Street. They did not carry firearms. Their arrival in Waterloo Place caused consternation among the Catholics: but, in fact, they did little or nothing. In Bishop Street they were used to restrain a Protestant crowd in the Fountain. There is some evidence of special constables misbehaving themselves in this area by participating in an exchange of petrol bombs and missiles with a Catholic crowd. There is however nothing to justify any general criticism of the USC in the few hours that it performed riot duty on the streets of Londonderry.

3.19 On 13 August USC, who had arrived to assist the hard-pressed police in Coalisland, fired without orders into a riotous crowd but were immediately ordered to stop, which they did. On the 14th in Dungannon and Armagh armed parties of USC opened fire on Catholic crowds, causing casualties, including one death at Armagh.

3.20 In Coalisland there were extenuating circumstances, in as much as the police party was under severe pressure from a riotous mob which heavily outnumbered them. In Armagh, deprived of police leadership, USC personnel panicked, but there was no justification for firing into the crowd. In Dungannon, the Tribunal has been at a loss to find any explanation for the shooting, which it is satisfied was a reckless and irresponsible thing to do. As in Armagh, so also in Dungannon there was an absence of police leadership at the critical time.

3.21 Their employment in Belfast on 14th revealed their helplessness in a communal disturbance. Instructed to hold back Protestants who attempted to penetrate down such streets as Dover and Percy streets into the Falls/Divis district, they failed. Confronted with a small Catholic mob moving up the Catholic end of Dover Street, they fought it back. The scale of the fighting increased, and became a sectarian riot, in which the USC had only an incidental part. In Percy Street some members of the USC and some Protestant civilians co-operated in trying to drive a Catholic crowd back to Divis Street. When eventually Protestants erupted into Divis Street they stood about helplessly while their presence convinced the Catholics that "the Bs" were spearheading the assault.

3.22 There [illegible]vidence that the USC, who were used to hold back Protestants in the Disraeli Street area, participated in the rioting inside the Ardoyne.

3.23 In reviewing the conduct of the USC it is necessary to distinguish between Belfast and the rest of the Province. When USC were used for riot control duty outside Belfast they showed on several occasions a lack of proper discipline, particularly in the use of firearms. But in Belfast on 14 August their presence in Dover Street and Percy Street, while evoking the hostility of the Catholics, was unable to restrain the aggression of the Protestants.

3.24 A little-publicised but important contribution made by the USC to the events under review was by way of the mobilisation of some 300 of them into the RUC. About 80 of them had been mobilized for duty as members of the Reserve Force several months earlier. The Reserve Force led the "Rossville Street incursion" into the Bogside on 12 August and provided the armed Shorlands which were used in the Belfast riots. But there are no grounds for singling out mobilised USC as being guilty of misconduct. The incursion into the Bogside and the use of Browning machine-guns in Belfast were RUC, not USC, responsibilities.

PART II.—ATTACKS ON PUBLIC UTILITIES AND POST OFFICES MARCH/APRIL 1969

CHAPTER 4—THE ATTACKS

4.1 Between 30 March and 25 April there occurred five incidents of damage by explosion to water and electricity supply installations and a number of petrol bomb attacks on post offices. The Tribunal was required by the terms of the joint resolution to investigate these incidents, each of which was a criminal attack upon property. The investigation has proved unfruitful, partly from lack of evidence, partly because, after the Tribunal had been established, prosecutions were brought against a number of men in respect of three of the five incidents of damage to the water and electricity supply installations. With the exception of one man who pleaded guilty and was sentenced to twelve years' imprisonment, the prosecutions failed, leaving to the Tribunal the difficult decision whether to re-open the investigation or to leave the verdicts undisturbed. For the reasons given later, the Tribunal decided not to disturb the verdicts.

4.2 The attacks caused extensive damage to property, but there is no evidence of personal injury or loss of life. Electricity supply was maintained notwithstanding the damage to two installations: but the water supply to the city of Belfast was substantially diminished for about ten days.

The attacks (in chronological order) upon the electricity and water installations

30 March

4.3 At 3 55 am a series of explosions damaged the electricity sub-station at Castlereagh, some six miles from the centre of Belfast. Four charges of explosive were used, access having been gained by the removal of one of the railings so as to provide a gap through which a man could pass. A fuse tape was passed through the gap.

20 April

4.4 In the early hours of the morning there were two incidents. Explosions damaged an electricity pylon at Kilmore, County Armagh, and the Silent Valley reservoir in County Down.

4.5 At Kilmore four charges were laid but the work was inexpert, and the damage done was minor. Nevertheless, the force of the explosions moved the pylon two feet from its original position and broke one of the 13 high-tension wires it carried.

4.6 At Silent Valley a quantity of explosive was placed inside a tunnel through which passed two pipes, linking the reservoir with the overflow channel. The resulting explosion damaged control valves, and the pipe system linked to them. The blast caused the escape of a great volume of water from the reservoir.

24 April

4.7 At about 12 10 am a severe explosion fractured the water pipeline at Templepatrick*, Co Antrim, at a point where it runs close to the main Belfast-Antrim road. The pipe lost all the water coming through it.

*Templepatrick is the place referred to in the parliamentary resolutions as Clady.

4.8 At about 2 00 am at Annalong, some 4 miles from Silent Valley, an explosion damaged a water pipeline where it was carried by a bridge across Dinneywater. Four charges were laid and the pipe was attacked at two joints about 20 ft apart. More explosive than was needed was used, but only one arch of the bridge was damaged. The pipe was fractured and the water it contained was lost.

4.9 The expert evidence indicates that these explosions were the work of men whose knowledge was limited to the use of explosives in quarrying operations. Damage done to the two electricity installations did not disrupt electricity supply, but the cost of repair and reinstatement was heavy.

4.10 The damage done to the water installations was more serious, since it constituted a threat to the water supply of Belfast. The Silent Valley explosion cut off 28 m gallons a day from the city, the total daily supply from all sources being 45 m, of which an undamaged Silent Valley provided 30 m. When a few days later the Templepatrick pipeline was fractured, there was an additional loss of 4½ m gallons a day. The damage at Annalong, however, had no effect on supply.

4.11 The Water Commissioners managed to restore to the city a full supply of water within 10 days of the explosion at Silent Valley. This was a fine piece of work, but meantime the domestic consumer was severely rationed. The figure for repair, reinstatement and consequential damage was some £40,000.

The attacks on the post offices

4.12 Eleven post offices were attacked, 10 in Belfast and one in the outskirts of the city at Finaghy. They were "hit-and-run" attacks, all on one night, that of 20/21 April. With the exception of Finaghy, which was at 4 am, all occurred within the period of one hour. The details are:—

Approx. Time	Place	Method of Attack
10 45 pm	171 Oldpark Road	Petrol Bomb: by youths using a car.
10 59 pm	253 Grosvenor Road	Burnt: a youth involved.
11 00 pm	N. Queen Street	Petrol Bomb.
11 00 pm	Durham Street	Gutted by fire.
11 02 pm	101 Falls Road	Petrol Bomb.
11 16 pm	Ballynafeigh	2 Petrol Bombs.
11 20 pm	164 Ormea Road	Petrol Bomb.
11 20 pm	126 Albert Bridge Road	Petrol Bomb by youths.
11 26 pm	175 Cromac Street	Petrol Bomb by youths.
11 30 pm	272 Newtownards Road	Fire.
4 00 am	163 Upper Lisburn Road, Finaghy	Petrol Bombs.

CHAPTER 5—RESPONSIBILITY

Responsibility for the post office attacks

5.1 The Tribunal has no evidence, other than that of the police, as to who perpetrated the attacks or the reason for them. Detective HC Laird told the Tribunal that the police had positive intelligence that they were the work of the IRA. He added:—

> "We have good reason to believe that a request was made to IRA leaders in Belfast from someone in Londonderry at the time for some such action to be taken in Belfast to take the police away from Londonderry where rioting was taking place at the time."

The timing of the attacks and their concentration on one type of target indicate that they were planned. The fact of serious rioting in Londonderry on 20 April supports the police view as to their purpose. Nobody has come forward to offer any other explanation. But the Tribunal has not the evidence to justify a finding, since for security reasons, which it fully accepts as valid, it has not tested judicially the reliability of the intelligence upon which the police view is founded.

5.2 At the time of the explosions and for months thereafter, the police, the Tribunal was told, kept an open mind as to who was responsible. Nevertheless, it was widely believed that they were the work of the IRA. They appeared to fit into a campaign of violent attack upon the very existence of the province of Northern Ireland—its social and economic life as well as its capacity through the police to maintain law and order. But by October a different picture had emerged. On 19 October 1969 a severe explosion damaged the electricity sub-station at Ballyshannon in the Irish Republic. A man was severely injured by the explosion and later died of his injuries. He was Mr Thomas McDowell, a quarry foreman from Kilkeel, his home being less than one mile from the Silent Valley reservoir. The circumstances of the Ballyshannon explosion and Mr McDowell's injuries pointed strongly to his complicity in the attack: but he died without making a statement.

5.3 Shortly after the Ballyshannon explosion the police got a firm lead, as a result of which they interviewed Mr Samuel Stevenson of Belfast. He made a number of statements to the police, in the course of which he referred to the three explosions near Belfast (Castlereagh, Kilmore, and Templepatrick) and to the two explosions at Silent Valley and Annalong. His statements suggested that Mr McDowell was involved at Silent Valley and Annalong, and that some other men, whom he named, were concerned with him and Mr McDowell in the attacks at Castlereagh, Kilmore, and Templepatrick.

5.4 Mr McDowell was already dead, and no further evidence has come to light in connection with the Silent Valley and Annalong explosions. He had the means (access to, and a quarry-man's knowledge of, explosives used in quarrying), the opportunity, and, if Ballyshannon be a guide, the will to commit these offences: but the only direct evidence is the word of Mr Stevenson.

5.5 In so far as the other explosions are concerned, the Crown instituted criminal proceedings against the men named by Mr Stevenson as well as against Mr Stevenson himself. On 5 December 1969 Mr Stevenson pleaded guilty to offences against the Explosive Substances Act 1883 in connection with the explosions at Castlereagh, Kilmore and Templepatrick and was sentenced to 12 years' imprisonment. Five men were charged with conspiring with Mr Stevenson and Mr McDowell to cause the explosion at Templepatrick and on 20 February were found not guilty. Five men were charged with a similar offence in respect of the Kilmore explosion and on 4 March 1970 found not guilty. Finally on 6 March 1970 two men charged with conspiring with Mr Stevenson and Mr McDowell to cause the explosion at Castlereagh were also found not guilty. Thus, the explosions at Castlereagh, Kilmore, and Templepatrick have been the subject of charges against a number of men of conspiracy with Mr Stevenson and Mr McDowell: in each case Mr Stevenson gave evidence: and all the men accused were acquitted after a jury trial.

5.6 Faced with the fact that, notwithstanding Mr Stevenson's evidence, the juries in these conspiracy trials had acquitted the defendants, the Tribunal inquired if there was any fresh evidence that might throw light on these matters. But Detective HC Laird told the Tribunal that there was none.

5.7 Three courses were, therefore, open to the Tribunal:—

(i) to use its compulsory powers to call Mr Stevenson and the acquitted men, and then to subject them to an inquisition designed to seek the Tribunal's own answer to the questions of responsibility determined in the criminal trials;

(ii) to call Mr Stevenson, but not those he implicated, and to attempt an assessment of the value of his evidence;

(iii) to leave the verdicts undisturbed.

5.8 Had fresh evidence been available, it would have been the duty of the Tribunal to examine it and to review all the circumstances, even though such a course might have led to a conclusion that differed from the verdicts of the juries. But, in the absence of fresh evidence, the Tribunal took the view that it was not in the interests of justice to substitute its own assessment of Mr Stevenson's evidence for those of the juries. Moreover, the Tribunal's finding would have been based on a view reached after a process inquisitorial in character and without the full safeguards of criminal trial, and would have deprived the men concerned of the benefit of a jury's verdict already obtained.

5.9 The decision to prosecute the men implicated by Mr Stevenson was taken at a time when the Tribunal was already charged with the task of investigating the explosions, and must be interpreted as indicating that by then criminal trial was considered appropriate. There remained the possibility that after the trials fresh evidence might become available, in which event investigation by the Tribunal would have been appropriate. But the possibility did not materialise.

5.10 For these reasons the Tribunal is not able to make any findings as to the identity of those who caused these explosions. Certain facts are, however, clear. All five explosions were the work of Protestant extremists, among whom must be included Mr Stevenson. Their purpose was to strengthen the campaign to topple the then Prime Minister, Captain O'Neill, from power and to secure the release from gaol of Dr Paisley and Major Bunting. Their intentions were realised: Captain O'Neill resigned on 28 April and Dr Paisley and Major Bunting were released from gaol on 6 May under the terms of a general amnesty.

PART III

CHAPTER 6—BELFAST: MAY–JULY DISTURBANCES

6.1 In May trouble began to develop in the Ardoyne district of Belfast. This period is outside the Tribunal's terms of reference for Belfast but a brief account is essential background for our account of the main disturbances in July and August.

6.2 The Ardoyne district is a Catholic area in west Belfast. The part of it with which the Tribunal was concerned is a working class area located on the north side of the Crumlin Road, near the Holy Cross Church. It is roughly defined by Brompton Park, by the industrial area east of Flax Street and by the Crumlin Road. There were about 24 Protestant families in Hooker Street, which had originally been a Protestant street, but otherwise the population was predominantly Catholic. On the south side of the Crumlin Road opposite Hooker Street there is a number of small streets of which Disraeli Street is roughly the geographical centre. They were inhabited predominantly by Protestants, though Catholic families were to be found, prior to the disturbances of 1969, in Chief Street and here and there in some of the other streets. The Crumlin Road formed a frontier between the two communities, and conflict usually developed in the area where Hooker Street and Disraeli Street face each other. A focus of conflict was the Edenderry Inn, which stood on the city side of the Hooker Street/Crumlin Road corner*.

6.3 The Ardoyne is part of the Oldpark constituency which is represented at Stormont by Mr Vivian Simpson, MP (NI), of the Northern Ireland Labour Party. The RUC reckoned that there were only about 20 IRA members in the area. The hard core of troublemakers consisted of a tiny criminal element unrepresentative of the community. On the other hand it was an area where hostility to the police once aroused would take a political colour, and there is ample evidence that political and sectarian tension had increased before the disturbances began. In this the Ardoyne reflected the situation which had developed in Northern Ireland since the summer of 1968.

6.4 The area fell within the RUC's C district. The senior police officer was District Inspector Montgomery who had been appointed in May 1969. The overall strength of the police in C district was 130. There were police stations at Oldpark and Tennent Street, and a report centre at Ligoniel. In normal circumstances only about 13 police would have been engaged at any one time in car or patrol duty.

Ardoyne—The events in May

6.5 Violence in the Ardoyne began at the Edenderry Inn on the evening of 16 May. This was a Friday. A customer, who had gone upstairs to the lounge bar, was said to have been injured in a drunken fall down the stairs. One of the patrons called an ambulance and the publican called the police. A crowd gathered to watch the ambulance and a police ...obile patrol arrived in riot gear. A man was arrested. The Edenderry crowd then threw stones and other missiles at the police. Some damage was done to shops and premises on the other side of the Crumlin Road.

6.6 On Saturday, 17 May there was further trouble near the Edenderry Inn. Two uniformed constables had been doing a normal patrol of the Crumlin Road. At closing time they were paying attention to licensed premises and were standing opposite the Edenderry Inn. At about 10 30 pm a crowd came out of the Inn. They sang Republican songs for a few minutes and suddenly attacked the two policemen with pieces of iron grating, bricks, pieces of concrete and petrol bombs. Sergeant Gracey, who was present, gave evidence that there were 80 people in the crowd. People from the Hooker Street/Herbert Street area joined the Edenderry crowd, and its numbers increased to about 200. The police had reinforcements standing by, and about 70 men were brought to the area. The police used mobile patrols to disperse crowds in the side streets on the north side of the Crumlin Road. Order was restored between 11 30 pm and midnight. The rioters did some damage to property on the south side of the Crumlin Road. Several arrests were made.

6.7 On Sunday the 18th the police withdrew from the Hooker Street area, in the hope that this would reduce tension. However, stones were thrown at private cars and police landrovers had to be sent in to clear the crowd. Police patrols were resumed, but petrol bombs and missiles were thrown at them on Monday, 19 May, and two young men were arrested. During the next weekend—on Saturday, 23 May—there were again disorders involving patrons of the Edenderry Inn. Police with landrovers, and using riot gear, again dispersed the crowds into the streets on the north side of the Crumlin Road For the next few weeks no similar episodes were reported. But police reserves were held at Tennent Street police station every night.

6.8 The scuffles of May, minor though they were, harmed relations between the people and the police. Mr Wolseley, the Police Commissioner for the city, saw the danger and encouraged discussions between senior police officers and representatives of the Ardoyne community. In particular Mr Simpson, MP and Father Marcellus Gillespie, a priest of Holy Cross parish, had frequent meetings with the police. On 23 May both Mr Simpson and Father Gillespie attended a public meeting on waste ground at Hooker Street/Butler Street. This meeting was adjourned till Sunday, 24 May. It was then reconvened in Holyrood Hall, a church property. The platform party included several local Republicans and the meeting was under the auspices of the NICRA. The meeting decided to form a Citizens Action Committee. The members chosen were Mr Joseph Graham, Mr Anthony Cosgrove, Father Gillespie and Mr Simpson.

6.9 According to Father Gillespie "everyone present seemed to be of the opinion that the troublemakers were largely drunks, although there was a feeling that the police were not without blame in the matter as well. So they thought if they could control the hooligan element this would blow over." Responsible men were asked to try and ensure that the street corners on the Crumlin Road were kept clear after the bars closed.

6.10 The Action Committee, together with Mr Fergus Woods, Chairman of the Belfast CRA, met the City Commissioner of the RUC on 29 May. An agreed statement was issued. This indicated that the meeting's purpose had been to air views about the Ardoyne situation and it noted "with great satisfaction" the contribution of the residents to the continuance of the present peaceful situation. However it may have been at this meeting that DI Montgomery remonstrated with Father Gillespie about the appointment of vigilantes.

6.11 The Action Committee quickly became defunct. Mr Cosgrove and Mr Graham had no close connection with the Ardoyne district and were soon told by a crowd to get out of it and stay out. They both had political objectives opposed to the existing constitution of Northern Ireland and Father Gillespie agreed that their interest had been to form a committee in an area of potential supporters.

Unity Flats

6.12 Unity Flats* is the name of a complex of modern blocks of flats owned by the Belfast City Corporation, the first of which were completed in 1967 as part of a housing redevelopment scheme which is still in progress. The flats are situated at the junction of Old Lodge Road and Upper Library Street. They overlook Peters Hill which links the Shankill Road with the City Centre†. In July 1969 the flats were occupied predominantly, but not exclusively, by Catholics, many of whom had been resident in the area (then known as Carrick Hill) before its redevelopment. The Shankill Road (which is the westward continuation of Peters Hill) has long been a strongly Protestant area. The flats were therefore a flashpoint, particularly on occasions when groups of Shankill Road Orangemen had to pass them on their way to and from the City centre.

Unity Flats, 12 July

6.13 In the early hours of the morning of 12 July, some time after 2 am, an Orange band playing party tunes marched down Peters Hill and North Street from the Shankill Road direction. It seems that the band stopped for a short time outside the flats. Some of the residents of the flats were disturbed by the noise and they complained to the police who were accompanying the band. One witness asserted that the police told some residents that if they did not like it they should go to the South. Whether or not that is so it is clear that the police did nothing to disperse the bandsmen, but, instead, reminded the residents that they must expect this sort of thing on the night before the 12th. After the band had moved on towards the city centre, a group of people appeared outside the flats playing flutes.

6.14 There is no doubt that a number of the residents were angered by having their sleep disturbed by the noisy playing of what they regarded as provocative tunes. But it has not been suggested that 12 July 1969 was any different from previous years since it appears to have been the practice for loosely organised bands to parade around the city of Belfast in the early hours of the 12th. It seems that the bands which passed the flats on this occasion were made up of people from the Sandy Row area who had been celebrating around the bonfires in the Shankill Road and were returning to Sandy Row.

*Although the flats are situated in Belfast police district "D", "C" district takes over responsibility for policing the area when major processions are being held.

6.15 During the morning a number of bands passed along Peters Hill and made their way via Townsend Street to Carlisle Circus which was the assembly point for the Orange procession. No 9 District Orange Lodge did not however assemble with the other Lodges at Carlisle Circus but, as in previous years, passed down the Shankill Road, Peters Hill and North Street where it linked up with the main procession. No 9 District Lodge and its bands passed the flats without serious incident although there was an exchange of jeering and abuse.

6.16 About 20 policemen were on duty in the vicinity of the flats during the morning and the same number took up position at about 6 30 pm to await the return of No 9 District Lodge from the Orange demonstration in Finaghy. Two policemen were posted on the public balconies (or open corridors) of the block of flats which overlook Peters Hill.

6.17 The main Orange procession passed along Royal Avenue in the direction of Carlisle Circus but, as in former years, No 9 District Lodge detached itself from the main procession at North Street and made its way towards the Shankill Road. Before No 9 Lodge reached the flats, a crowd of 100-200 supporters of the processionists had gathered at the mouth of Boyd Street, opposite the flats. The police did not allow people to congregate on the footpath between Boyd Street and Millfield or on the opposite footpath, immediately in front of the flats. There was an exchange of shouting and abuse between this crowd, in which there were two women wearing Union Jack dresses and marching up and down in a provocative manner, and an opposing crowd, mainly of women, in the forecourt of the flats. Elements of the crowds on both sides of the road appeared to be the worse for drink. At one point one of the women wearing a Union Jack dress ran across from the Boyd Street side of Peters Hill to the forecourt where she engaged in a brief struggle with a woman from the flats side.

6.18 When the procession reached the flats it was accompanied by a large number of supporters who swelled the crowd waiting at Boyd Street. Taking part in the procession were a number of Scottish bands which acted provocatively by marking time and shouting abuse until the organisers of the parade were able to move them on past the flats.

6.19 While the procession was passing the flats, a number of stones and bottles were thrown towards the parade by people standing in the forecourt and on the balconies. A child of 8 (Geoffrey Briggs) who was accompanying his father in the procession was injured below the eye by a piece of glass from a bottle which shattered on the roof of a car. A piece of glass also struck the boy's father.

6.20 After the first missiles had been thrown a section of the supporters of the procession tried to gain access to the forecourt of the flats, but this was prevented by the police. By this time it appears that the two policemen who had been posted on the balconies had left them to join other officers at the entrance to the flats where a crowd had gathered.

6.21 A number of witnesses observed the display of one or two small Tricolours* from the flats as the parade was passing.

6.22 At about 8 30 pm police reinforcements arrived in the form of 40 members of the Reserve Force under DI Gilchrist. As this party reached the flats stones and bottles were being thrown from the flats and stones were also being thrown towards the flats by the Protestant crowd on the opposite side of the road. Policemen were sent up on to the balconies, the crowd in front of the flats were moved inside and the Protestant crowd was shepherded up the Shankill Road. By midnight the area was quiet.

6.23 During the evening the police arrested a young man in Upper Library Street but he was released after representations had been made to DI Gilchrist by two Units Flats residents, Mr Largey and Mr Burns.

Ardoyne: Mid July disturbances

6.24 The police had taken special precautions on the Crumlin Road from the beginning of July. Several men were stationed along the south side, between Columbia Street and Chief Street. After about 7 pm there was at least a sergeant and four constables near Disraeli Street/Hooker Street.

6.25 In May all the serious trouble had arisen from the north side of the Crumlin Road, and Protestants had not been involved. On 9 July there had been a new development. It had been the insistent habit of a Mrs Gilmour, an elderly Protestant living in the predominantly Catholic Chatham Street, to display a Union Jack at about this time of year. This had caused irritation in the past and extra police attention had had to be given. In 1969 tension was greater. On 9 July the flag was torn down and some damage was done to Mrs Gilmour's house. This incident received much publicity. On 11 July a crowd gathered outside the house in Hooker Street of Mrs Gilmour's daughter and chanted threats such as "burn Minnie Baillie out" and "get Minnie Baillie out".

6.26 On 12 July there was trouble at the Edenderry Inn as two Orange Lodges returned from their annual procession during the early evening. The police had arranged beforehand with the bar manager that he would lock its doors as the two processions approached. The bar, however, would continue to do business. The manager carried out this plan, taking care to justify it to the customers as the instructions of his employer rather than the police.

6.27 As the first procession passed the Edenderry Inn a Tricolour was held up to a window. Some members of the Orange Lodge attempted to break ranks but were kept in line by stewards; and police successfully restrained some of the Protestant crowd on the south side of the Crumlin Road. Police then came over to the Inn where they spoke to the manager, who had meantime been locked out by the customers and was standing on the Crumlin Road. While the second procession was passing the Tricolour was again displayed. Afterwards the police went over to the bar and broke down the doors with batons.

*Flags of the Republic of Ireland.

After a struggle they arrested a Mr Deed[illegible] Mr Corrigan who, it was said, had been recognised holding the Tricolour up to the window. It was believed by many that Mr Deeds should not have been arrested: his arrest therefore had a place in the gradual broadening of hostility to the RUC in the Ardoyne.

6.28 With the wisdom of hindsight it is easy to criticise the police for reacting excessively to the Deeds/Corrigan incident. Having successfully restrained the angry Orangemen, they would have been wise to have done no more: but at the time they no doubt thought it would be easier to control the Protestants if they were seen to take action.

Ardoyne: Aftermath of the mid-July disturbances

6.29 Sectarian tension became more marked after 12 July. Protestant crowds formed every night opposite the Hooker Street area. Hooker Street was blocked each night by some form of barricade, with the tacit assent of the police. Speakers from outside the area, such as Mr McGlade, a Republican, and Mr McKeague, a Protestant extremist, were seen addressing meetings.

6.30 A feature of the mounting tension was the strange similarity of fears and apprehensions on the two sides. Mr Simpson (who himself worked tirelessly to lower tension and promote better community relations), recalled in evidence that Mr McGlade was calling on the people to keep together, to protect their area against strangers and all "who arrived into the area to make trouble". A new Action Committee had been formed: and vigilantes began night patrols—all this against a background of deepening distrust of the police. On the other side, Mr McKeague was publicly proclaiming his lack of confidence in the capacity of the police to protect Protestants, and offering to the inhabitants of the Disraeli Street area the services of the Shankill Defence Association, the membership of which, he claimed in evidence, had mounted in these months to something like 2,000.

6.31 During the second half of July there was extensive intimidation of individual Catholics living south of the Crumlin Road. No 15 Disraeli Street, owned by Catholics who were away on holiday, was burnt on 14 July while 35/40 police stood nearby unable, they felt, to prevent it. Four Catholic families moved across the Crumlin Road on about 15 July and forced an entry into the Butler Street school dining centre.

6.32 On the 18 July the police issued a statement:—

> "Police inquiries in the area reveal no evidence of any organised body of men threatening inhabitants in the Crumlin Road area. The police have been and are watching the area most carefully to ensure that nothing of this nature occurs."

It was an over-optimistic assessment of the situation: there may have been available at the time no evidence of any organised intimidation, but DI Montgomery knew intimidation was occurring and in July seven instances were reported to the police in "C" District.

6.33 The[illegible] Protestant parallel on the other side of the Crumlin Road when Mrs Gilmou[illegible]s house was petrol bombed on 26 July, but the bulk of the intimidation in July was practised on Catholics, and a good many families felt it necessary to move.

6.34 The Tribunal has no evidence to support an inference of any organisation behind the intimidation of Protestants at this time. The Action Committee did little more than encourage the vigilantes and provide a valued opportunity for the discussion of problems and fears. Though barricades and weapons (including a few firearms) were to make their appearance on the Ardoyne side in the August riots, there is no evidence that the Citizens Action Committee played any part in these preparations. Nevertheless, the residents, old and young, most certainly did approve of the barricade building, which was done mainly by the young men of the district.

6.35 Equally, there is no direct evidence of Protestants organising the intimidation of Catholics and their expulsion from their side of the Crumlin Road. But the inflammatory leadership of the SDA provided by Mr McKeague, as described by himself in evidence, must have encouraged the bullying and expulsion of Catholics, even though he stoutly denied it.

6.36. The classic communal pattern emerges starkly from the evidence: the two communities exhibiting the same fears, the same sort of self-help, the same distrust of lawful authority. Catholics and Protestants were haunted by the same ghosts and retreated in fear to their respective ghettos while attributing to each other the responsibility and the blame. In the eyes of one the police were seen as the willing tools of a Protestant dominance, in the eyes of the other as a force whose leadership was "soft on rebels."

CHAPTER 7—LONDONDERRY: MID-JULY DISTURBANCES

7.1 Londonderry has always had to live with its place in Protestant tradition—a source of legitimate pride to one section of the community, but understandably viewed with indifference, if not active antipathy, by the other, who constitute the majority in the city*. Yet, certainly in recent years, it had been free of sectarian trouble. But in June 1969 the ugly spectre of sectarian trouble had showed itself. According to DI McAtamney, from June onwards incidents began to occur of stoning, breaking of windows, and "sectarian assaults". He put it this way:—

> "Stopping somebody in the street and asking him what religion he was. If he gave the wrong answer, he would be assaulted. We had not had that previously".

The DI regarded this development of sectarian trouble as a major factor in the situation that faced the police that summer. While recent events in the city and elsewhere in the province had strengthened Protestant fears and prejudices, specific grievances against the police were playing havoc with Catholic attitudes.

*Street plans of Londonderry are at Appendix VIII (B) and (C).

There had arisen and was increasing amo[illegible]n—especially in the Bogside—a profound disenchantment with the RUC. The events within the city in October 1968, January and April 1969 were so interpreted as to bring about a crucial loss of confidence in the impartiality of the RUC who were increasingly viewed as an offensive weapon of a hostile Protestant ascendancy.

7.2 It is not surprising, therefore, that on the eve of 12 July a sectarian disturbance should flash into life at the point where the Long Tower faces the Fountain. It is impossible—and of little or no importance—to establish who threw the first stone: the tinder was plentiful and perilously dry, awaiting the spark that in the prevailing tension the tiniest movement could set off.

7.3 During the evening of 11 July the traditional bonfires blazed in the Fountain. By midnight they had died down. Shortly afterwards two opposing crowds gathered in Fountain Street and Long Tower Street near their junction with Bishop Street. There was an exchange of missiles (stones and bottles: no petrol bombs) and a number of attacks and counter-attacks. The police arrived and, with the assistance of Mr Eamonn McCann and other Civil Rights activists, succeeded in separating and dispersing the two crowds. The police took the Protestants in hand, and moved them up Fountain Street: the Civil Rights leaders, in co-operation with the police, persuaded the Long Tower crowd to move back and disperse.

7.4 The violence on this night was not serious: nothing to indicate the imminence of the severe and prolonged rioting that ensued.

7.5 Two features of this minor riot are worthy of note. One is the language Mr McCann used in the successful effort to disperse the Long Tower crowd. He said to them—

> "that they really did not want to attack Fountain Street, that their reason for being there was that they wished to defend Long Tower Street and the Bogside area against any possible attack . . . that the best way they could do it was not to go outside Long Tower Street".

It is to be noted that this argument achieved its object. The second feature is the observation of DI Armstrong, who, at 2 am, after the riot was over, walked down Long Tower Street, and found that the residents were "highly annoyed" about the stone throwing and that the crowd which finally dispersed contained

> "people who did not live in Long Tower Street, a younger element".

12/13 July

First Phase

7.6 The 12th July is less widely celebrated in Londonderry than elsewhere in the Province: the shops open and it is a normal business day. Orangemen leave the city to attend parades elsewhere: and on the 12th in 1969 they went to Limavady. A[illegible]6 15 pm the Orangemen returned to Londonderry. Their procession was met by DI Armstrong at the junction of Abercorn Road and Bishop Street, it being in his mind to escort it past the flash-point of the Long Tower–Fountain Street junction. He observed it was preceded by a crowd of youths, not part of the procession. He classified them as "potential trouble-makers": they were wearing favours of different kinds—such as might well provoke the other side of the sectarian divide, should they be in a mood to be provoked.

7.7 Nothing happened—other than some jeering and cheering—until the procession reached the Mall Wall near the Walker monument, when a shower of stones came up and over the wall from the direction of the little houses that stand huddled in Nailor's Row below the Wall and outside it. The "potential troublemakers" flung them back at and down upon Nailor's Row where stood the stone-throwers—some 12 or 14 youths of the Bogside. Mr Paul Grace soon stopped them and got them away: the DI was equally successful with the youths on the Wall, and the affair ended, the procession dispersing quietly.

Second Phase

7.8 Shortly before 8 pm groups of youths appeared in the Bogside near Butcher's Gate: about 50 made their way through the gate into Butcher Street. Stewards of the DCAC were doing their best to force them back when DI Armstrong arrived in the street. He was greeted by a hail of stones, the first experience he had had of being stoned. The stewards, who were becoming fearful that with the best will in the world they would not be able to control these youths, suggested to him that he should withdraw the few police (1 sergeant and 6 constables) then in the Diamond:—

> "the purpose being that this crowd were obviously wanting to attack the police, and, if the police were not to be seen, this would make the job of the Civil Rights stewards more easy."

7.9 The police moved back to London Street. At this time a number of young people were on their way from the Fountain area to a dance in the Apprentice Boys' Hall. As they crossed Bishop Street from London Street to Society Street, they attracted the attention of the Bogside youths who, despite the efforts of the stewards, had by now forced their way into the Diamond. Save for the occasional stone thrown from the Diamond up Bishop Street, the trouble was limited to cat calls and jeers from both sides as the Protestant youths were escorted by police across the street. But the Diamond crowd was taking on a more formidable look: it had grown to 200, and now included some older men. At this point Miss Bernadette Devlin MP appeared and made her presence known to the police. If she were given a loudhailer—the crowd was very noisy—she said she would try to make herself heard and get the crowd back into Butcher Street. One was obtained for her but, as the DI wryly commented in evidence:—

> "It had no effect whatever on the crowd, if she spoke to them at all. The crowd in the Diamond became even more restive."

7.10 There was now an ugly develop[illegible]he Diamond crowd turned its attention to shops in Bishop Street, throwing s[illegible]es which broke their windows and then hurling the goods displayed in the shop windows up the street in the direction of the police. The police in London Street had been reinforced to a strength of about 30, the DI appreciating that it would soon no longer be possible to rely on the Civil Rights stewards alone to control the crowd. When the rioters —for this was what the crowd had now become—attempted to overturn a car in Bishop Street, the police were brought out of London Street and staged a baton-charge down towards the Diamond. Its effect was immediate: the rioters fled into Butcher Street and through the gate into the Bogside. The police halted at the gate, where they remained for the time being.

7.11 The baton-charge was necessary and executed with no more force than was called for by the situation. Unfortunately, a DCAC steward who with Mr Grace and others was trying to prevent the car from being overturned, was mistaken for a rioter and was struck by a police baton. This was an understandable, though regrettable, mistake on the part of the police, in respect of which it would be wrong to attribute blame.

7.12 The youths who created these disturbances achieved their objective when the police were compelled to emerge from London Street and make their baton-charge. But there is no evidence of a preconceived plan: and there is evidence, which we accept, that the DCAC stewards did their best to help the police.

Third Phase

7.13 Once outside Butcher's Gate the crowd continued to throw stones at the police sheltering behind the walls in Upper Magazine Street. Very few of the the police at this stage had shields or helmets: though protected by the walls, policemen were being hit by stones and by marbles which appeared to be discharged from catapults. Some of the police threw stones back at the rioters until they were stopped by order of the DI who at this time was, he said, "completely opposed to it".

7.14 The police, whose numbers were, in the DI's opinion, insufficient to take any effective action to disperse their attackers, remained on the defensive behind the walls. At about 11 15 pm a large propane gas cylinder was rolled up to Butcher's Gate by some of the crowd and ignited in the gateway to form, in effect, a fiery barricade. As its flames died away, the DI put some men on the walls in an endeavour to locate and suppress the catapulting, which had already felled 2 policemen: he also asked control to send up reinforcements and some shields. Both eventually arrived, but not in numbers sufficient to enable him to move to disperse the rioters.

7.15 While the police were held near Butcher's Gate, Fr Mulvey (a priest attached to St Eugene's Cathedral) observed what proved to be a significant movement by a part of the Bogside crowd. He had been a spectator of the confrontation between the police and two groups of young men at the gate and had seen th[illegible] from the gas cylinder as they died away. He had also seen the exchange of [illegible]nes thrown between crowd and police over the wall. He had noted what was to become an all too common feature of rioting—the presence of spectators. In this situation he did his best to prevent the young men from erupting through the gate and endeavoured to persuade them to go home. But he had only a partial success. Some of the rioters did depart. Of these 15 to 20 went in a body down Waterloo Street—a movement which had very serious consequences.

7.16 These young men left Butcher's Gate in order to attack the Victoria police barracks in the Strand Road. As they entered Waterloo Place, they smashed the windows of adjoining business premises. There were no police on the streets but Fr Mulvey with others threw a cordon across Waterloo Place so as to prevent the youths moving towards the barracks. He succeeded in diverting them into Little James Street, whence they moved into Sackville Street which offered them what they wanted, another avenue for attacking the barracks. Fr Mulvey and some others held them there for a time, while they indulged in sporadic stone-throwing and window-smashing. There was also some looting. At about 12 15 am Fr Mulvey returned to Butcher's Gate via Waterloo Street, where he was narrowly missed by a brick which flew past his face. He is convinced it was thrown by a policeman on the wall. When he called out, the police ceased throwing stones, but the youthful mob continued. After yet another unsuccessful attempt to disperse them, he decided there was little more he could do, and left the scene.

7.17 There is a degree of conflict between the evidence of Fr Mulvey and CI Corbett, whose recollection is that a serious attack had developed against the police barracks before midnight. But the main course of events is clear. At about the time Fr Mulvey left Waterloo Place, and thereafter, a very serious and damaging riot began: it did not end until 5 am. The primary target of the rioters was undoubtedly the police station, although business and commercial premises in the Waterloo Place area sustained damage. CI Corbett told the Tribunal that shortly before midnight he requested permission of the Deputy I-G to use gas: permission was not, however, given and the request was not pursued. Shortly after midnight, petrol bombs were used for the first time. They were thrown, together with other missiles, at police vehicles which were moving along the Waterloo Place/William Street/Little James Street/Sackville Street quadrilateral in an attempt to disperse the rioters. Small barricades were now thrown up in these streets to obstruct the passage of police vehicles. In the result the police were thrown back on the defensive, seeking to prevent the rioters from breaking into the commercial area of the Strand Road. The riot died away in the early hours of the morning and all was quiet by 5 am.

7.18 During the day of Sunday the 13th there were very few police on the streets of the city: the reason was partly policy—keeping the police out of sight—partly fatigue and the casualties of Saturday night. In the early afternoon groups of youths began to gather at different points in the city: some were "loyalist", some were not. At about 3 pm some 50 young men moved down from the Diamond via Butcher's Gate to Waterloo Place. They were men of the Bogside coming to swell a crowd of youngsters that was assembling in the Waterloo Place area. Mr Thompson, a journalist, estimated the number of this crowd to be of the order of 300: he saw it throwing stones at the windows of shop premises in Waterloo Place. He saw none of the "opposing faction", ie Protestants or "loyalists", present at all, and could see "no obvious reason" for the stone throwing. The stone throwers he put in the age group "14 up to 16 and 17": there were no police in view. Senator Claude Wilton and Brother O'Sullivan (Principal of the Christian Brothers School) spoke to members of the crowd in an attempt to restrain them: but they had no success and after a few minutes went away. County Inspector Corbett's comment on this crowd is revealing and, in our opinion, justified:—

> "the hostility was first not to the police and the DCAC stewards: it had been equally hostile . . . to Brother O'Sullivan. By the later stage they had thrown stones at some of the tourist traffic going along the street and it was a case that the crowd there was absolutely determined, come what may, that it was going to force police action against it".

Nothing, he said (and the Tribunal agrees with him), had occurred that afternoon to provoke them. Their behaviour was wanton aggression.

7.19 If it was their purpose to force the police into action against them, they succeeded. Shortly after 3 pm, police vehicles—4 or 5 Land Rovers and a water cannon—emerged from the Victoria RUC station, whereupon the crowd "raced up William Street". The police employed their strategy of containment, seeking to hold Waterloo Place while trying to keep William Street open by vehicle patrols and the occasional baton charge. They were continuously stoned by the crowd.

7.20 By early evening the crowd had added petrol bombs to the hail of missiles directed at the police. DI Armstrong came on duty at 7 pm: he > "found the police under heavy attack again from stones, petrol bombs and all sorts of missiles coming from the Rossville Street intersection with William Street . . . The police could not advance . . . they were having great difficulty in even holding the position in William Street. There again I regret to say that the only way we could hold that position was by trying to throw back the stones that they were throwing at us".

A little later the police were driven out of William Street, one group forced back into Waterloo Place and another into Little James Street where at its junction with Sackville Street they came under heavy pressure.

7.21 Rioters now broke and entered Brewsters, commercial premises in Little James Street overlooking Sackville Street, and rained missiles from the upper windows until ejected by police action. The community centre, known as the Rossville Hall, near the junction of Rossville Street and William Street, went up in flames, a casualty from the petrol bombing. The fire was reported to the Fire Authority shortly after 9 30 pm but the police advised the brigade not to attempt to go to it—so fierce and dangerous was the riot. Not for another hour was the brigade able to get there: when it did, its arrival was assisted by the efforts of Mr James Doherty, then Chairman of the NI Nationalist Party, who managed to get missile-throwing halted while the firemen tackled the blaze. But it was too late to save the Hall which with adjoining buildings was utterly destroyed.

7.22 The lull created by the intervention of Mr Doherty gave the police some respite. But as soon as the flames were out, the stoning was resumed: Mr Doherty felt he could do no more, and departed. Even the firemen were stoned. The rioters resumed their control of William Street, the police being held at Waterloo Place and in Little James Street. Barricades were constantly going up in William and Rossville Streets. Excavators from building sites were put across the streets, and in one place a plank construction studded with nails designed to puncture tyres was thrown across the roadway. The riot continued until shortly before 4 am when the crowds dispersed. In the course of the night the CI again requested permission to use gas, but this was refused by the Minister.

The shooting in Little James Street

7.23 At about 10 pm there was a shooting incident in Little James Street near its junction with William Street. A party of nine constables under the command of Sgt Flynn found themselves forced into Prince Arthur Street as rioters overran the police position in Little James Street. The sergeant intended to withdraw into William Street: but when he rounded the bend in Prince Arthur Street he was able to see that rioters already controlled its junction with William Street. Some of the crowd had followed his party as they retreated down Prince Arthur Street. Realising he was cut off, he mustered his men and attempted to make his way back to Little James Street. The hail of missiles was such that he could get no further than a cul-de-sac entry, down which his party was compelled to retreat. There being no escape, the sergeant ordered his men to draw revolvers, and himself fired one warning shot in the air. The mob, which had been advancing towards the police party, came to a halt. But it did not retreat: and stones continued to be thrown. The sergeant, therefore, ordered a volley to be fired into the air, which was done. The stone-throwing stopped: but the mob still held its ground. The sergeant ordered his men to bring their revolvers to the aiming position. The mob slowly backed up the street: on reaching Little James Street, it broke and made for William Street. As the police reached Little James Street, the sergeant fired a further warning shot and ordered them to run for cover in Sackville Street—which they did under a bombardment of missiles. Every member of this police party was hit during the episode: one was left behind, unable to move; but fortunately he was able to hide himself from the mob. The sergeant saw no rioter injured by gunfire, and heard no ricochet.

7.24 This account of the incident is substantially that given to the Tribunal by Sgt Flynn in evidence. He expressed the opinion that he had no alternative but to order the drawing of revolvers and the firing of warning shots. He emphasised that each time before there was firing he shouted to the crowd a warning of what he intended to do.

7.25 We now know that at about 10 pm a Mr Harkin of Claudy was struck in the leg by a bullet. It was later removed from his leg and submitted to test. Mr Price, a ballistics expert, told the Tribunal that it was a ·38 bullet which could have been fired from a Webley revolver: [illegible] as physical evidence indicating it could well have ricocheted from a hard surface. Although all the revolvers used by the police party had been submitted to test, Mr Price was not able definitely to identify any revolver as having fired the shot, though he saw some indications pointing to a link with one police revolver. "I was unable to come to any real conclusions," he said.

7.26 Mr Harkin told the Tribunal he reached the city about 9 45 pm. He was walking down William Street, and when he was crossing over Little James Street, he was shot. As he was crossing, he saw 10 or 11 policemen in Little James Street and a dozen or so civilians taking a look at a "dumper" which was lying across the middle of the road. There were not more than "two dozen people" down Little James Street and "they were just standing there." All was quiet—no stone-throwing, no petrol bombs. He did see some police come out of an entry into Little James Street, and he thought there were 10 shots fired at least. When he was being taken to hospital, he remembered seeing another man who told him he had been shot in the ankle. This man was probably Mr John McCaul who did not give evidence but who was admitted to hospital with a suspected bullet wound to the right ankle. Mr Harkin's evidence as to the general situation existing in William Street and Little James Street at about 10 pm is so much at variance with the general picture that emerges from other evidence that the Tribunal must reject it. But it is clear that Mr Harkin was wounded in the leg by gunfire, and the Tribunal is satisfied that he was struck by a bullet fired by one of Sgt Flynn's party of police. Almost certainly it was a ricochet. It is not possible to say whether it resulted from a warning shot fired into the air or one fired into the crowd. In cross-examination Sgt Flynn was asked whether he could be sure that all the shots fired by his party were directly up in the air.

His answer was:

"This is something in circumstances like these that one can never be sure."

We find that Sgt Flynn, whose account of the incident we accept, was justified in the action he took. The evidence does not support a finding adverse to any of the police involved in the episode.

7.27 There is no evidence on this night of any sectarian conflict. Though here and there in the city some watchful Protestant groups showed themselves—so much so that the police were a little anxious at times lest there might be trouble in Bishop Street, near Butcher's Gate, in Shipquay Street and Guildhall Square —nothing developed.

7.28 Moreover there is positive evidence that until the news, no doubt in garbled form, spread of the police shooting in Little James Street, members of the Catholic community were appalled by the behaviour of the crowds, ready to lend the police a hand when they felt they could, and dissociating themselves from what was going on. The actions of Mr Paul Grace and the DCAC stewards, of Fr Mulvey, of Mr J Doherty, of Senator Wilton and Brother O'Sullivan speak as plainly as any words.

7.29 And at 5 pm the DCAC resorted to words, issuing a press statement which condemned the rioters and praised the police for their "commendable restraint". But after the news of the shooting there was a change. In the early hours of 14 [illegible] e DCAC issued a second press statement condemning the use of firearms by the police: and Miss Devlin said in evidence that the incident—perhaps more strictly the version, whatever it was, that circulated in the Bogside—contributed to the fears of the people in August.

7.30 On the night of the 14th the trouble in the city altered in character and location. It became sectarian and it moved to Bishop Street where the Long Tower faces the Fountain. During the severe rioting in William Street on the nights of the 12th and 13th Bishop Street had seen all the indications of tension between the communities of the Fountain and the Bogside: but good stewarding had prevented any but the most minor disturbances.

7.31 During the afternoon of the 14th the police were getting reports of activity—or rather a sort of restlessness—in the two areas. At 9 28 pm Br O'Sullivan reported difficulty he and others were having in controlling a crowd that was assembling in Long Tower Street. By midnight tension was high—crowds barely held in the Fountain, in Long Tower and Henrietta Street, and at the Letterkenny end of Bishop Street. The numbers were formidable—over 500 Bogsiders near the Old Gaol and several hundred Protestants in the Fountain area. There was an exchange of missiles, including petrol bombs, and by 1 21 am a serious fire was seen in the Old Gaol. The more dangerous of the opposing crowds was that from the Bogside: it was they who set the gaol on fire, and if it had not been for the strenuous efforts of the DCAC stewards a major riot involving serious injuries and damage to property would have developed. Shortly after 2 am the Bogsiders were threatening to fire a heavy lorry stranded in Bishop Street. Though this was prevented, their stewards felt obliged to report shortly before 2 30 am that they could no longer control their crowd. The police then moved into the area, executed a baton-charge down Long Tower Street, and succeeded in dispersing the rioters. During this baton-charge Mr Aidan McKinney, a DCAC steward, suffered some personal injuries, not of a very serious nature. When the Tribunal was taking evidence in Londonderry, Mr McKinney had a malicious injury claim pending: we therefore decided not to investigate the matter at that stage. We are glad to record that justice has been done, Mr McKinney being awarded on 3 March 1970 agreed damages of £310. The matter did not in the context of our inquiry seem to us to merit re-opening thereafter.

7.32 Nevertheless, the incident, or the interpretation put by Bogsiders upon it, further exacerbated relations between police and the Bogside. Mr Green, for instance, was ready to praise the police for their conduct in Londonderry until he heard of the incident—when "it just seemed that they were lapsing into their old ways again".

Nature of the July riots

7.33 We agree with the submission made on behalf of the RUC that the Londonderry disturbances in July were of a wholly different character from the riots in August. Miss Devlin in evidence said there was a difference in attitudes between July and August. In July, she said, the people of the Bogside were angry, not frightened: in August they were frightened rather than angry.

This is one way of admitting that in J[illegible]en the police were stretched, having their hands full throughout the prov[illegible]e, the youth of the Bogside went, almost casually, on the offensive. In the absence of provocative action by Protestants (other than two very minor incidents on the 12th) or police, no other conclusion is possible. We accept that the DCAC and its stewards led by Mr Paul Grace did their best to stop the rioting: indeed, the DCAC by their first press statement showed that they were not afraid to condemn violence and to praise the police. Yet these disturbances did offer evidence of impending catastrophe: for they revealed the inability of the police, even when helped by stewards and supported by the Action Committee's policy against violence, to prevent riot in the city. The July riots were a warning of the dangers to be expected on 12 August. The civil rights movement, as Mr McCann put it, had put people on to the streets and then left them there.

7.34 It is clear that as the riot developed the desperately extended police force threw stones at the mob—"returning fire" as they would describe it. CI Corbett and DI Armstrong found this conduct "abhorrent but nevertheless essential". Fr Mulvey, a fair-minded man, condemned it: others, more prejudiced than he, must have been driven by it to an even greater bitterness and hostility towards the police than they already felt. Such tactical respite as police stone-throwing may have achieved was heavily outweighted by the hostility it provoked.

7.35 Yet the dilemma of the police must in fairness be stated. By throwing missiles and then running away, the rioters could keep themselves out of harm's way, frustrate police action and inflict casualties, so long as the police denied themselves the use of missiles. Reluctant to shoot and forbidden to use CS gas, the police picked up stones and threw them back in an attempt to disperse the mobs. In so doing they fell below the standards required of a disciplined force, and descended to the level of the rioters opposed to them; but their provocation was severe, their difficulties great, and they lacked effective means with which to defend themselves or to disperse the riot.

7.36 Responsibility for the July riots rests fairly and squarely upon hooligan elements in the Bogside. They began and then developed the disturbances. The most that can be said against the police is that in some of their counter-measures they stepped beyond the shadowy line that distinguishes what is justifiable conduct in suppressing a riot from what is not.

7.37 The USC were not involved and played no part.

7.38 During the July disturbances the first battalion the Prince of Wales' Own Regiment was moved from its base at Ballykinlar and placed on standby at Magilligan. This was a precautionary measure; at no time was the deployment of the military contemplated.

CHAPTER 8—DUNGIVEN: JUNE AND JULY

8.1 The Tribunal's task was to inquire into events in Dungiven in July and August 1969. But Dungiven has a history which makes it necessary to consider these events in a larger perspective, and in 1969 trouble began before July.

The backgr[illegible]

8.2 Dungiven is an ancient village in Co Londonderry.* It stands on one of the main routes between Londonderry and Belfast. Some areas of the surrounding countryside are inhabited by Catholics and some by Protestants. The Tribunal was told that many people from Gortnaghey, a Catholic area, had moved into Dungiven when housing development started there, and that by 1969 Dungiven's population was about 1,400 of whom only about ten per cent were Protestants. On the other hand the Boveva/Burnfoot area was inhabited by Protestants. The tendency was for Catholics to use Dungiven as a shopping centre whereas Protestants went to Limavady, a town of 5,000 about ten miles to the north. The small Protestant population of Dungiven was, however, well represented among the town's traders.

8.3 The area had attracted notoriety during the period between 1953 and 1962 because of tensions associated with the Boveva band, and its leader Mr William Douglas. The Tribunal heard evidence that Mr Douglas had made a series of efforts to obtain the right to parade in Dungiven, in the face of hostility from the inhabitants. As from June 1960 it was arranged that an Orange drumhead service should be held on the outskirts of Dungiven; the Boveva band paraded through Dungiven to this service playing hymn tunes. In 1961 a Dungiven Orange Lodge was formed. According to Mr Douglas this resulted from about 14 members of the Orange Order applying "basically on their own" to have permission to form a Lodge. The drumhead services attracted large numbers of Orangemen from other areas, and were normally held on the second Sunday in June. There were local objections which led to changes of date in 1961 and 1962, but after that the service became accepted as customary. In 1968 an Orange Hall was opened in Dungiven's main street. By this time the Lodge had about 75 members, of whom about 20 came from Dungiven itself: the Master was Mr W J McFarlane, whose farm is on the outskirts of Dungiven.

8.4 The hall was broken into in October 1968. Some damage was done and the Lodge's banner was stolen. By custom the Lodge had therefore to unfurl a new banner. In 1969 the Lodge's programme of marches and ceremonies was a full one: it included the customary drumhead service on 8 June, the unfurling of the new banner on 28 June, and a "walk" on 12 July. This was the very stuff of provocation to Dungiven Catholics in the inflamed conditions of 1969.

8 June—Drumhead service

8.5 A meeting in Limavady on 26 March had revealed the underlying tension. Called by "civil righters", it was broken up by Protestants. The police were alive to the dangers and, when they learnt on 5 June that two Gaelic football matches had been arranged in Dungiven for the afternoon of the 8th, they opened discussions with the two sides. On the 5th there was a conversation between HC Irwin and Mr Ivan Cooper† in the course of which the Tribunal is satisfied that the MP told the policeman that a Republican element in Dungiven had met to organise opposition to the Orange parade and that some people had been told to bring arms with them. Police took the warning seriously and attempted to persuade the Orangemen to alter their route: but they had no success.

8.6 The parade to the service took place as planned. There was no trouble save for a few stones thrown from the Gaelic field. But, after it was all over, a police constable was assaulted at a street corner by a number of young men, some of whom were later prosecuted.

28 June—The unfurling ceremony

8.7 The next incident arose from the procession connected with unfurling the new banner on 28 June. The route of the walk was to be the same as on the 8th. A general meeting of Dungiven citizens was convened, at which the first seven speakers stated that in their opinion the march should be stopped. But Mr Robinson of Dungiven Republican Club, Fr Doherty* and Mr Cooper argued that the Orange Order should be entitled to hold their demonstration. The meeting decided to form a Dungiven Action Committee, and a majority of the committee went along with a proposal from the floor that their protest against the demonstration should be non-violent and passive.

8.8 A number of steps were taken to make the protest effective. Members of the People's Democracy made themselves responsible for preparing and putting up banners and posters. These expressed such slogans as "You can march†. Can others". "We believe in civil rights. Do you". Mr Kevin Boyle prepared a leaflet which was circulated in Dungiven by members of People's Democracy. The leaflet advocated peaceful protest, although the terms it used were somewhat ambivalent. It noted that "There can be many legitimate objections to the Orange Order" but suggested that "At this time we feel the most effective way of making a protest is in a non-violent fashion". It was also arranged to provide some buses to take people to a Civil Rights meeting at Strabane.

8.9 Meantime the Dungiven Citizens Action Committee organised the closure of businesses in Dungiven on 28 June. An initial meeting voted against closure by 17 votes to 16. However at a second meeting that decision was reversed. Mr Cooper and Mr Boyle denied that threats of violence were required to achieve general closure but they agreed that pressure was put on individuals. Fr Doherty said that in the event nearly all the grocery and confectionery businesses closed but that two or three public houses did not. The businesses opened again in the evening, the 28th being a Saturday.

8.10 The Orangemen duly held their ceremony on the 28th, and most Dungiven residents made their protest by keeping off the streets, some of them going to Strabane. About 2,000 people, including 30 or 40 bands, took part in the procession, which was uneventful save for one minor incident at the beginning. S[illegible]angemen (not Mr Douglas or Mr McFarlane) wanted the banners removed before the procession passed. As each of the banners was taken down there was tremendous cheering, and Fr Doherty, for one, was afraid that there might be trouble from the Dungiven residents. But there was not. Later, people were ready to criticise the police for not intervening either to prevent the banners being taken down or to prosecute those concerned. But the policy of restraint paid off: there was no trouble.

8.11 There was more trouble in Dungiven on 12 July. Members of Dungiven Lodge assembled at the Orange Hall, and at about 9 15 am moved off down Main Street, led by the Boveva band. A group of 15 or 20 people emerged from O'Neill's entry and sat down in the road in front of the procession. Then a hostile car drove towards the band, but turned back and eventually double parked. Its driver joined the group who were sitting down. The procession stopped.

8.12 There were about 110 police in Dungiven. DI Harrison told the demonstrators that "If you wish to make a protest you have now protested and the procession has been stopped" and he asked them to get up and leave the road. Some of the protesters apparently said that this was not a traditional march and "why can't they get into the bus at the Orange Hall and drive away from the Orange Hall rather than parade through the town". There was now an impasse, which the police had to resolve. The sitters down had refused to move and DI Harrison was told that the procession was about to continue. He therefore ordered the sitters down to be removed. This was done, in his judgment, with very little violence, although Sgt Mills drew his baton and a certain amount of struggling was involved. The sitters down claimed that they had been roughly treated, but the evidence is not convincing. Some people were eventually prosecuted for their part in the affair.

8.13 After the Orangemen had moved off, there was tension in Dungiven. A couple of Orange supporters were attacked in Main Street. By 11 am most of the police had gone to Limavady, where an Orange demonstration was being held. Windows of the Orange Hall were now broken and at some point during the day its flag was pulled down. Plans were made in Dungiven to stop the Orangemen from holding a march to the Hall on the return journey.

8.14 News that the Hall had been attacked reached the Orangemen at Limavady at lunchtime. The extent of the damage was exaggerated. There were at least 6,000 Orangemen at the demonstration and there were suggestions that they should take action themselves in Dungiven. Mr Douglas and Mr McFarlane gave evidence that they advised against such a course, and in fact nearly all the Dungiven Orangemen debussed some way from the Hall when they returned in the late afternoon.

8.15 During the evening there was an outbreak of sectarian violence which could have been much more serious than in the event it was. Some time after 9 pm groups of people started to attack the Orange Hall. The police, and the local Catholic priests, went to the scene. The priests told the police that the attackers would leave if the police did. At this stage there was a crowd of 300.

There were now only about 50 police in Dungiven because men had had to be switched to Londonderry. The police accordingly withdrew. Fr Doherty described how for the next few hours there were sporadic attacks on the Hall. He himself was called back on various occasions, and was several times involved in putting out fires. Twice his group tried to call the fire brigade, but were told that the brigade dare not come. The street cleared at about 2 am, and as a result of Fr Doherty's efforts the Orange Hall was still standing.

8.16 Meantime a large group of Orangemen had gathered at McFarlane's farm. By the late evening there may have been about 400 people there. The police heard rumours that they were to be joined by Orangemen from a distance, and made efforts to prevent this happening. Mr McFarlane and Mr Douglas went to the police station and said "they had a problem with a lot of Orangemen who wanted to protect the Hall". The police asked them to use their influence to keep these people out of Dungiven. Mr Douglas and Mr McFarlane successfully did so. But for the efforts of the local Catholic clergy, the Orange leaders and the police there would almost certainly have been a violent sectarian conflict.

Night of the 13/14 July

8.17 Tension persisted on the following day. DI Harrison told his County Inspector that the Orange Hall needed protection, and that the Orangemen were prepared to protect it themselves. Initially he was told that police protection to the Hall could not be provided, but at about 9 pm he was told to put a party into the Hall for its protection.

8.18 This change of policy, on a day when there was serious rioting in Londonderry, was the result of a meeting that afternoon in Belfast between local Orange leaders and the Minister of Home Affairs. The Orange representatives told him that they felt the police had not done enough to protect the Hall, and that they were afraid that, if no action was taken by the authorities, "then action could very well and was very likely to be taken by a section of the community and this would make for a lot more trouble."

8.19 Accordingly almost all the police in Dungiven, under the command of Head Constable Irwin, were sent to the Hall at about 10 pm. Arrangements were made for police reinforcements from other towns, but these had not yet arrived. The police at the Hall had crash helmets but no other riot equipment, although they brought fire extinguishers. It was a Sunday evening and Dungiven was crowded with people who were attending the regular dance at the Castle ballroom. The police saw a crowd gathering on the Maghera side of the Orange Hall at about 10 25 pm. Stoning started at about 10 45 pm. Into this situation arrived two police tenders bringing reinforcements. They drove down Main Street from the Maghera direction and reached the Hall just after 11 pm. The tenders were attacked, and the men inside rushed into the Orange Hall. Because of a crowd further down the street the drivers did not attempt, as originally intended, to drive the tenders to the police station. The total police party at the Hall had now risen to about 50.

The Death of McCloskey

8.20 The police now launched a baton charge to clear the street. There was no time for detailed instructions, but Head Constable Irwin led a dozen men about 30 or 40 yards up the street. The crowd turned and ran but he was then "rather shocked" to see that there were about 200 people in that direction and brought his group back to the Hall. Sgt McLaughlin gave evidence that he was the second policeman to leave the Orange Hall and was immediately behind Head Constable Irwin. He led a party of six police round a tender parked in front of the Hall and then downwards across the street towards Hasson's shop. The crowd stampeded down the street and into an entry. Sgt McLaughlin then saw a man lying on the footpath just below Hasson's shop. He was lying on his back with his head facing towards the entry. At that stage the police had made contact with no member of the crowd and he was in front of the other police. Sgt McLaughlin then saw two young women approaching the man and he asked them what had happened. One of them said "They knocked him down" and nodded towards the crowd who were running down the street. The man was not unconscious, but there was foam round his mouth. He was muttering unintelligibly and the girls were trying to swing him round to get his head in the direction of Hasson's doorway. A few feet away from the man on the ground there was a struggle in Hasson's doorway between a policeman and a man called McCracken who was later arrested and prosecuted. The man on the pavement was Mr Francis McCloskey and he died on the next day. It was not until then that Sgt McLaughlin realised that he had been seriously injured.

8.21 Police evidence was also given by Sgt Walker. He had been ordered to remain at the Hall and his evidence was to the effect that there was a crowd of 40 or 50 youths on the road above the Orange Hall, and rather more in the other direction. There was also a large crowd of onlookers. The police emerged at a run from the Hall, but then moved up and down the street in a sort of shuffle. The crowd moved away quickly at first but stopped within 50 yards on the Maghera side and not far beyond Hasson's shop on the other. It was before the police arrived at Hasson's shop that he first saw a man lying on the ground. He thought the crowd at first over-estimated the number of police present, and then forced the police back to the station by throwing stones. It was his evidence that the police never made physical contact with the crowd but he could not positively swear that this did not happen. He also testified that, in addition to the civilian, he saw policemen as well on the ground. It is interesting that in Sgt Walker's opinion it was the presence of police which attracted a crowd to the Orange Hall that evening.

8.22 The death of Mr McCloskey became a cause celebre in Northern Ireland. It was widely alleged that he had been batoned by police and that he was an inoffensive, elderly man who had been a victim of police brutality. His death occurred in the same week as that of Samuel Devenny, who was widely believed to have been the victim of a brutal police assault in Londonderry in April. It therefore had its place in the development of Catholic attitudes towards the police.

8.23 The Tribunal received a great deal of evidence dealing with the death of Mr McCloskey. Unfortunately, the evidence was no longer fresh (taken, as it was, nearly two years after the ev[illegible] and recollections had not been improved by such innocent, though confusing events as the taking of statements by Mr Ivan Cooper and the proceedings at the inquest. For example, one witness, who had told Mr Cooper that "two or three policemen knocked the old man down with several blows of their batons", said in evidence to the Tribunal

> "I had seen two or three policemen at the time. There was one I remember flinging his baton but I don't know whether it hit McCloskey or not. I didn't really see them—the policemen—hit him. It isn't true".

Such is the confusion of the evidence that it is not possible to make any precise finding as to how he died.

8.24 Certain facts are, however, clear. He fell down near Hasson's shop entrance at a time when police with batons drawn were chasing a crowd which had been stoning policemen. He died from a blow on the back of the head which could have been caused by a baton or equally due to his head striking the ground. He was not a rioter, but a bystander. It is no part of the Tribunal's duty to cover confusion with conjecture: and no finding as to the cause of the injury is therefore made. The indications in the evidence are against the inference of excessive use of force: and no criticism to that effect is made of the police. The evidence of the pathologist supports the view that Mr McCloskey was unlucky to die: his initial concussion was unlikely to have been fatal, but unfortunately the fracture crossed an artery and tore it.

The fire at the Orange Hall

8.25 After the police made their charges and returned to the Orange Hall the crowd attacked the tenders and eventually set them on fire. The situation at the Hall deteriorated. Petrol bombs were thrown and later burning tyres were thrown at the Hall. At about 12 30 am the police left the back of the Hall because the smoke had become so intense and returned to the RUC station by an indirect route. Twenty-two of the 48 policemen in the Hall had sustained injuries. The Hall itself remained standing.

The shooting near the Castle ballroom

8.26 Another feature of the evening was the activity of the USC. It had apparently been decided at the meeting with the Minister in Belfast that the USC should be used in Dungiven but that they were to be armed with truncheons only. It so happened that Mr McFarlane was the District Commandant of the USC. At about 10 30, when the truncheons arrived, District Inspector Harrison instructed the 50 USC so made available to assemble either at the USC hut, Limavady Road, or at the lecture hall in New Street. A radio set was also sent. This message was carried by Sgt Mills. Regrettably the USC left the radio set at Mr McFarlane's farm and went not to the Limavady Road or New Street but to the Church of Ireland Hall, Maghera Road, which is opposite the Castle ballroom. At this time a dance was in progress attended by about 1,400 people, almost all Catholics. As people left the dance, tension built up between the USC and some of the crowd. The USC sent for arms contrary to the Minister's rulings. When these arrived, there were three rifles, two pistols and one Sterling SMG. About 12 45 am the USC fired a number of warning shots. No one was injured, and the crowd broke up and cleared away.

8.27 Mean[illegible]District Inspector Harrison had been unable to get in touch by radio w[illegible]he USC. He arranged for the radio to be sent to them where they were, but the USC Sergeant Instructor eventually arrived at the police station saying he had been unable to locate them. Once the District Inspector learnt they were at the Church of Ireland Hall he told the Sergeant Instructor to go there. He did not do so because the shots were heard. There was a further report of shots at 1 15 am. Shortly after this the crowd began to disperse rather quickly. At about 3 am the Sergeant Instructor brought the USC party by way of a field to the RUC station. The party, which included as many as 7 SDCs out of about 50 USC altogether, was asked by DI Harrison whether they could cast light on the firing they had heard. They said they could not. SDC Hunter, who gave evidence to the Tribunal, agreed that this silence was against regulations and unjustified.

8.28 In addition to the shooting by USC near the Castle ballroom, there was evidence of some desultory shots elsewhere during the night, eg two shots were fired in the air by HC McGowan when he left the Orange Hall during the baton-charges. In addition there were allegations of firing by uniformed men from a car near New Street. As the evidence is vague and no injury was caused, the Tribunal makes no findings about it.

The 14/15 July

8.29 On the 14th the Orangemen said they proposed to secure the Hall that evening. DI Harrison opposed this move but Mr McFarlane insisted. It appears that in doing so he was acting in accord with the views of Fr Doherty who thought evidence of restoration or maintenance would be helpful in redeeming the situation in Dungiven. The police had about 80 men on duty, and the Catholic clergy, with various others, did their best to disperse a crowd which had assembled. Though tension was high, the night passed without major disturbance. When the Orangemen arrived some were wearing white armbands. HC Irwin ensured that these were removed. At about 10 30 pm news came that Mr McCloskey was dead. HC Irwin and Fr Doherty did what they could to prevent the news from getting about. At about 12 45 HC Irwin saw a Mr King with a sub-machine gun entering the Orange Hall. The weapon was loaded but not cocked. The police at once disarmed him and the incident had no consequences. His explanation was later accepted, and there was no prosecution.*

8.30 On 15 July Mr McCloskey's body was brought back to Dungiven. The Orangemen had abandoned their intention to complete the boarding up of the Hall that evening. The police were reinforced and a party of USC, armed with batons, were also available. There was a move by some Republicans to carry the coffin through the village, but the parish priest said this was against the wishes of the relatives and the coffin was carried in a hearse. There was no disturbance either then or at the very large funeral next day.

CHAPTER 9—BELFAST: EARLY AUGUST

9.1 The next phase of the disturbances occurred during the week-end 2/5 August. These riots were distinctive because they were mainly the activity of Protestants. They started near Unity Flats and then precipitated a further bout of Catholic rioting in the Ardoyne. There were times during this week-end when the police believed that they had lost control in Belfast. This period foreshadowed the final breakdown of law and order in mid-August.

The Junior Orange procession and Unity Flats

9.2 On 2 August 1969 Junior Orange demonstrations were held in Bangor and Carrickfergus. The Junior Orange Lodge of No 1 District was to parade from West Belfast Orange Hall down the Shankill Road and make its way to York Road station to board the train for Carrickfergus.

9.3 Shortly after mid-day crowds began to build up on either side of Peters Hill, while groups of residents congregated in the forecourt of Unity Flats and on the public balconies. Jeers and catcalls were exchanged between the people on Peters Hill and the residents of the flats. The size of the crowd in Peters Hill was increased when a large body of people led by a band came down the Shankill Road. The band turned off at Townsend Street, but the crowd moved on towards the flats. It was in a hostile mood and stones were soon thrown at the flats' windows, one of which was broken. As the crowd was building up, the police arrived and took up position at the Peters Hill entrance to the flats, on the public balconies and outside the wall which separates the forecourt from Peters Hill. The police attempted with some success to move the residents inside the building, a course of action which, though appearing to the police a sensible precaution, irritated the residents who, rightly, saw themselves as in no way responsible for what was developing.

9.4 By the time the parade had arrived the crowd of spectators and supporters had grown into a much larger crowd than a Junior Orange procession would normally attract. While its size may to some extent be accounted for by parental concern for the safety of the children, in the light of the injury to a member of the parade on 12 July, this is not the whole truth. Evidence was given by Mr J McKeague that many members of Shankill Defence Association who had children taking part in the procession expressed concern that it was likely to be attacked. The Association decided that its male members numbering about 200–300 would walk down Shankill Road with the procession. When the parade had reached Northumberland Street Mr McKeague heard that missiles had been thrown from the flats at Protestants who had gathered on the opposite side of the road to see the procession pass. He and his followers then took up position between Unity Flats and the carriageway in Peters Hill "so that the young people could pass without any more interference".

9.5 All the police officers, and a number of other witnesses, who gave evidence agreed that there was no disorder or throwing of missiles while the parade was passing the flats. Two witnesses did, however, give evidence to the contrary and one of them alleged that a boy in the procession was struck by a missile. We find that they were mistaken, but it is probable that they and others did believe what they alleged and that this belief helped to embitter Protestant feeling in the afternoon and evening.

9.6 Shortly after the procession had passed the flats an angry crowd of about 200 Protestants, one of whom was carrying a Union Jack, entered Upper Library Street from Peters Hill and attempted to gain access to the flats from the Upper Library Street vehicle entrance. Stones were thrown by this crowd at the windows of the flats, and at residents of the flats within the courtyard, who returned them. Some of the Protestants managed to get into the courtyard and fighting broke out between them and the residents. Mr McKeague was present in Upper Library Street during the incident. Evidence was given that he pointed out to the police a youth within the flats who was then set upon by Mr McKeague's supporters and ultimately arrested by the police.

9.7 Two criticisms have been made of the behaviour of the police in Upper Library Street: first, that they made insufficient attempts to prevent the stoning and the attack on the flats by the Protestant crowd, and, secondly, that one or more police officers threw stones at the flats.

9.8 At the time of the incursion into Upper Library Street it appears that there were six police constables under Sgt Johnston at the vehicle entrance to the flats. There were no other policemen between Sgt Johnston's party and the junction of Upper Library Street and Peters Hill, where there were another 5 or 6 police. These two parties of police did their best to keep apart an aggressive Protestant crowd of some 200 and an equally determined group of residents within the flats. But as so often, there were not enough policemen for the job they had to do.

9.9 The second criticism arises from an allegation made by a Mrs Austin who owned two shops in the block of flats which faces Upper Library Street. She gave evidence that a number of policemen, one of whom later identified himself as Constable Rainey, threw stones in the direction of the flats. After a full consideration of the evidence we have come to the conclusion that Constable Rainey did not throw stones. Mrs Austin was mistaken: but, had the police been present in sufficient numbers to suppress Protestant stone throwing, it is likely that the accusation would never have been made.

9.10 After the incident in Upper Library Street the crowd on Peters Hill began to disperse.

The afternoon of 2 August at Unity Flats

9.11 Mr McKeague gave evidence that after the parade had passed he called a meeting in Lime Street at which he told his followers to leave the area but to return between 6 and 7 pm in order to provide protection for the returning Junior Orangemen.

9.12 Once the streets had been cleared a conference of senior police officers was called by the Deputy Commissioner for Belfast, Mr S Bradley. At this meeting it was decided to have the 46 policemen who had been on duty in the morning back into position in the Peters Hill area by 4 30 pm instead of 6 30. Mr Bradley also arranged for DI Gilchrist to bring a party of the Reserve Force to the flats at 6 30 pm. In all, the Deputy Commissioner expected to have between 70 and 80 men at his disposal when the parade returned in the evening.

9.13 The police officers at this meeting considered a suggestion that the returning parade should be re-routed so as to avoid passing the flats. But a decision was taken not to re-route, on the grounds that it was a traditional parade, interference with which would alarm the parents of the children concerned and would provoke serious opposition from them. Furthermore it was felt that a new route would mean the creation of additional flashpoints which the Deputy Commissioner would have difficulty in manning with the limited number of policemen at his disposal. This decision was essentially one for the exercise of professional judgment by senior policemen present; and, notwithstanding the criticism levelled against it in argument before the Tribunal, we think it was justified. At 4 30 pm the police were in place at each of the entrances to the flats and on the public balconies. Shortly afterwards a large, hostile crowd came down towards the flats from the Shankill Road. A police cordon was thrown across the road at Gardiner Street. The rumour was rife among the advancing crowd that the children had been attacked on their way to the station in the morning and it was said that this news had been broadcast on the radio. Mr Bradley, relying on information given to him by DI Montgomery, assured the crowd that there was no truth in the rumour. But they were not to be placated and as their numbers swelled Mr Bradley formed the opinion that such was the mood of the crowd that had they got into the flats "there could have been murder". Already stones were being thrown and windows broken on the Peters Hill side of the flats.

9.14 The Tribunal investigated with care the source of the rumour, widespread among the crowd in Peters Hill on the afternoon of 2 August, that the Junior Orange procession was attacked as it passed the flats earlier in the day. Although two witnesses were quite adamant that they heard an item on the 12 55 pm local BBC radio news which led them to believe that stones had been thrown at the children, the evidence which the Tribunal has received from the BBC is that no news relating to disturbances in Belfast was included in the 12 55 pm summary. The earliest reference by the BBC to the events at Unity Flats was in the News Summary broadcast on Radios 1 and 2 at 3 30 pm The relevant extract from this broadcast is as follows:—

> "In Belfast, two people were arrested after an incident in which bottles and stones were thrown. The trouble started when a crowd gathered to see a procession of Junior Orangemen pass through a predominantly Roman Catholic area. A large force of police moved in to restore order".

It is quite conceivable that the casual listener to this broadcast could have concluded that stones and bottles had been thrown at the Junior Orange procession, although this is not expressly stated. The same is perhaps true, but to a far lesser extent, of the lengthier reports which appeared in all editions of the Belfast Telegraph on 2 August. In none of those editions is the procession said to have been attacked.

9.15 The earliest reference on UTV to the trouble at Peters Hill on 2 August was in a news flash at 8 51 pm.

9.16 Whatever its origin, the rumour affected the size and temper of the crowd which had gathered at Peters Hill: and Mr Bradley decided to bring forward the arrival of DI Gilchrist's party of Reserve Force men. This party of about 40 men arrived between 4 30 and 5 00 pm. Their vehicles were placed across the mouth of Upper Library Street to prevent access from Peters Hill. By this time the crowd stretched from Royal Avenue to Shankill Road. DI Gilchrist estimated its size as between 2,000 and 3,000—the biggest crowd that he had ever seen in that area. The crowd spilled out on to the carriageway and although the police attempted to keep traffic in Peters Hill moving, eventually this became impossible.

9.17 At 6 18 pm the police were called to licensed premises at the corner of Boyd Street and Peters Hill. A crowd which had overflowed from these premises was singing Protestant party songs and behaving in a disorderly fashion. At the request of the proprietor the police closed the premises and the crowd outside began to throw stones at the windows of the building. The crowd then turned its attention towards the flats, charging as far as the Peters Hill entrance where they were stopped by the police who forced them back on to the footpath and took up position inside the low wall which surrounds the forecourt of the flats. Having been frustrated in their intention to get at the flats the mob proceeded to hurl stones and other missiles at the flats in a continuous barrage, breaking most of the windows which faced Peters Hill. Sections of the crowd tried to penetrate the line of police vehicles and personnel which was blocking the entrance to Upper Library Street, on one occasion breaking through this line and making a rush towards the entrance to the flats. Another portion of the crowd detached itself from the main body and moved down North Street and broke windows there.

9.18 While all this activity was taking place at the front of the flats in Peters Hill, trouble had broken out in the courtyards, within the flats. Earlier on, at about 5 pm, two parties of police had taken up position at the two side entrances to the flats. One party under Sgt Johnston was on duty, as it had been in the earlier part of the day, at the Upper Library Street entrance and the other under Sgt McLean was on duty at the entrance on the west side of the flats which connected the open space leading from the Old Lodge Road with the outer courtyard of the flats by means of a passage beneath the upper floor of the flats.

9.19 Sgt McLean and the six constables in his party had been instructed to take up this position when the parade was passing the flats in the morning but in fact they had remained on Peters Hill as the Sergeant apparently thought there was a greater need for him to control the crowds there. At 5 pm Sgt McLean took up the position allocated to him, with instructions to prevent people from entering or leaving the flats. According to the Sergeant, he placed some of his men inside the courtyard and other at the outside entrance facing the car park. A Land Rover with the late Constable Arbuckle* at the wheel was parked in the outer courtyard.

*Constable Arbuckle was shot dead while on duty during disturbances in the Shankill Road on 11 October 1969.

9.20 When Sgt McLean had taken up position he noticed small groups of people, some of whom were residents, standing around in the courtyard. He recognised Mr P Burns who was a resident in the flats and Mr J Sullivan who was not. Mr Sullivan (who did not give evidence) was seen to be writing something on a newspaper; Sgt McLean inferred that he was noting the disposition of the police.

9.21 Mr Sullivan, who was later to became known as a leading member of the Central Citizens Defence Committee, was not the only stranger in Unity Flats this afternoon. Mrs Bradley, a resident, who (like the great majority of her neighbours) drew the mistaken but understandable inference from the presence of the police within the courtyard of the flats and their inability to suppress or disperse the crowds outside that the police were spear-heading a Protestant assault on the flats, told the Tribunal how a number of young men (40-50 of them) came from outside to help defend the flats. She thought that a message had gone out for help, and that they arrived "after teatime".

9.22 After the night's rioting had ended the police responded to a request for safe conduct out of the flats of a party of some 20 or so "strangers", who were seen to depart down Upper Library Street The Tribunal finds as a fact that a substantial number of non-residents took part in the riots on the side of the residents.

9.23 For the first 1½ hours the police met with no hostility, but their presence inside the courtyard caused resentment: for instance one man asked them what they were doing and told them to get out. At about 6.45 pm Sgt McLean, according to his own evidence, heard a commotion from within the inner courtyard. Some youths then appeared from that direction shouting that they were being stoned. Sgt McLean and two of his constables followed the youths back into the inner courtyard but finding no signs of any disturbance there they quickly returned to their original position, where they and the remainder of their party found themselves under attack from a number of men (about 50) who had appeared in the courtyard—almost certainly from the rear of the Tavern Bar. Missiles were thrown down on to the police from the balconies of the flats.

9.24 Seeing this attack, Sgt Johnston and his party of six constables, who were stationed at the vehicle entrance to the flats in Upper Library Street, rushed to the aid of Sgt McLean's party. As he did so, the Protestant crowd, or some of them, attempted to enter the flats area but were with difficulty restrained by a few policemen.

9.25 As police and civilians grappled with one another, Sgt Johnston noticed a man about to strike Sgt McLean with a large piece of wood. This man, Mr E O'Rourke, turned and struck Sgt Johnston who in turn knocked him to the ground with a blow from his baton. O'Rourke* was then dragged struggling along the ground, which was littered with broken glass, and placed in Sgt McLean's Land Rover which had been driven from the outer courtyard into Upper Library Street after the fighting had started. Miss O'Rourke, who had come down from her flat when she saw her brother fighting with the police, was arrested when she kicked a policeman. She, too, was placed in the Land Rover in Upper Library Street.

*O'Rourke was later convicted on two charges of assault and one of disorderly behaviour and sentenced to 6 months on each charge. He was released on bail pending his appeal but did not answer his bail. The sentences were affirmed.

9.26 We have no difficulty in accepting the police account of the episode up to this point. Furthermore we think there were present in the flats complex some men (including, in all probability, the "strangers") who were determined to embroil the police in a fight. The ruse of enticing the police into the inner courtyard was successful.

The Corry incident

9.27 Once the melee developed, it is not easy to discover exactly what happened. In the course of it an elderly man, Mr P Corry, was struck by a police baton, suffering a fractured skull as a result of which he subsequently died in hospital. As one would expect, radically differing accounts of this tragedy have been given in evidence to the Tribunal. Two residents (one, Mr Corry's niece, and the other, a neighbour) say they saw what happened. While the details of their versions of the incident differ, they both associate the baton blow (or blows) with an altercation over the arrest by the police of a teenage student, Sean Scott, whose family lived in the flats. They say that Mr Corry apparently tried to intercede on the boy's behalf and was struck down by a policeman though he had offered no provocation of any sort. Both gave graphic, though differing, descriptions of police behaviour, either of which, if true, would mean that one or more policemen were guilty of murder.

9.28 The police account is very different. Mr Corry, described as elderly and heavily built (he was, in fact, 61, and was found, on death, which occurred some months later on, to be "of average slim build, weighing about 8½ stones and measuring 5 ft 2 in in height"), was seen running towards a policeman who was struggling with a prisoner. Constable Sampson saw his right arm extended and in his hand a knife, which he was about to plunge into the back of the policeman. The constable aimed a baton blow at his shoulder, which, because of a sudden move by Mr Corry, struck him on the head. He fell to the ground unconscious. If this account be correct, Constable Sampson did no more than his duty.

9.29 Another witness to the events in the outer courtyard was Mr F Gogarty the NICRA chairman. He had arrived at the flats about 6 pm when he found a crowd of about 200 Protestants and a party of police at Upper Library Street/Peters Hill. He spoke to a police officer whom he thought was a District Inspector but who was almost certainly HC Wallace. During the conversation he was informed that there was fighting in the flats. Entering the courtyard he saw about 18 policemen fighting with about 6 civilians. There were other civilians standing around and about 30 on the balconies throwing bottles and stones. He saw about three or four policemen struggling with an elderly man who was covered in blood. He was being struck about the head and shoulders by police batons and dragged across the courtyard. During this time missiles were raining down into the courtyard. None of the missiles struck the elderly man, who was Patrick Corry, but Mr Gogarty was struck on the head.

9.30 The post-mortem revealed 3 skull fractures sustained by Mr Corry, involving 5 separate areas of brain damage. The injuries could have been inflicted by a police baton. The skull was abnormally thin. In the pathologist's opinion,

"if the injuries were caused by a baton, they would not necessarily have required more than moderate force".

Finally a knife, stained with blood, was picked up from near or under Mr Corry where he fell: and on his arrival at hospital a male nurse found a leather sheath tied to his right leg. The blood on the knife was of Mr Corry's blood group: and those who knew him testified that it was his habit to carry in a sheath tied to his leg, a knife, which it was said he used in his work.

9.31 We accept that there was an incident involving a man (probably Sean Scott) in custody, some policemen and Mr Corry. But the confusions and inconsistencies of the various versions of the incident given to the Tribunal make it impossible to determine exactly what happened. For instance, we think it unlikely that, as one witness would have us believe, Mr Corry was struck down by a policeman while he was peacefully protesting about an arrest: but we would need more evidence than we have to be sure that Mr Corry attempted to stab a policeman. We are, however, clear that there was an incident in the course of which a policeman, believing Mr Corry to be attempting to interfere forcibly with an arrest, struck him a blow (or blows) on the head with a baton. It is not possible to determine whether excessive force was used. The pathologist's report does not indicate that it was: and it must be remembered that the police were in a very rough situation arising from an unprovoked attack upon them by the men who by a trick had embroiled them in a fight with some of the residents in the flats. Nevertheless the Tribunal is satisfied that Mr Corry died from injuries inflicted by a policeman striking him on the head with a baton.

9.32 After he had fallen unconscious to the ground, two policemen dragged him, bleeding from the mouth, to the waiting Land Rover: as they did so, they were subjected to a hail of missiles, but, while some hit Mr Corry, none struck his head.

9.33 The Land Rover, with the two O'Rourkes, Sean Scott and Mr Corry on board, went to Tennent Street police station, arriving at 6 50 pm. Mr Corry was not admitted to hospital until 7 50 pm. In the events following Mr Corry's collapse to the ground the police are, in our view, to be criticised. Difficult as were their circumstances, they should have realised Mr Corry was seriously injured and refrained from dragging him over the debris-strewn ground. And it was inexcusable that the Land Rover did not go at once to hospital: also the delay in getting him to hospital from the police station was a serious matter. Nevertheless, none of these matters played any part in bringing about his death—which arose solely from the injuries to his skull.

9.34 Following the initial struggle within the flats which ended with the removal of Mr Corry and Mr O'Rourke, there was a number of skirmishes between the police in Upper Library Street and civilians in the outer courtyard. This was a fluid situation in which forays were made from the courtyard by the civilians throwing stones and bottles at the police, who, in their turn, mounted a number of baton charges into the flats. During a number of these charges, some members of the crowd in Peters Hill, who had broken through the police cordon at the mouth of Upper Library Street, attempted to follow the police into the courtyard, but were turned back.

9.35 At 7 15 pm a party of 16 members of the Reserve Force under DI McGimpsey, equipped with riot shields and helmets, entered the outer courtyard from Upper Library Street in pursuance of an order from the Deputy Commissioner to stop stones being thrown from the balconies which overlooked Peters Hill. The youths and men who were in the courtyard retreated and stone-throwing there ceased. The police climbed the stairs leading to the balconies and two policemen were posted on each. As the remainder of the police party returned to the courtyard (7 40 pm) they were attacked with missiles by a crowd of residents which had gathered there. By the time the police had reached Upper Library Street, DI McGimpsey had sustained injuries to the head and leg and the police had made one arrest.

9.36 When DI McGimpsey was leading his party into the flats he was totally unaware of the earlier police/resident confrontation in the outer courtyard which had led to the removal of Mr Corry.

The procession returns

9.37 Some time after 7 pm the Junior Orangemen arrived at York Road Station from their demonstration at Carrickfergus. They were met at the station by a Head Constable who had been asked by a senior officer to put to the organisers the suggestion that as there had been trouble at Peters Hill the parade might be diverted along Donegall Street and Clifton Street.* The suggestion was duly put but was not accepted.

9.38 From York Road the returning processionists made their way towards Peters Hill, accompanied by a party of police. They reached Peters Hill† at 8 15 pm. The road was blocked by a vast crowd and traffic was at a standstill. All of the windows at the front of the Unity Flats had been broken and stones were being thrown at the flats. As the young people approached, they were greeted by cheering from the waiting crowd and the stone-throwing eased off, although according to two witnesses some stones were thrown by the crowd while the parade was passing the flats. It is agreed by all witnesses, however, that no violence was directed at the parade.

Protestant riot of the evening of 2 August

9.39 After the children had passed the flats a large part of the crowd in Peters Hill dispersed. Many of these were parents and friends who, having seen the young processionists safely past the flats, followed the parade up the

*This suggestion probably came from the Commissioner, Mr Wolseley, since Mr Bradley, his Deputy, who was in charge of the police operation, had already rejected the idea of a diversion.

†The evidence as to the time of arrival of the procession at Peters Hill is conflicting: we prefer that of Mr Martin Wallace, since he gives 8.15 in a contemporaneous note on which he based his report in the 9 p.m. news on Telefis Eireann.

Shankill Road. However, this still left ...000 people in Peters Hill who showed no readiness to leave. Among this ...owd were a number of rowdy, aggressive youths, some of whom had been drinking. Indeed, a senior police officer described the crowd, which remained at Peters Hill after the parents had departed, as consisting of "hooligans, agitators and criminals".

9.40 A number of local Unionist Councillors exhorted the crowd to disperse, but without effect. The crowd was hostile both towards the people in the flats and towards the police, who were seen to be protecting them. According to Mr McKeague it was rumoured among the crowd that a tricolour had been displayed and that the police had been attacked and one of them killed. The people were enraged "and a full-scale attack was made then on Unity Walk Flats". Attempts were made to penetrate the strong police cordon which sealed off Upper Library Street. The police had some success in forcing the crowd over on to the Millfield side of Peters Hill but stones were still being thrown by individual members of the crowd who were able to run across in front of the flats. A small number of arrests were made but the police were so heavily outnumbered that they concentrated their efforts on trying to keep the crowd away from the flats.

9.41 One section of the crowd tore down a wire fence which surrounded a piece of waste ground at the junction of Old Lodge Road and Peters Hill. Had it been successful this move would have allowed access to the relatively unprotected Old Lodge Road side of the flats. However, the police prevented the attack by launching a baton-charge which drove the crowd off the waste ground as far as Brown Square. A number of arrests were made. Mr McKeague testified that the "viciousness" of this (or perhaps a subsequent) baton-charge came as a surprise to the Protestants. The police had not taken violent action of this nature earlier because they wanted to ensure that the young people were clear of the area and because they had insufficient numbers until reinforcements arrived.

9.42 From Brown Square the crowd was pushed further up the Shankill Road as far as Boundary Street. Periodically the stone-throwing crowd moved down as far as Townsend Street and each time this happened they were forced back by a police baton-charge. This pattern of charge and counter-charge continued until about midnight.

9.43 A large number of windows in Peters Hill was broken and there was some looting. Police officers recognised among the crowd on Peters Hill a number of well-known trouble-makers from the Shankill Road but it is clear that there had also been an influx of youths from other areas. While one force of police was attempting to hold a line at Townsend Street, other policemen at Upper Library Street had to cope with stone-throwing from the area of the flats and with Protestants who were trying to get into Upper Library Street.

9.44 At 11 30 pm the police again decided to clear the balconies of the flats. On entering the outer courtyard from Upper Library Street they were confronted by about 50 youths who drove them out with stones and bottles. The entry into the flats by policemen dressed in riot gear, without any apparent necessity and a... when the flats had been under attack by a Protestant crowd, was open to misunderstanding by the residents of the flats, whose only crime at this stage was the throwing of stones at their attackers. It was not until 3 am on the morning of Sunday, 3 August, that the situation in Peters Hill had quietened down and the police were able to withdraw.

The Unity Flats Association

9.45 During the period when the flats were besieged by the Protestant crowd a number of residents formed the Unity Flats Association. At a later stage the Association became affiliated to the Central Citizens Defence Committee. The Tribunal heard evidence from two residents (Mr Largey and Mr Burns) who were members of the Association. Neither appears to have seen the start of the fighting in the courtyard of the flats but both believed that the police attacked the residents. They also felt that the police had not taken sufficient measures to control the Protestant crowd on Peters Hill. Indeed at one point in the evening Mr Largey believed that this crowd was still in front of the flats and it was not until he was taken up Shankill Road in a police vehicle that he realised that the Protestants had been moved on by the police.

3 August—Further Protestant riots

9.46 On the afternoon of Sunday, 3 August, a crowd of 400–500 again gathered on Peters Hill opposite the flats, on the roof of which were about 20 young men. The two groups were gesticulating at one another. The police spoke to Mr Burns who lives in the flats and he succeeded in clearing the roof of the flats. The crowd outside then moved up Peters Hill but on reaching the waste ground at Lower California Street they turned and charged towards the west side of the flats. Stones were thrown and some of the attackers engaged in a fight with residents of the flats and their supporters. The two groups eventually parted, the Protestants retiring to the waste ground from where they hurled stones and bottles at the police. An armoured car was summoned and the crowd was dispersed. But by 4 30 pm they had regrouped and at that time 300–400 men marched down the Shankill Road, led by a man carrying a Union Jack. Some were armed with pickshafts and missiles and they demanded that the police get off the road. The District Inspector in charge was in no doubt that the crowd was again bent on attacking the residents of Unity Flats. The police managed to drive the crowd back but its numbers were rapidly increasing and on the next advance petrol bombs were thrown at the police.

9.47 From then on the situation quickly deteriorated: a barricade was erected, shop windows were broken and property was looted. An armoured car was used to breach the barricade and as this operation was taking place there was a loud explosion, probably caused by gelignite, sticks of which were found later in the evening.

9.48 Just before 6 pm the Deputy Commissioner, Mr S Bradley, arrived in Shankill Road and assumed command of a force of police which now numbered about 200. He found a crowd of 300 to 400 people in Shankill Road which came down and attacked the police position at Townsend Street. Barricades were erected, motor vehicles set on fire and the police were subjected to a hail of bricks and stones. Mr Bradley thought that the viciousness of these attacks on the police was connected with the police baton-charge the night before. A barrier-breaking vehicle, a water-cannon and Land Rovers were used in an attempt to disperse the crowd which responded with stones, petrol bombs and one or two sticks of gelignite. Mr Bradley led at least four baton charges against the crowd before the situation returned to normality at about 1 am.

9.49 The situation in the Shankill Road area was so serious that during the afternoon discussion took place between senior police officers and members of the Government about the possible deployment of the military. A company of soldiers was in fact brought in to Castlereagh police station in Belfast but they were not deployed on the ground.*

Carlisle Circus—2/3 August

9.50 On the afternoon of 2 August as No 1 District Junior Orange Lodge had paraded down the Shankill Road and Peters Hill, the Junior Lodge of No 4 District was assembling at Carlisle Circus. In all there were some 1,200 people in the parade, predominantly children but accompanied by about 100 adults. The parade passed peacefully through the city and reached County Down Railway Station where they boarded trains for Bangor, County Down.

9.51 After spending the day in Bangor the party returned to Belfast arriving at 7 15 pm. The march back to Carlisle Circus went off without incident until the parade reached the junction of North Queen Street and Donegall Street. At this point they were shouted at by about 20-30 youths from the direction of Frederick Street. Stones were thrown but they did not reach the procession.

9.52 Some of the adults in the parade did break ranks but the bulk of the marchers continued in an orderly fashion. One group of men who had joined the procession at North Street ran over to where the police had formed a cordon in North Queen Street in an attempt to get at the stone throwers. These men were members of the Shankill Defence Association and they were acting without the knowledge of the organisers of the procession.

9.53 The parade arrived at its dispersal point just before 8 pm. As the parade was preparing for dispersal at Denmark Street and the Lodges at the tail end were reaching Carlisle Circus, stones were thrown from some unoccupied houses in Frederick Street. Some stones landed among the children in the parade and it may be that a boy was injured.

9.54 On the following day, Sunday 3rd, Junior Orange Women's District No 3 had arranged to parade from Carlisle Circus to St Paul's Church in York Street. During this journey there was one minor scuffle at the junction of Clifton Street and Upper Library Street. On the advice of HC Kyle the return route was altered to avoid this junction. It was also found necessary for the parade to disperse in Fairview Street instead of Denmark Street in which about 30-40 youths armed with hurley sticks had gathered. These youths were dispersed by members of the Shankill Defence Association at the request of one of the organisers of the procession.

The aftermath

9.55 From Monday 4th onwards, members of the USC were deployed on the Shankill Road. Their duty (for which, until the 14 August, they were equipped with batons but not firearms) was to prevent looting and the gathering of crowds. It appears from the evidence of the Inspector-General that the RUC were not deployed on the Road but held in the background. One reason for this was because of local hostility. Another and compelling reason was, as DI Montgomery said, a shortage of RUC manpower.

9.56 On 2 August, 34 policemen and on 3 August, 36 policemen were injured in the Shankill Road area. The total number of arrests made in this area between 6 pm on Saturday 2nd and midnight on Sunday 3rd was 110. As a result of the disturbances 20 Protestant families moved out of Unity Flats. By February 1970 only two Protestant families remained in the flats.

General

9.57 The riots of the 2nd and 3rd August were begun and continued by Protestant crowds. They led to loss of life and serious damage to property. They were directed initially against Unity Flats but soon developed into a conflict with the police. They provide evidence not only of the risk to the peace of the province from Protestant violence but also of the determination of the police to protect Catholic lives and property. Although unable to prevent external damage such as the breaking of windows, and on occasions embroiled (once with tragic results) with the residents of Unity Flats, the police did successfully protect the residents from invasion by Protestant mobs.

Crumlin Road and Ardoyne

9.58 Disturbances at Unity Flats had begun on 2 August, and had then spread to Shankill Road. Crumlin Road is not far from Shankill Road, and felt the impact of these events.

The riots, 2/5 August

9.59 The first violence occurred during the evening of 2 August. A report reached Tennent Street Police Station that a crowd was moving up the Crumlin Road from the Unity Flats area. A small group of police went to the area of Disraeli Street/Hooker Street. After dark they heard a crowd approaching. It was chanting "we are the people" and "let's wreck the fucking pope heads". It had no identifiable leaders but two people in front carried the Union Jack. Sergeant Owens who was in charge of the police expected an attack would be made on Hooker Street and radioed for help. Meantime his tiny force of 6 policemen walked steadily, with batons drawn, towards the crowd, which numbered about 150. The police party was received with a sudden volley of stones, bottles and sticks: but, as they closed on them, the crowd quickly dispersed back down the Crumlin Road and into the side streets on the south. The resolute conduct of Sergeant Owens and his party undoubtedly stopped this crowd from provoking a sectarian conflict farther up the street.

9.60 Later the crowd reformed in Ohio [illegible] and moved up Disraeli Street, with the intention of crossing Crumlin Road, but by this time, though the crowd was much larger, police reinforcements had arrived. There were 25 police at the south side of Disraeli Street. They reasoned with the crowd and sought, eventually with success, to push it back. In the course of the encounter the crowd aimed some missiles at the Edenderry Inn and the Rosebank public houses, doing some damage to the Rosebank.

9.61 By now, however, a crowd had gathered on the opposite side of Crumlin Road. A barricade was being built across Hooker Street, level with the entrance to Chatham Street. Hooker Street was in darkness, when several people came in front of the barricade and threw petrol bombs and other missiles at the police. It was about 11 30 pm and the police, led by an armoured vehicle, followed by Land Rovers, made baton-charges into Hooker Street. The charges dispersed the crowd, and the police remained on duty in Hooker Street all the night, which from then on was quiet. Ordinary traffic, which the riot had stopped, returned to the Crumlin Road.

9.62 On the next day, Sunday 3 August, trouble developed in Hooker Street at about 10 pm. There was no barricade visible from the Crumlin Road, but petrol bombs were thrown from Hooker Street at police on duty in the road. The police, who were present in some strength (they were about 50 and included the City Commissioner and DI Montgomery), decided to enter Hooker Street in an attempt to disperse the rioters. They went in, preceded by an armoured car equipped with a barrier-breaking device. At the bottom of Hooker Street, where it joins Butler Street, they found a barricade across the roadway; and on a piece of adjoining land a shallow trench had been dug. The rioters, throwing petrol bombs at the advancing police, retreated towards these obstacles, which the police had difficulty in penetrating. Thereafter the police drove the rioters up the hill towards the "stumps"—a footpassage into the adjoining Brompton Park area. The police got some vehicles via Flax Street into Brompton Park: and that was the end of the riot for the night.

9.63 During this riot the police and their vehicles (an armoured car and 4 land rovers) were under constant petrol bomb attacks. These weapons, as well as the barricades and trench, must have been prepared beforehand, and give an indication of the attitudes and state of mind to be found by now in the Ardoyne. On the other side of the Crumlin Road there was no significant movement: clergymen, stewards and police were able to control the people though sectarian feeling was running high. In the course of the night two men were hit by buck-shot in Herbert Street. The source of the shots was never established. But sporadic firing in the Crumlin Road was not unknown to the police. DI Montgomery had received reports of something resembling heavy air-gun fire at foot police and a police vehicle on 27 and 31 July respectively: but responsibility was never established.

9.64 Serious violence erupted again on the following night, 4 August. Its beginnings were observed by Mr Entwistle, a journalist. He arrived at about 9 pm on the Crumlin Road near Disraeli Street where he saw a large number of policemen (perhaps 50 or 60). The Crumlin Road, now denied to traffic, was full of [illegible] litter and debris of riot. The street lights were on—unlike the Hooker Street side where most of the lights were out. He watched the lights being deliberately put out by people in the streets. He remarked that at this stage there was very little activity on the Disraeli Street side of the road. He could see barricades and a fire "way down at the bottom of Hooker Street", but activity appeared to him to be confined to small groups who came up the street and attacked the police. They attacked with stones and petrol bombs, one of which hit a policeman and set his clothes on fire. He saw the police accompanied by vehicles—two armoured cars and a number of land rovers—make a couple of sorties down Hooker Street and Herbert Street. As the police managed to subdue the Catholic side, he saw Protestant numbers building up. Soon there was a large crowd of about 400 in Disraeli Street, whom the police had great difficulty in restraining. This crowd was in an ugly mood—marching down the street, beating a drum, chanting, singing and with flags flying. But for the presence of the police, they would, he thought, "have marched straight across to the other side of the road". The police drove them back, going in with batons. The crowd then dispersed, but in Bray Street a group of them attacked a house from which he saw a woman being led away in tears. After some 10 minutes and a request by him to a senior policeman, a party of police arrived and dispersed the wreckers and intimidators.

9.65 Police action in the area on this night was effective. It restrained and dispersed the Protestants: it broke up and dispersed the Catholics. But in the course of their movements inside the Hooker Street area an accident occurred, which not only resulted in serious physical injury to a young man but contributed further to the worsening of relations between the police and the people of the Ardoyne. It was a road accident: but it was interpreted by local people at worst as a deliberate running down and at best as yet one more example of police recklessness and callousness.

9.66 It was not a deliberate running down. Whether in law it was negligent driving is not for the Tribunal to assess: but, if it was, it arose from an error of judgment in difficult circumstances.

9.67 The circumstances were these. The police were using their vehicles tactically: driving towards the crowds, on occasion mounting the pavements in an endeavour to frighten and disperse. During some such manoeuvre young Neil Somers was knocked down by a police vehicle. Almost certainly the driver never saw him: it is not even certain which vehicle was responsible. The work was, of course, dangerous: but so was the situation of the police and the activities of the crowd around them. Nevertheless it would have been a very serious offence if the police or any of them had either deliberately run him down or recklessly endangered him. The evidence supports neither conclusion.

9.68 Unfortunately, the tactic was such as to lend colour to the interpretation that the police were ready to use their vehicles recklessly and aggressively against Catholics: and there had been at least one previous incident in July (when a Land Rover overturned in Herbert Street) to lend plausibility to this interpretation of police attitudes. The Tribunal, while acquitting the individual policemen concerned of deliberate or reckless crime, wishes to record its view that the tactic was unwise and certain, soon or later, to cause tragedy which would, as this incident did, do serious harm to relations between the public and the police. It is only fair, however, to record that this is the only instance known to the Tribunal in which the tactic led to serious personal injury.

9.69 The weekend's rioting came to an end on Tuesday, 5 August. Police were present and eventually succeeded in dispersing a large crowd in Disraeli Street, after a warning that force would be used if necessary. Several Protestant clergy helped in persuading civilians to go home. It is likely that a good proportion of the crowd did not live in the immediate area, and that they were mainly young people, incensed by the police baton charge in Disraeli Street on the previous night and spoiling for an attack on the north side of Crumlin Road.

Intimidation, 2–5 August

9.70 Violence that weekend was worse than it had been before. Intimidation was also on a much larger scale and must have contributed to the tension in the area. What happened varied from street to street. But between 2 and 5 August the Protestants left Hooker Street, and the Catholics left streets on the other side of Crumlin Road.

9.71 The movement began on 2 August. On 3 August most Protestants left Hooker Street and the Catholics left Chief Street, Cambrai Street and Leopold Street. The process continued in both directions on 4 August. By 5 August, out of 12 Church of Ireland families originally living in Hooker Street only one family was left, and it lived in a corner grocery shop. Broadly speaking, the two communities had now completed their physical segregation from each other.

9.72 Intimidation was an essential part of this process. Sometimes this was overt; crowds attacked houses and people left their homes in fear. At other times it was a matter of people being advised to leave for their own safety, sometimes by extremists on their own or the other side. Or there might be threatening anonymous letters. It would be impracticable to make distinctions between the degrees of intimidation practised by members of the two communities. Equally there is no doubt that many neighbours of the victims were appalled at what was happening, but were helpless in the situation which prevailed.

9.73 The Tribunal heard abundant evidence to satisfy it that authority, from the Prime Minister down to the policemen on the streets, was alive to the problem and deeply concerned. Public figures issued statements deploring and condemning intimidation: senior policemen, such as DI Montgomery, energetically organised measures designed to search it out and destroy it. But the sectarian disease that was infecting society was too deep-seated to respond to a Prime Minister's appeal or to police action. The two communities, sometimes from choice, sometimes under compulsion, but always in conditions of wretchedness and misery, fell apart into their respective "ghettos", where at least they had a sensation of security.*

*Intimidation is further discussed in Part XII, Chapter 31, section 4.

CHAPTER 10—LONDONDERRY: 15 JULY–10 AUGUST

10.1 After the July riots the City, though restless and tense, managed to achieve a degree of uneasy calm which ended with 12 August. In this atmosphere a decision had to be taken for or against the Apprentice Boys march on the 12th.

The problem of 12 August

10.2 The disturbances which have troubled Northern Ireland since the summer of 1969 are certainly related to the violence which began in Londonderry on 12 August—although it would not be safe to imply a direct causal relationship, nor indeed is it within the Tribunal's terms of reference to examine that relationship. Nevertheless, since it has been contended that the disturbances of August 1969 can be traced directly to the failure of the Government of Northern Ireland to impose a ban on the Apprentice Boys' procession on the 12th, the continuing implications of that contention require that an examination should be made of the evidence relating to the decision not to ban the procession.

10.3 The Minister of Home Affairs, Mr Porter, had power to ban the procession. Under section 2(2) of the Public Order Act (Northern Ireland) 1951 the power was exercisable if he had come to the conclusion that the powers of the RUC to direct a rerouting of the parade were insufficient to prevent serious disorder. Should he have banned it? The question concerns the Tribunal only if the facts are such that it can be said that, by refusing to ban it, the Minister acted unreasonably. But, should it be established that a neglect of duty by the Minister caused or contributed to the disturbances into which we are directed to inquire, the Tribunal must say so.

10.4 By mid-July 1969 the overall situation in Northern Ireland had apparently improved, although there had been disturbances in Dungiven in June and fairly constant, though minor, confrontations between the RUC and a disruptive element in the Hooker Street area of the Ardoyne district of Belfast. But the July riots in Londonderry presented some disturbing features. They demonstrated that the police then available were unable either to prevent rioting or to end it, once it had started. Their patrolling of the Bogside had been slight and occasional for many months: after the July riots it was almost non-existent. Mr Hume's comment to the Tribunal was fully justified:—

> "The point I am basically making is that from 12 July the police themselves were publicly admitting that they were not policing a particular area,* which was a public admission that law and order had broken down in a particular area".

10.5 When the July riots died away, the ability to maintain public order in the city had slipped out of police control: peace depended not upon the will of lawfully constituted authority, but upon the whim of the youngsters of the Bogside. In Mr Hume's opinion, the situation in the city was out of control and trouble was inevitable on 12 August. With the benefit of hindsight, we agree. We would refer to two further comments which were made to us in evidence. Mr Sean Keenan said of the Bogside:—

> "It did not matter who was to come into the Bogside, be it police, B Specials or Apprentice Boys, Paisleyites, or whoever, we would defend ourselves against anybody coming in to attack us".

And Mr Canavan commented that trouble could have started from "maybe an innocent action of the police" or "from somebody throwing a stone from the Civil Rights side": it was "the kind of situation where serious trouble could have started up from inconsequential events". But was the future to be so clearly foreseen after the July riots when the authorities had to decide how to handle the problem of 12 August?

10.6 The problem was not easy. The Apprentice Boys march was a traditional occasion celebrating a historical event of great importance to a great number of people. It attracted visitors from all parts of the United Kingdom and, indeed, elsewhere. About 15,000 were expected to parade this year. To ban it or, by dint of persuasion, to force a cancellation would cause widespread and deeply felt resentment, and could well trigger off a Protestant riot. Nevertheless the July riots put the authorities, both police and Government, on notice that control of the street situation in Londonderry was very tentative and that disturbances leading to serious injury to persons and severe damage to property could readily result from loss of, or even from a determined challenge, to that control.

10.7 There were, of course, political problems. A decision to ban would be interpreted by many Government supporters as weakness in the face of Catholic pressure. If the Government was to fall, there was the probability that the programme of political reform already initiated would collapse: and the Province would be faced with bitter and fundamental division without the hope offered by the existence of a reform programme. Nevertheless, whatever the political pressures which weighed upon the Government at that time, a clear onus of responsibility lay upon the authorities to avoid a recurrence on 12 August of the July disturbances. In the event, that onus was not discharged and the Government of Northern Ireland did not succeed in its paramount duty of maintaining peace in the Province.

10.8 However, the matter cannot be left in those simple terms. Was it possible in practice to impose a ban on the parade? Given the information which the Minister of Home Affairs had at that time, did he act reasonably? These are the two questions which must be answered before we would be prepared to criticise those who took what proved in the event to be a decision fraught with tragic consequences: and the answers can be given only after an examination of the course of events from mid-July to mid-August.

The course of events—July

10.9 The first significant event was the funeral of Mr Devenny on 19 July, when some 30,000 people appeared on the streets to mourn his death and made their silent protest at what they believed to be the "police brutality" which killed him. There was the formation of the Derry Citizens Defence Association on the 20th. There then followed a series of meetings which included amongst others: a representative meeting of all sections of the community attended by members of the Londonderry Development Commission at the Broomhill Hotel on the 21st; formative meetings of the DCDA which led to its existence becoming publicly known on the 27th, and an announcement of a series of public meetings in the period prior to 12 August; a meeting between Mr John Hume, MP (NI), and Lord Stonham at the Home Office; a meeting between the Minister of Home Affairs and a representative body of business men from the City, at which he was told that "a hooligan element had started the trouble in July". On 31 July the Minister learnt that the Apprentice Boys had arranged for a very large number of marshals for the parade and that arrangements had been made for a rapid departure from the city centre of those taking part in the parade.

10.10 At the end of July it must have seemed clear to the Minister that responsible citizens, regardless of their political or religious affiliations, were ready and willing to do all in their power to help keep the peace, if the parade was to take place. But apprehension was also expressed—notably by Mr Hume. These apprehensions were largely of Protestant violence. Little weight appears to have been given to the risk of a Catholic outburst or to the lessons to be learnt from the July disturbances. And it may well be that the full significance of the formation and plans of the DCDA was not understood at the time.

Derry Citizens Defence Association

10.11 This body came to supersede the DCAC which was by now in disarray, being unable to agree on what to do if there was an attack on the Bogside or on what, if any, stewarding arrangements to make for 12 August. The DCDA suffered from no such infirmity of purpose. Its objects were said to be first "peace" and, failing peace, the "defence" of the Bogside. Mr Keenan was to be its chairman: seven out of eight of its original Committee were members of the James Connolly Republican Club, although later the Committee was progressively broadened until in mid-August it was forty strong.

10.12 The DCDA formed street committees, each under a chairman. It organised public meetings: five were held in various parts of the Bogside-Creggan area. It organised a Peace Corps and put in charge Mr Len Green —an Englishman who had married a Londonderry girl and settled in the city. It organised first aid: with the help of the Order of Malta, posts were to be established at Bishop Street, West End Hall, and Candy Corner. Barricades, designed to keep unwanted strangers out of the Bogside, were planned and their locations determined. The use of firearms was ruled out: but preparations to defend themselves with "sticks, stones and the good old petrol bomb" (Mr Keenan's words at a public meeting on 4 August) were undoubtedly put in hand.

10.13 In August a strident note crept into their public utterances. One witness described as aggressive the speeches made on 4 August at the Stardust Ballroom—the occasion when Mr Keenan referred to the "good old petrol bomb". On 10 August, at a meeting at Ce[illegible]Park, Mr E McAteer, in the course of an emotional speech, declared that:

> "if this is, indeed, our hour of trial at hand, if we are to be beaten into the ground in this city as a helpless minority, then I pray to God that our watching brethren* will not stand aside any longer".

Clearly these preparations and this language—whatever the purpose—must have greatly increased tension. If further evidence were needed, it is convincingly provided by the fact that a dairy delivering milk in bottles to the centre of the city got back very few empties on 10 August, and none on the 11th. Of course, none came back on the 12th.

10.14 In our judgment, whereas the emphasis of the DCAC had been to maintain peace, the planning of the DCDA was substantially directed to "defence". As Mr Canavan said in evidence:—

> "It was absolutely essential in my opinion that preparations be made for defence . . . there was a very real danger in my opinion that, for whatever reason trouble would start, it would inevitably finish up in the Bogside".

It is possible that at the end of July the police did not appreciate either the extent to which the DCDA had superseded the DCAC or what it really meant by "defence". By "defence" the DCDA, in fact, meant a fight to keep all comers (including the police) out of the Bogside. Their thinking was that sooner or later there would be disturbances which, as had happened before, notably in January, April and July, would end up in the Bogside: that in all probability this would happen on the 12th (e.g. the fear that "Major Bunting would troop his colour in the Bogside"): and that, when it did happen, the Bogside would fight. The leaders did nothing to dissuade their followers (amongst them, the youths of the Bogside) from the view that the police were a partisan force opposed to them.

August prior to the 12th

10.15 During August the situation throughout the Province markedly deteriorated. The Belfast riots of the 2nd and 3rd revealed the risk of Protestant eruption. By now the Government was becoming very apprehensive—and conveyed its anxieties to the organisers of the parade, who were not, however, prepared to cancel it, unless there was a specific request—which they say they did not receive. While these assurances were forthcoming from the Protestants, the other side of the picture was increasingly dark. The provocative speech of Mr Keenan on 4 August and the increasing knowledge of the activities of the DCDA were causing a degree of apprehension among the police. On 9 August DI Armstrong sought a meeting with Mr Keenan. He wanted to know what preparation, if any, had been made, by the provision of stewards or otherwise, to help keep the peace in the Bogside on the 12th. He did not learn because Mr Keenan would not meet him. And so events moved inexorably to the tragedy of the 12th.

Responsibility for the refusal to ban

10.16 The Minister was never persuaded of the necessity of a ban. He was satisfied by the marshalling arrangements and an agreed change of route, *ie the people of the Republic of Ireland that the parade itself would be properly controlled, as indeed it ultimately was. No public figure in Londonderry, not even Mr John Hume, advised him that the parade should be banned. The Minister was also convinced of the sincere wish of the Bogside leaders to help keep the peace, and of their ability by means of stewards to do so. In this he was mistaken: whatever the intentions of the DCDA, who were by the end of July the de facto leaders of the Bogside, they never did make effective arrangements for stewards. Furthermore, it must be remembered that he also had to take account of the view, which the police held, that a ban might well give Protestant extremists the opportunity to organise sectarian trouble.

10.17 As August progressed, it became increasingly difficult to impose a ban without incurring the risk of a violent Protestant reaction—like that against Unity Flats on the 2nd/3rd. The Protestant riots of early August in Belfast had brought the RUC to the point of calling for Army assistance, with the attendant political implications. If the Protestant extremists should get out of control on 12 August the police were not certain of their ability to deal unaided with the ensuing situation; but, on past experience, they believed they could deal with Catholic rioting and it was, in any event, the intention to have more RUC in Londonderry on 12 August than had been there during the July riots.

10.18 The Tribunal, therefore, answers the two questions put as follows. While it was possible in July for the Minister to ban the parade, the practicality of doing so became less as 12 August approached: and a ban had its own attendant risks. The Tribunal believes that the Minister did not fully appreciate either the extent to which the police had lost control of public order or the implications of the emergence of the DCDA. And the Minister was certainly mistaken in thinking the Bogside leaders had made effective stewarding arrangements. But the decision whether to ban or not was difficult and, given the information and advice proffered to him, the Minister did not act unreasonably in allowing the parade to proceed.

CHAPTER 11—LONDONDERRY—11 AND 12 AUGUST

11 August

11.1 Once it had been decided to let the Apprentice Boys' march take place the RUC concentrated very considerable numbers in Londonderry. On 12 August about 700 men—a fifth of the entire full-time strength of the police in Northern Ireland—were on duty there. On 13 August there were about 500 police on duty and on 14 August about 350.

11.2 On the night of 11 August a bonfire burned in Fountain Street—a traditional feature of the celebrations that each year mark the eve of the anniversary of the relief of the city after its famous siege. Around the bonfire stood a large crowd of Protestant people in festive mood: on the opposite side of Bishop Street at the mouth of Long Tower [illegible] a watchful Catholic crowd gathered. Inevitably some tension built up: a few stones were thrown between the two sides, and by midnight the police on the spot were sufficiently concerned to report to headquarters their anxieties. DI Hood came to take a look at the situation. He conferred with stewards and clergymen on both sides. Thereafter, he told the Tribunal, "we managed to keep the peace that night". By 3 am all had gone home to bed. The celebrations could fairly be said to have got away to a good start.

11.3 The success of the DCAC and DCDA stewards in controlling the crowd that gathered this night in Long Tower Street is to be contrasted with the notable failure in Waterloo Place on the afternoon of the 12th.

Narrative—12 August

First phase

11 am–2 30 pm

11.4 On the morning of 12 August members of the Apprentice Boys' Clubs assembled on the Mall Wall for their church parade. They went in procession to St Columb's cathedral where at mid-day a service was held. After the service the clubs again assembled and at about 1 pm the procession through the city began. As the long column, three deep, with its bands and regalia moved through the streets, it evoked a sense of pride and triumph in Protestant hearts, but a feeling of irritation and frustration in some of the Catholics. In the sultry communal climate of August 1969, its length, its noise (particularly perhaps the beat of the drums), and the unrestrained defiance of a few of its supporters (for example, the two women who danced and sang the "Sash" in Waterloo Place) must have played on the nerves of the youth of the Bogside held back from the processional route by the presence of police and crush barriers. Before the procession, a few Apprentice Boys tossed coins from the City Walls towards small knots of people below. It was a gesture of contempt which can only have inflamed feeling in the Bogside. Nevertheless the procession was disciplined and orderly: its members under the efficient control of their marshals gave no provocation. In happier times the procession might well have been a cheerful and harmless celebration. But not in 1969.

11.5 At about 1 45 pm the head of the procession reached Waterloo Place, where some 30 police, wearing normal patrol dress, had taken up position. A metal crush barrier completely sealed off the entrance of Waterloo Street and William Street into Waterloo Place. Behind the barrier stood a crowd which, while "fairly good-humoured" (in the opinion of one observer), shouted abuse from time to time at the procession and the police. The presence of the barriers contributed to an increase of tension.

11.6 At 2 30 pm a handful of nails was flung across the barrier into the midst of the police. This was followed by stones. The first missile seen by Mr Harold Jackson, who was watching events for his newspaper The Guardian, was a marble fired from a catapult by a middle-aged man. From this small beginning de[illegible]d a riot which, enveloping the city for two days and nights, was not brought [illegible]der control until the Army entered William Street at 5 pm on the 14 August.

2 30–7 pm—Waterloo Place and Little James Street

11.7 The handful of nails marked the beginning of the August riots. The first missiles were undoubtedly cast by members of the Bogside crowd. The stone-throwers, with a few exceptions, were young—teenagers or in their early twenties. Most of the early stones were directed at the police; the procession, which was making its way along the far side of Waterloo Place, was unmolested, save for verbal abuse and the occasional stone.

11.8 Almost as soon as the stoning of the police began, Mr John Hume MP (NI) appeared at the barrier and there was a conversation between him and DI Slevin. The DI asked him "to try and eliminate this sort of thing" (ie the stonethrowing and noisy abuse directed at the police); the Member of Parliament in his turn pointed towards Guildhall Square where a small (Protestant) crowd was shouting back at the Bogsiders and asked him to move it back and out of sight. The DI managed to get the Guildhall Square crowd moved on; Mr Hume, now joined by Mr McAteer and others, did his best with the Bogside crowd. But his success was only momentary. Very soon the young Bogsiders overwhelmed their stewards and set going a barrage of stones and bottles. A policeman fell unconscious, the first casualty of the riot: as he fell, there was a loud cheer from behind the barriers. At this moment the DI ordered his men to put on their riot gear—helmets and shields.

11.9 The procession cleared Waterloo Place at about 4 pm—but not before the Bogsiders had increased their range to include it as a target for their stones. To protect the marchers, a Reserve Force platoon with 5 land rovers was moved into Waterloo Place to form a screen between them and the Bogside crowd. The supporters of the Apprentice Boys now became restless; a considerable crowd of them again gathered in Guildhall Square and began throwing stones. Mr Hume, still trying to restore some sort of order his side of the barriers, asked the DI to move this crowd back: in the course of their conversation, Mr Ivan Cooper MP (NI) who was close by was struck and rendered unconscious by a brick hurled from William Street.

11.10 The DI with the assistance of Mr R Chichester-Clark MP got the Protestant crowd back and out of the way of trouble. Mr Hume and others, who were doing their best to help him, linked arms and tried to force their crowd into William Street. But they could not do it: they were overwhelmed, and Mr McAteer was seen to be staggering back under the weight of the crowd. By

4 30 the Bogside crowd was swarming up to the barriers, out of control and attacking the police fiercely with stones and bottles. DI Slevin's comment in evidence was that the situation—

"was completely chaotic. I think that was the last big attempt the stewards made. I did not notice Mr Hume or Mr McAteer after that".

11.11 From 2 30 pm until 5 pm the police had stood their ground in Waterloo Place—passively enduring a constant hail of missiles aimed at them from Waterloo Street and William Street. Though it is clear that some of the police threw some stones back, their conduct at this stage, viewed as a whole, was a remarkable display of discipline in testing conditions, and won the praise of Mr Hume. Yet the Bogside crowd became more and more violent. They attacked the crush barriers, pulling some of them away up William Street. The senior police officers, whose strategy had up to this time—5 pm—been one of static defence, feared an eruption into and beyond Waterloo Place: they therefore ordered a baton-charge. The crowd at once dispersed, some up Waterloo Street and some along William Street. In Waterloo Street the police reached High Street and Harvey Street, down each of which the rioters retreated. At the bottom of these two streets, the police were held, unable to advance against a volume of missiles, some of them hurled from the high-rise flats in Rossville Street. In William Street the police, led by an armoured car, reached its junction with Chamberlain Street—where for the first time they came under heavy petrol bomb attack. Petrol bombs were lobbed at them not only down William Street but over the rooftops from the side of Chamberlain Street. A water cannon reinforced the police: but it was not used against the rioters, being continuously employed in putting out petrol bomb fires in houses and shops.

11.12 Despite their advance, the police in William Street had now lost the power to control events. As DI Slevin remarked, theirs was now "a fight for survival"—words well illustrated by the casualties sustained by his contingent of police: for, when it returned the next day to County Down, of a total of 59 men 43 had been injured. He himself had had his right arm and leg immobilised by injury to flesh and bone, and at about 7 30 pm had been removed to Altnagelvin Hospital.

11.13 Meanwhile the riot had spread into Little James Street. Shortly before 3 00 pm a few young men moved into Little James Street, perhaps with the intention of entering Sackville Street to get within striking distance of the returning procession (Mr Jackson had heard a cry go up that the procession was not coming back the same way, ie through Waterloo Place). They began to stone the police in Sackville Street. At about 3 25 pm a petrol bomb was thrown at the police—noted by Mr Jackson as the first he saw, and, possibly, the first of these disturbances. In addition to stones, bottles, and now petrol bombs, steel reinforcing rods were hurled like spears at the police, who themselves retaliated by throwing back some of the stones flung at them. Some Protestants emerged from Great James Street and, as the police withdrew into Sackville Street, an exchange of stone-throwing developed between the two groups of young men. Shortly before 4 00 pm Mr Hume, Mr McAteer and others appeared in the Street: they succeeded in forcing the young Bogsiders back into William Street, while the police pushed the Protestants back into Great James Street. For an hour or so a stalemate prevailed: the two crowds indulged in sporadic stone throwing, while the police stood quietly in Sackville Street. By 5 00 pm a lightly constructed barricade had been established by the Bogsiders in Little James Street some 25 yards from its junction with William Street, which itself was now noisy with the riot associated with the police baton-charge already mentioned. Sgt Pendleton of the Reserve Force attacked and destroyed it with his armoured vehicle, a Humber fitted with a barrage-breaking grid. As he did so the police advanced towards William Street, where they came under missile and petrol bomb attack from a large crowd behind a barricade which had been built in Rossville Street near its junction with William Street. As the police moved forward, some civilians (from the Protestant crowd in Great James Street) accompanied them, throwing stones and using catapults. We accept Mr Jackson's evidence that some of these civilian stone-throwers were actively encouraged by individual policemen: it is also clear that some policemen were themselves throwing stones.

11.14 Shortly after 5 pm the situation was that the police were held and under heavy missile and petrol bomb attack in Harvey Street, High Street, William Street and at the mouth of Little James Street opposite Rossville Street. It is doubtful whether after their endeavours in Little James Street Mr Hume or Mr McAteer made any further attempt to stop or diminish the riot. It would appear that they moved off towards the top of William Street near the Catholic cathedral. But long before they moved away, and indeed long before any move was made by the police into William Street, at about 3 30 pm, Mr Keenan, Chairman of the DCDA, had given the order to erect barricades. The order was acted on at once, as Sgt Pendleton discovered in an extraordinary journey that he and his armoured vehicle now made through the Bogside.

11.15 After destroying the barricade in Little James Street, the Sergeant took his armoured vehicle with its crew of policemen up William Street towards St Eugene's Cathedral and the Little Diamond, where he reported to HC Fleming. As he moved up the street, his vehicle was attacked with petrol and paint bombs, and, his driver being momentarily blinded, it collided with a lamp-standard. He was ordered to demolish a barricade in the Little Diamond which was obstructing access not only to the Bogside but to a Post Office Depot. He did so, but was unable to get back through the debris. He therefore went on into the Bogside, moving through Frederick Street, Union Street, Rossville Street and so back to William Street. In each of these streets he found and demolished a barricade. His return to William Street was over the top of the Rossville Street barricade, which his vehicle ascended from the rear. Throughout the episode, his vehicle was under continuous attack, and frequently on fire as a result of petrol bombing. His journey revealed the extent to which the Bogside had before 7 pm prepared itself for physical "defence".

Third phase

7 pm—Rossville Street "Incursion"

11.16 When the police found themselves held in William Street, it became the concern of DI Hood, officer in charge of the Reserve Force, to relieve the pressure. To this end Sgt Pendleton had been ordered to break, as he did, the barricade in Little James Street. But the remaining obstacle to free movement along William Street was the strong point of the Rossville Street barricade.

11.17 The construction of this barricade had begun early in the afternoon, and was well advanced when shortly before 4 pm Miss B Devlin MP arrived in Rossville Street. She actively encouraged its building and, at one stage standing on top of it and shouting through a loudhailer, advocated a withdrawal from William Street into the area behind it. When by about 6 pm it was complete, it constituted a formidable obstacle made up, according to one police witness, of building equipment, trestles and scaffold poles interlocked with each other. Sgt Pendleton saw in it paving stones and concrete slabs. Whatever its exact composition, it was something of a fortress capable of many uses: for as well as blocking entry into Rossville Street it was a menace to police in William Street and Little James Street who were under constant attack from missiles hurled from behind it.

11.18 By 7 pm a large crowd had built up behind the barricade: and movement, even by vehicle, past it and up William Street was difficult and dangerous. DI Hood, in charge of the Reserve Force, decided that it must be destroyed. The situation and his decision were described by him in evidence—

> "We realised that if we could manage to get the barricades down in Little James Street and the one at the mouth of Rossville Street, we could perhaps push the rioters back on to the open ground in Rossville Street and contain them there. Round about before 6 o'clock, I think it was, we put an operation into force and we managed, without any great difficulty, to remove the barricade in Little James Street. That meant that vehicles could do a circular tour round Little James Street, out into William Street and up and round by Infirmary Road and back down Little James Street; in other words, they could do a loop, allowing them limited area to operate. They could also operate the other way, William Street, Little James Street, Sackville Street and Waterloo Place, but every time the vehicles came near Rossville Street they were attacked with petrol bombs, stones and paint bombs from behind the barricade at the mouth of Rossville Street. It was decided that we must try and get this one removed, the one at the mouth of Rossville Street".

He had heard of Sgt Pendleton's passage from back to front over the barricade and believed that it would be possible to remove it. "If we got the barricade removed", he said, "we could push the rioters back up Rossville Street. This was meant to be simply a limited operation".

11.19 The officer he put in charge of the operation was HC Fleming. Earlier he with some constables and vehicles had been in Upper William Street between its junction with Abbey Street and the Little Diamond. They had been under heavy attack from Abbey Street and had had difficulty in keeping some aggressive Bogsiders out of a nearby tyre depot (it and its contents sustained some damage). On the DI's orders he left a small containing force near Abbey Street and came down to Rossville Street. Sgt Pendleton's armoured vehicle now attacked the barricade, and after 6 or 7 attempts broke through. He was followed by a second armoured car, a number of Land Rovers, and perhaps as many as 100 police on foot. This force pursued the retreating

Bogsiders as far as "Foxes Corner", at that time a vaguely defined open area just beyond the high-rise flats. As the police moved in, they came under a sustained cross-fire of missiles (including some petrol bombs) hurled at them from the flats and from the maisonettes on the other side of the road.

11.20 The movement was observed by Fr Mulvey, Dr McDermott, and a journalist, Mr O'Boyle, employed by the Pottstown Mercury, a newspaper which we were told, and do not doubt, circulates in the United States of America. Mr P Doherty, Vice-Chairman of the DCDA, called Fr Mulvey over to a point in Upper William Street, where he told him in "a rather excited way" that civilians (by which he meant Protestants) were following the police into Rossville Street. Fr Mulvey looked, and saw about 100 people running from Little James Street across William Street towards Rossville Street. Fr Mulvey ran to the police party near Abbey Street and protested: he felt so strongly about it, that he said, as far as he could recollect,

> "unless something is done about them immediately I will go into the Bogside and lead the people myself".

The police officer radioed his headquarters, but Fr Mulvey, deeply disturbed, had left before he received a reply. He went down Abbey Street through Columbcille Court into Rossville Street, where he emerged some 30 yards behind the police front line. As he spoke to a senior officer, the police began a retreat back towards William Street, pursued by a crowd so large that it seemed to him to be "the whole population of the Bogside . . . certainly 1,000 people". He returned past Columbcille Court, some of the windows of which he noticed were broken, to Abbey Street where the police officer to whom he had earlier protested invited him to go down to the Victoria police station. And he went almost at once in company with Father O'Neill, the Cathedral administrator.

11.21 Dr McDermott was in Little James Street when the police broke the Rossville Street barricade: he saw a number of civilians (he estimated it at between 50 and 100) follow the police into the Bogside, and got the impression that they were not local people.

11.22 Mr O'Boyle was perched with his camera on the roof of a building at the junction of Rossville Street and William Street. We have seen two of his photographs and we are satisfied that they are authentic. One shows police and civilians moving across the debris of the barricade into the Bogside behind an armoured car. The second shows the advance seconds later and reveals a number of civilians hurling missiles towards the Columbcille Court maisonettes. These civilians had come from the Protestant crowd in Little James Street. He estimated the numbers of police and civilian followers as 100 and 200 respectively. He also witnessed the retreat, losing his perch and very nearly also his camera in the civilian stampede that preceded the return of the advancing Bogsiders.

11.23 HC Fleming, who led the police into the Bogside and then, under the pressure of heavy attack, brought them out in good order, was unaware of civilian involvement in the movement of his force. But Sgt Harris, who was on foot, saw them as the police fell back. After [illegible]king that the police were not in sufficient numbers to remain in the Bogside, he saw as he turned to go back 70 to 100 youths who must have followed the police in. They also ran back, and he saw them throwing stones.

11.24 The Tribunal has no doubt that a substantial number of men, mostly very young, and of the Protestant faction, followed the police into Rossville Street and threw stones not only at the Bogside crowd but at the maisonettes. They were not wanted or encouraged by the police: nevertheless they were not stopped, simply because the police were fully occupied with their own advance and their own protection in the face of the Bogside crowd.

11.25 The whole of this incursion into the Bogside lasted no longer than some 20 minutes. In Father Mulvey's opinion it was an event of profound significance. When asked what was its effect on the Bogside people he replied:—

> "I would say that it brushed aside any hope of moderation or any hope of restoring calm. In fact, there was a completely different attitude discernible from that at any previous disturbance that I had witnessed at close quarters. There was what I would call an apparently complete unanimity in opposition to the police force. In fact, then and later that night and over the next few days the determination was so unanimous that I would only regard it as a community in revolt rather than just a street disturbance or a riot".

He added that during the next few days he did not meet anyone counselling peace or restraint or return to their homes.

11.26 At 7 17 pm the police were ordered to withdraw to William Street. A little later Fr O'Neill and Fr Mulvey arrived at the Victoria Police Station where they saw DI McAtamney. They protested about the police throwing stones and being assisted by "Paisleyites". The DI accepted the protest in so far as it related to the "Paisleyites" but made the point that the police, who were suffering casualties, had no alternative to the throwing of stones if they were to do their duty of suppressing and dispersing the riot. The priests then asked if the police might not be withdrawn from the streets: but the DI refused, reminding them how such a manoeuvre had failed in July.

Some questions arising on the "incursion"

11.27 Why did the police decide to enter Rossville Street? The Tribunal is satisfied that it was a Reserve Force operation undertaken, as DI Hood said, to relieve pressure on William Street. CI Mahon, who knew something of the temper of the people, had his reservations as to the wisdom of the operation: but DI Hood, his mind concentrated on a tactical objective, had none.

11.28 Why did the police withdraw? The evidence is conflicting, but the Tribunal is satisfied that the Reserve Force withdrew for tactical reasons, ie because they were not strong enough to hold an extended line into the Bogside under the mounting pressure exerted upon them by the local people. This tactical situation led to a decision not unwelcome to the CI, who believed that an early withdrawal might provide an opportunity for reconciliation. It is not possible to dete[illegible]e whether Fr Mulvey's protest in Abbey Street influenced the decision: but it must have strengthened the CI's belief that withdrawal presented the best chance of peace.

11.29 What was its effect on the course of the riot? It must have hardened attitudes in the Bogside. The smashing of the barricade, the entry of the armoured cars and foot police, closely followed by Protestant civilians throwing stones, appeared to many as the physical embodiment of their worst fears. The fact that the police had in mind the limited tactical objective of relieving the pressure of rioters upon William Street, the fact that there was no concerted plan between police and Protestants—these facts, though the Tribunal is completely satisfied as to them, were not evident to the people of the Bogside. They believed they were witnessing an attack on them by the police and Protestants. The effect of it on Fr Mulvey's mind was typical: thereafter, there was "complete unanimity in opposition to the police force" by "a community in revolt".

Fourth phase

7 30 to Midnight

11.30 Parleys between police and well-intentioned priests could do no immediate good in the situation that now developed. As the police withdrew into William Street and Little James Street, they were subjected to a vicious attack of stones, bottles, iron bars and petrol bombs hurled by the advancing Bogsiders: at the same time a large and angry Protestant crowd was gathered in the Sackville Street–Little James Street–Great James Street area. The gap between the two opposed crowds grew dangerously narrow as the police were forced further back into Little James Street, near the junction of which with William Street the Bogsiders succeeded in establishing a barricade. In the rioting that now developed some of the Bogside crowd entered Brewsters bakery from the top floors of which, until they were dislodged, they hurled petrol bombs at the police in the street below. By 9 00 pm the situation was critical: in the words of HC Hood:—

> "The situation was such that the reserve force head constables were called to Victoria Station for a conference. Buildings were on fire. Thompson's Grain Store had been set on fire. From time to time part of Brewster's building was on fire. Several policemen had been hit and set alight by petrol bombs. Many had been struck by stones. The police were being reduced at a fairly heavy steady casualty rate. There was also the crowd behind the police. One was wondering perhaps if this crowd would take further action".

At the meeting of the head constables the unanimous view was expressed that it was now necessary to use CS gas.

11.31 During the next two hours the riot grew more vicious. It was already the view of two senior police officers—DI McAtamney and DI Armstrong—that it was no longer a police but a military operation. When, therefore, the Deputy IG, Mr Shillington, arrived at about 11 pm at the Victoria Police Station, he learnt that there were serious misgivings as to the ability of the police to defend themselves, let alone to control or suppress the riot. On his way from Belfast he had heard over the car-radio that the Minister for Home Affairs had authorised, if need be, the use of CS gas ("tear smoke" as it was officially called, although tears were the least of its consequences and smoke a misnomer). Upon arrival he went to Sackville Street where he saw for himself how serious the situation was. Police, he observed, had actually pulled out, exhausted, and were resting on the footpath: it was apparent to him that the police could not keep the crowds apart very much longer. He returned to the police station, spoke to the Minister on the telephone, and then instructed DI Hood first to give a loud-speaker warning and then to use the gas.*

11.32 The DI went by land rover to Little James Street. On arrival, he gave, according to his evidence, a warning through a loud-speaker not once but 3 or 4 times. No notice was taken, and the CS gas was discharged. The result was dramatic and immediate: Little James Street was cleared of rioters and police—the Bogsiders retreating into Rossville Street, the police into Sackville Street, and the Protestants into Great James Street. There was a conflict of evidence as to whether a warning was given: Mr Jackson, who was there at the time, did not hear it. We do not doubt it was given: but we are not surprised to find that in the noise of the riot many failed to hear it.

11.33 Tactically, the use of the gas was a success.† It effected a dispersal of rioters sufficient to enable the fire brigade to get in and deal with the fires raging in William Street and Little James Street. But the rioters began once more to assemble in the early hours of the 13th: they threw stones sporadically from Rossville Street towards the police in William Street and Little James Street. The police therefore fired further cartridges and dropped grenades of the gas out of vehicles in the Rossville Street area with the result that by dawn, while the riot had become sporadic and far less intense than earlier, the area had become enveloped in a pall of gas, covering the streets and penetrating the houses. The point was made several times in evidence before the Tribunal that the gas was discharged not in the direction of Great James Street, where stood the Protestant crowd, but towards the Bogsiders in Rossville Street. This is true: but it faithfully reflected the real source of danger to the police. The Bogsiders were attacking the police; the Protestants were not.

11.34 During the night there occurred two incidents, one of which is of major importance since it involved the use of firearms. Between 11 and 11 30 pm two men suffered gunshot wounds in William Street: fortunately neither man was seriously hurt. There is no evidence that either man was participating in the riot, and no evidence as to who fired the shots. Two bullets, which were removed from the injured men in the course of medical treatment, have been subjected to expert examination. They are 9 mm bullets and appear to have

*Sir R Porter, then the Minister of Home Affairs, said in evidence that he believed this was the first time CS gas was used in the UK as a riot control agent.

†It was reasonable that the police should attempt crowd dispersal with CS gas on the night of 12 August. When the riot restarted on 13 August the police position was defensive. The police then used CS gas, not so much to disperse crowds as to interpose some sort of a barrier between the Bogside rioters and the centre of Londonderry. Altogether 1,091 cartridges and 161 grenades of CS gas were used during the period 12 to 14 August. The use of CS gas on this scale had some tactical success, but it caused deep resentment in Londonderry and elsewhere, and it could not, by its nature, end the disturbance. We do not criticise the police for their use of CS gas at any stage. The medical and toxicological aspects of the use of CS gas in Londonderry were the subject of two reports by committees chaired by Sir Harold Himsworth (Cmnd 4173 and Cmnd 4775).

ricocheted. With one exception, with which we later deal, there is no evidence of any civilian, Protestant or Roman Catholic, carrying or using firearms during the Londonderry riots: and we accept that the DCDA had made known its opposition to the use of firearms. On the other hand, some police were armed with Sterling SMGs, which fire bullets of 9 mm calibre. These weapons were also on issue to USC personnel. There can be no doubt of the fact of gunfire: indeed, Fr Deane, a priest of St Eugene's, heard 5 shots. But the evidence is too scant to permit any finding as to who fired or in what circumstances.

11.35 The other incident occurred at 11 15 pm. A men's hostel situated in Barrack Street, managed by the Methodist Church but occupied largely by Roman Catholics, was set on fire by petrol bombs. The damage was considerable but the hostel was not destroyed. The incident is a reminder that, while the main course of the riot was centred in William Street, there was tension throughout the city and incidents of violence were occurring here and there devoid of any pattern or coherent plan.

CHAPTER 12—LONDONDERRY—13 AND 14 AUGUST

13 August—5 15 am 14 August

12.1 By 7 00 am on the morning of the 13th the police had re-entered Rossville Street where they held a line running from Eden Place to the maisonettes. During the hours of daylight they preferred the open spaces of Rossville Street to the confines of William Street because they could see what was being thrown and take avoiding action: but at night William Street offered a better defensive position. They could not, however, advance beyond Eden Place; for if they did, they found themselves within range of missiles hurled from the top of the high-rise flats.

12.2 A sort of stalemate prevailed in Rossville Street for most of the day. The police fired CS gas sporadically towards the Bogsiders, who threw stones and petrol bombs from the roof of the high flats and from a low barricade put across the street between the flats and the police line. Occasionally the police returned the stones.

12.3 Behind their position the Bogsiders, who now saw themselves as engaged in a battle to keep the police out, were busy with defensive preparations. Mr Melaugh organised people to spread coal-bags, which he soaked with a water-hose, over areas where gas grenades and cartridges had landed: others doused gas-affected areas with water they discharged from an abandoned fire hydrant, while yet others burned tyres in an attempt to disperse the gas. Two journalists, Mr Jackson and Mr Jones, during their separate wanderings through the Bogside, saw parties of people making and distributing petrol bombs. Mr Jones described the scene in these words:—

"The whole of the Bogside had been turned into a munitions camp . . . In many streets women and children were filling bottles with petrol and some other substance in order to make petrol bombs. They were filling the bottles from bath-tubs which were filled with pe[illegible]. Other children were ripping up paving-stones, breaking them, putting them in wheel barrows and transporting them to where the main confrontation was".

He further saw ready for use against intrusive police vehicles a long plank with nails driven into it and a more elaborate device, a steel cylinder on to which pointed steel spikes had been welded. When he made his way up to the roof of the high flats he found it heavily stocked with missiles and petrol bombs.

12.4 At about 7 am the Deputy Inspector-General was again on the scene: he formed the opinion that army intervention would be required within 24 hours, and so expressed himself on the telephone to the Inspector-General who set in motion the process necessary to ensure that the army would be available if called upon. At 11 am the Deputy Inspector-General gave a press conference at the Victoria police station in the course of which he sought to explain police tactics: pressed about the use of CS gas and the continuing presence of police in Rossville Street, he emphasised the defensive and containing character of police action.

12.5 The Bogside was a lively and—for some, no doubt—an exhilarating place this day. Miss Devlin was active in Rossville Street. She was seen in the afternoon to be actively defending the Rossville Street barricade, taking missiles up to its defenders, and shouting encouragement to them. In the morning, watched by the television team who accompanied her on her visit to the city, she had led a flag party to the high flats where she unfurled at one end of the roof the "Starry Plough", flag of the Connolly Association. The Irish Republic's tricolour was already flying from the other end of the roof. Lest there should be any misunderstanding, Miss Devlin assured the Tribunal that she raised the "Starry Plough" as a gesture of opposition to, not support for, the tricolour.

12.6 It is not really surprising that into the exciting arena of the rioting Bogside there came some foreign students. Mr Jones, in his travels around, met about 8 or 10, one or two of whom he thought were French students ("there is something about French students, you can pick them out a mile"). They helped to defend the barricades: one student, indeed, told him they would show the Bogsiders "how it was done". Nevertheless, it is clear that there was no large foreign student presence, that such of them as came seldom cast themselves into a role more active than that of sympathetic sightseers, and that neither their presence nor their actions influenced the riots in any significant degree. Mr Jones described those he saw as "itinerant anarchists": it is as good a description as any of their interest and influence—transient and slight.

12.7 In the course of the day Miss Devlin had some inconclusive conversations over the telephone with Major Chichester-Clark, Mr Porter and Lord Stonham. The Deputy Inspector-General was kept informed. He decided to attempt a parley with Miss Devlin in Rossville Street. Accordingly he and DI Armstrong, dressed in their ordinary uniform, showed themselves at the barricade well beyond the police line. In an endeavour to stimulate goodwill the Deputy Inspector-General ordered the police to withdraw to William Street: but Mi[illegible]n did not appear. The only reaction from the Bogside was an intensification of the attack as the police drew back. The attempt to parley was abandoned and the police returned to Rossville Street.

12.8 During the afternoon an incident occurred, which calls for remark only because it is the one direct piece of evidence of a firearm in the hands of a Bogsider during the August riots. A Daily Telegraph photographer, who was watching a minor encounter between police and rioters in a small lane-way on the north side of the maisonettes in Rossville Street, noticed a man carrying a gun. He took some photographs. It is clear that a man was there armed with a gun, even though policemen who were in the lane-way did not see him. But there is no evidence to suggest that the gun was fired, or that the display of the gun was anything more than a gesture.

12.9 While in the centre of the city during the afternoon and early evening activity was limited to static rioting, the hurling of missiles by Bogsiders and the occasional discharge of CS gas by the police, mob violence erupted near the police station in the Rosemount suburb. But, before dealing with what developed into the siege of a police station, mention must be made of two events. At 8 30 pm Mr Paddy Doherty and Dr McDermott held a short press conference in the Bogside. They alleged that hundreds of marauding Paisleyites, openly supported by the police, had wrecked and burned premises in the Bogside, that a heavy blanket of tear gas had taken its toll of human suffering, that law and order had broken down, and that the Stormont government was incapable of governing. It was a call to arms, not a factual account of the riot; but its distortions and exaggerations do underline the melancholy truth that law and order had indeed broken down; needless to say, the conference did not emphasise the Bogsiders' contribution to the sorry state of affairs in their city.

12.10 The conference broke up in order that all present might listen to a radio broadcast at 9 pm by Mr Lynch, the Prime Minister of the Irish Republic. There is no doubt that this broadcast strengthened the will of the Bogsiders to obstruct any attempt by the police to enter their area and to harass them by missile and petrol bomb attack whenever they appeared on the perimeter. The truth is that the Bogsiders were by now not willing to accept the civil power of the state within the Bogside. Their success at the barricades combined with the words of Mr Lynch and the natural reluctance of the civil power to switch from defence to attack enlarged their ambitions and strengthened their will. Meanwhile the inability of the police to suppress the riot in the city centre had two predictable consequences: the riot spread outwards, and the Protestant community, restless ever since the attack on the Apprentice Boys but held in check (save for the sporadic activity of small numbers in Little James Street and during the police incursion into Rossville Street), assembled in strength. The Rosemount siege and the sectarian conflict which were the major events of the night of the 13/14th were derived directly from Bogside success in the city centre.

12.11 The Rosemount police station stands on the Creggan Road near its junction with North Street: it is the centre from which the predominantly Catholic area of the Creggan estate is policed. In the early hours of the 13th —about 1 am—two petrol bombs impr[illegible] from 1 gallon petrol cans had been placed outside the station door, but ha[illegible]ot ignited. But in the afternoon, at about 3 00 pm, a mob attacked the station. Some 30 petrol bombs were hurled at its outer doors, which caught fire. The rioters withdrew to the North Street junction where they were joined by others and built a barricade. Very soon a mob of between 200 and 300 had assembled. At 3 20 pm police reinforcements arrived at the station, which now became the scene of very serious violence. Crowds, estimated by the police to number 600, attacked with petrol bombs and an assortment of missiles; the police counter-attacked with baton charges, picked up stones and flung them back at the crowd, and resorted to the discharge of CS gas. The rioters put up more barricades, so that by 6 30 pm the station was in a state of siege, completely cut off from outside help. At about 9 30 pm, through the good offices of Mr Hume who led a deputation to parley with the senior police officer in the station, a truce was arranged, its terms:—no use of CS gas and no attempt to break the barricades provided there were no further attacks on the station. With one exception, which, since it occurred soon after the truce was negotiated, was probably due to misunderstanding or ignorance of what had been agreed, the truce was observed until the station was relieved at 5 15 am by police freed by the dying down of riot activity elsewhere in the city.

12.12 Meanwhile a very serious riot developed in Great James Street, in the opinion of DI McAtamney "definitely the most serious sectarian confrontation during the August riots" in Londonderry. The DI in his evidence drew attention to the fact that it developed on the second night of the riots when people had been disturbed by the first night's events and came into the city to participate in a riot if the opportunity presented itself.

12.13 It arose in this way. At about 9 pm the police withdrew for the night from the Rossville Street–William Street junction. Their main position was now in William Street opposite Chamberlain Street, while a small detachment stood in Little James Street. The Bogsiders—no doubt heartened by Mr Lynch's broadcast—followed up the police withdrawal, taking over the Rossville Street–William Street junction and hurling petrol bombs and other missiles at the police. Sometime between 9 and 10 pm premises in Upper William Street (notably a shirt factory which backed on to the Presbyterian Church in Great James Street) and in Little James Street were set on fire.

12.14 The small police detachment in that street now felt the first effects of the developing sectarian conflict. In the course of the evening a Protestant crowd gathered in the general area of Guildhall–Waterloo Place–Strand Road. Men had been observed coming from the Fountain area until there were, by 9 40 pm, some 200 of them, angry and aggressive, where Sackville Street joins the Strand Road. They made their way into Little James Street and began hurling stones over the heads of the police at the Bogsiders. The scene was graphically described by HC Campbell:—

"There have been very, very few occasions on which I have actually seen excesses on the Protestant side. On one occasion I did see it—it was on this night of the 13 August when I had very few men at the corner of Little James Street/Sac[illegible]ille Street. We were defending that corner and if the rioters [ie the Bogsiders] had known how depleted I was they would have had no difficulty in burning this town down . . . About 9 40 or thereabouts . . . I heard shouting, a lot of shouting in Sackville Street and my immediate reaction was that we had been surrounded . . . but when I looked round, it suddenly dawned on me . . . with their red, white and blue tam o'shanters . . . that they were actually a Paisleyite crowd. . . . We were brushed aside. That crowd engaged in stone throwing . . . for 4 or 5 minutes, and they left just as quickly as they had come and went to Great James Street".

It was asserted in evidence by a journalist, Mr Hatfield, that, while HC Campbell's small police force was under this pressure, one or more policemen discharged their firearms. This was denied by the Head Constable. Mr Hatfield told the Tribunal that at a time when Bogside rioters had entered Brewsters bakery (and before it was burnt out by petrol bombs) a face appeared at one of its upper windows, that he saw a policeman fire at the window, that he heard the shot, and that the face disappeared. He believed he heard other shots, and he collected a number of cartridge cases, 3 of which have been forensically examined and appear to have been fired from the same ·38 revolver, which was proved to have been on issue to a policeman on duty in the street at the time. The policeman, having since died, was not available to give evidence.

12.15 Because of this allegation and others there was subsequently a check on police ammunition: no deficiency was found. And no policeman reported that he had fired his weapon—which it was his duty to do, if he had.

12.16 The Tribunal accepts the evidence of Mr Hatfield, supported as it is by the examination of the 3 cartridge cases. As DI McAtamney remarked, there are ways and means of concealing an ammunition deficiency: and, as the Tribunal has reason to know, constables do not always report the discharge of their firearms. Serious as was the situation of these few policemen sandwiched between two hostile crowds, the use of firearms was not justified. There is, however, no evidence that anyone was injured by the firing.

12.17 The Protestants now gathered in Great James Street. By 10 pm they may have been as many as 300: some of them were chanting slogans in support of Mr Paisley, some were equipped with helmets, shields and sticks. Their presence caused consternation among the growing numbers of Catholics at the top of the street, who feared an attack on their cathedral, St Eugene's. Between the two crowds stood some police (at first no more than 40 of the Reserve Force, later reinforced to a strength of 70) and an armoured car.

12.18 The Catholic crowd threw a barricade across the street and made ready to repel any advance by police or civilians towards the cathedral. A local journalist commented to the Tribunal that the composition of this crowd differed from most crowds he had seen in Derry in that a very large proportion of the people were "middle-aged, business people, professional people, and so on". Certainly Mr McAteer, Fr Mulvey and Mr Canavan were at one time or another in the crowd, which proved itself determined and resourceful until it was finally dispersed.

12.19 Alarmed by the rumour of ii. [illegible]g attack on their cathedral, the crowd was not comforted by what it believ[illegible] was witnessing in Great James Street. They thought they saw civilians supporting the police and joining in the several baton-charges the police made up the street. What they did see was not so sinister, but just as alarming. There was no sort of alliance or concert between police and Protestants: but the police were quite unable to prevent civilians mingling with them and surging forward with each of their advances up the street. Catholics complained bitterly that baton-charges were reserved for them—why not charge the Protestants? But Catholics were attacking the police with stones, petrol bombs, and later with blazing vehicles: the Protestants were not.

12.20 With the aid of CS gas the police, closely followed by the uninvited Protestants, made their way up Great James Street as far as its junction with Lower Road. Despite their furious counter-attacks, the Catholics retreated. The gas was having its effect, as Fr Mulvey found when he rescued two old ladies, taking them to the comparative safety of his presbytery. Some of the more high-spirited (and intoxicated) members of the Catholic crowd sent rolling down the hill a number of vehicles, some of them on fire. They included an ice-cream van and some Post Office vehicles seized from the Little Diamond depot. Fortunately they veered off the roadway into lamp-standards which halted harmlessly their uncontrolled careers.

12.21 The police inched their way up the street until at about 3 am they were able to execute a "pincer movement" around Prince's Street and Infirmary Road. Before they did so, they had managed to push the Protestant crowd down the street, warning them that if they refused to go the police would not mount their pincer operation. The point was taken, and there was no further trouble from the Protestants. The pincer operation was itself a success and the Catholic crowd dispersed. The end of the affair enabled the police to relieve the Rosemount station, as already described.

12.22 In the course of this riot two men, and almost certainly a third, suffered gunshot wounds. Two men, Mr McDade and Mr Doherty, were admitted to hospital suffering from wounds caused by ·38 revolver bullets. A third man, Mr Joyce, sustained a superficial head injury which could well have been caused by gunfire. Without detailing all the evidence, it is enough to record that the Tribunal is satisfied that Mr McDade and Mr Doherty suffered gunshot wounds in the course of the Great James Street riot: and it is probable that Mr Joyce did so too. Young Mr McDade, hearing the rumour that "the Paisleyites were going to attack the Cathedral chapel" made his way to the top of Great James Street and took part in the riot: on his own admission he threw one petrol bomb. As he was retreating, he says he was hit in the back, and fell, shouting "I am shot". Mr Doherty, an older man, had been standing with Mr McAteer, watching events, when he was shot. Mr Joyce was standing in Great James Street: when he turned to go home, he was struck on the head by something.

12.23 If these men were shot (as certainly two and probably all three were), who shot them? Mr Joyce described seeing 4 policemen firing their guns. The police deny any knowledge of shooting: we have already mentioned the negative result of the subsequent ammunition check and the absence of any police report of shooting. T[illegible]no evidence of civilians on either side being seen with guns. The injuries [illegible]Mr McDade and Mr Doherty were caused by bullets of the type issued to police armed with revolvers, and the Tribunal finds that some policemen did fire in the direction of the crowd hostile to them, ie the Catholics. Whether they were firing over their heads, as Mr Joyce thought was possible, or into the crowd, the action was unjustifiable in the absence of an order to fire: and no order was given. Grave as was the police situation, there is no evidence to suggest that any policeman needed to fire in self-defence. Throughout these riots the police took the creditable view that the mere use of petrol bombs, dangerous though they were, did not justify retaliation by gunfire. The Tribunal believes the police were correct in this view, which was, nevertheless, a courageous and praiseworthy one in the circumstances.

12.24. The Great James Street riot was a true sectarian conflict. Communal in character, each side attributed sinister intentions to the other and fed their zeal for violence with rumour and exhortation. In the midst stood the police, always in danger of being overwhelmed. It is not surprising that DI McAtamney, who had formed the view by the late afternoon of 12 August that the Army was required, now said to Lt-Col Todd, the senior Army officer present in the city, that "the time for the Army to be brought in had certainly arrived . . . we were not in control of the situation".

12.25 By the morning of the 14th it was obvious to the seniro police officers that their men were too few and too tired to restore order in the face of Bogside resistance. Severe static rioting continued all day in the William Street/Rossville Street area: and in the afternoon a serious disturbance developed in Bishop Street near the Fountain and Long Tower Street. The police did well to contain and limit these troubles: more than this was now beyond them. They knew that it was no longer possible for them to restore law and order to the Bogside or peace to the city. In the course of the day the USC were brought on to the streets and the decision to call upon the Army was made and implemented.

12.26 It is unnecessary to describe the rioting in detail. About 8 am the police re-entered Rossville Street. They were subjected to missile and petrol bomb attack: they retaliated with CS gas. In the course of the day a party of police reached the roof of the maisonettes and cleared it of rioters who had been hurling missiles at the police below them in the street. There is no evidence to suggest that they entered any flat or maisonette. Heavy fires, caused by petrol bombs and perpetuated by the inability of the fire brigade to reach them, had developed in the William Street area by 4 pm when the police, followed up by Bogsiders, retreated from Rossville Street into William Street.

12.27 So far one of the features of the rioting had been the refusal of authority to deploy the USC. This was a deliberate act of policy: for senior police from the Deputy IG downwards were well aware that the presence of USC where they could be seen by Bogsiders was likely to cause apprehension and intensify the riot. On the 13th a small detachment had been held in reserve, a few being employed that night in the Fountain area. On the 14th a decision was taken at Stormont to mobilise the USC, and in the course of the afternoon the radio broadcast a call to all special constables to report for duty. In Londonderry they reported to their headquarters; a party of 60 or so was dispatched to Waterloo Place, armed with batons and pickaxe handles: only their NCOs and officers carried firearms. From Waterloo Place a few were sent to Castle Gate and Butcher Gate. USC personnel were also on duty in Bishop Street when the afternoon's rioting broke out.

12.28 The sight of the hated "B Specials" moving to the Gates had its predictable effect on the Bogsiders, fear and anger. There was some stoning—probably by both sides. But, by and large, the USC behaved in a disciplined way. They certainly helped to restrain the Fountain Street crowd for a time, though in the end a serious riot did develop in Bishop Street.

12.29 The course of events in Bishop Street is not absolutely clear. During the afternoon some five buildings, all owned or occupied by Roman Catholics, were set on fire and by 4 pm, when a platoon of the Reserve Force with armoured cars arrived, a serious riot was in progress. Stones and petrol bombs were being exchanged between the Fountain and Long Tower factions: and it is probable, as was given in evidence by some witnesses, that a few members of the USC joined in. The Reserve Force, using CS gas, managed to separate the crowds, but not before considerable destruction had been done by the fires, which the Long Tower crowd had prevented the fire brigade from reaching.

12.30 By 5 pm the police were on the defensive in William Street, a sectarian riot was in progress in Bishop Street, and the Bogside was alive with rumours that the B Specials were coming. At this moment a company of the 1st Battalion of the Prince of Wales Own Regiment arrived in Waterloo Place under the command of Major Hanson. A barrier of wire was put across the roads leading into Waterloo Place, a gap being left through which the police withdrew from William Street. The Bogside crowd followed up to the wire, where Mr McAteer parleyed with Major Hanson. He asked if the police could be moved out of sight and this was done. He asked for a fire engine to deal with the fires burning in William Street. A little later Mr P L Doherty, Mr Canavan and Mr Stanley Orme MP called on the battalion Commanding Officer, Lt Col Todd, at the Victoria Barracks: the colonel agreed to withdraw the police behind the army lines, thereby modifying his original plan for a joint police-military operation.

12.31 The army now took over the police lines in Waterloo Place, at Castle and Butcher Gates, and—about 7 15 pm—at Bishop Street where the sectarian riot was dying away. Whenever and wherever the soldiers appeared, rioting ended. It is true to say that their arrival was welcomed. The city was tired and the army presence afforded a sound reason for going home.

12.32 After the army arrived on the streets there was a public altercation between Mr P L Doherty and Miss Bernadette Devlin. The details were disputed. Mr Doherty was telling the Bogsiders that the fight was over and that the police had been defeated. Miss Devlin, he thought, was telling them to continue fighting, on the grounds that Stormont had not been suspended and that the army was there to help Stormont. This version was supported by Mr Tarleton. Miss Devlin, however, claimed that she did not want the people to be deceived into thinking that Stormont had been suspended and that she was certainly not telling them to fight the army. It was on this occasion that Mr Doherty described Miss Devlin as an agitator, and Miss Devlin said Mr Doherty had done nothing to defend the Bogside. The Tribunal has no doubt that, whatever the words used, two differing points of view were being put to the people; by Mr Doherty that their objectives were achieved and that they should go home: by Miss Devlin that they were not and that the people should stand to their barricades.

12.33 On the next day Mr Canavan and Mr P L Doherty called on Col Todd, telling him that they represented both the DCAC and the DCDA. As well as requesting an amnesty for those who had taken part in the riots, the two spokesmen presented the Colonel with a list of "long-term demands". These were: the abolition of Stormont, restriction of the RUC to purely peace-keeping duties, disbandment of the B Specials and repeal of the Special Powers Act. Col Todd immediately despatched this list to his headquarters in Belfast.

12.34 At the same meeting Col Todd tried unsuccessfully to persuade Mr Canavan and Mr Doherty to allow his troops to enter the Bogside. In the absence of their agreement, the Colonel did not insist and (with the exception of one accidental intrusion) his men did not enter the Bogside at any time up until the battalion's departure on 19 August.

12.35 Before leaving, Col Todd had yet another meeting with Mr Canavan and Mr Doherty in the course of which Mr Canavan commented that they would regard themselves as being "at war" until Stormont was abolished. Mr Canavan told the Tribunal that what he had meant by this expression was that there would be no peace in Northern Ireland while Stormont remained.

PART V—THE SPREAD OF THE RIOTS

CHAPTER 13—POLITICAL PRESSURES ON 13 AUGUST

13.1 The rioting in Londonderry had begun on Tuesday, 12 August. On Wednesday night there was serious rioting elsewhere and trouble had spread to Belfast. In the later part of the week most of the violence was in Belfast. The Tribunal's terms of reference do not include events in Lurgan, Strabane and other centres. This exclusion simplifies our account of the spread of rioting but at the cost of completeness. We do not think that the general balance of our narrative would have been altered if these centres had been included, but the fact of rioting elsewhere in the Province must be borne in mind.

The situation now becomes so complex that a clear narrative is difficult to achieve. What we do is to set out political events and pressures on 13 August. Then we narrate events between 11 and 15 August in Dungannon and Coalisland, Newry, and Dungiven. Next we narrate the far more serious disturbances on the night of 13th in Belfast, dealing first with West Belfast and then with the Ardoyne.

13.2 We start with political pressures on 13 August. The NICRA had held a special general meeting on 10 August. Some expressed fears of violence in Londonderry and a number of those present volunteered to go there on 12 August to exert their influence to diminish any violence which might occur. However once the rioting had begun Mr Gogarty* received telephone requests to organise diversions from Mr Keenan, Mr McCann, Miss Devlin and Mr Seth. There was also a report to the association from Mr Kevin Agnew, a member of the executive, who was present when CS gas was first used. These calls were received on the night of 12 August. On his own initiative Mr Gogarty telephoned CRA branches and issued a press statement about the situation in Londonderry. His call for diversionary tactics was published in some morning papers on 13 August. The Irish Times carried an item calling upon Civil Rights people throughout Northern Ireland to hold demonstrations.

13.3 In the early hours of the morning of 13 August the Minister of Home Affairs, in exercise of the powers conferred on him by section 2(2) of the Public Order Act (Northern Ireland) 1951, banned all public meetings and outdoor processions from 13 to 31 August.

13.4 On the morning of 13 August a special meeting of the NICRA executive was called in Belfast. On 20 April when serious rioting occurred in Londonderry the association had been involved in organising diversionary meetings at various centres in the Province. On that occasion the police were withdrawn from the Bogside and the Civil Rights demonstrations were felt to have been effective. Only in Belfast had they led to violence. On 13 August the association decided to seek a meeting with the Minister of Home Affairs and tell him that diversionary demonstrations would be held in many places if the police did not withdraw from the Bogside. Local associations were asked to be ready. It was firmly decided that no meeting should be held in Belfast on 13 August because of the risk of violence but there was some difference of recollection about a possible meeting in Belfast on 14 August. The possibility was left open in a public statement on 13 August by Mr Boyle, the association's Press Officer. Mr Boyle said this statement represented the association's position. Mr Gogarty, however, claimed that he had been strongly against any meeting in Belfast and that Mr Boyle's threat of a possible meeting on 14 August was solely a PD responsibility.

13.5 The Minister was however unable to meet representatives of the CRA at Stormont because the Prime Minister had asked to see him shortly before they arrived. Instead, they saw his Parliamentary Secretary, Mr J D Taylor MP. The deputation included Edwina Stewart, and Messrs Michael Farrell, Denis Cassin, Erskine Holmes, Peter Morris and Kevin Boyle, and in addition Mr Simpson MP (NI) and Mr Devlin MP (NI) were present. According to Mr Simpson the deputation expressed its views about police behaviour in the Bogside and suggested that, if the police withdrew, negotiations with the Bogside would be possible and the barricades might then come down. There were suggestions that the Minister should himself go to Londonderry. Mr Devlin said "We told him that a number of meetings and demonstrations had been arranged for Northern Ireland, excluding Belfast, and we asked if he was prepared to get in touch with the Minister and the Prime Minister with a proposal that if the police would withdraw from the Bogside we would attempt to get in touch with the Bogside people to stop them and also that all demonstrations would be called off". Mr Devlin made the point that he did not want arms or soldiers used because they would aggravate the situation. The interview was felt to be unsatisfactory by the deputation. It ended about 5 30 pm.

13.6 At 6 pm the Prime Minister of Northern Ireland broadcast on television. During this speech Major Chichester-Clark said, in relation to the Londonderry riots, "We want peace not vengeance. If the rioters withdraw peacefully to their homes and observe the law no attempt will be made to exploit the situation". The speech also announced that the Northern Ireland Parliament would be recalled for the following day and that the USC would be used to the full to relieve the regular police force of other duties. It also indicated that if necessary "the civil power" would not shrink from summoning "other aid".

13.7 The CRA deputation saw this broadcast at Mr Gogarty's house. Mr Boyle and Mr Devlin agreed in evidence that they detected in it some signs that a truce might be arranged. Mr Devlin spoke to Major Chichester-Clark, who agreed that Mr Devlin should talk to Miss Devlin. There was some difficulty in reaching her but eventually a telephone discussion took place. However Miss Devlin said she could not give an assurance that the police would not be followed if they withdrew from the Bogside. The Prime Minister's proposal therefore came to nothing.

13.8 Meantime country branches of the CRA were telephoning about their demonstrations. Mr Gogarty said that the intention was that these should be non-violent, "and it was implicit that these would be organised by local groups, by people known in the area as Civil Rights leaders". The final decision rested with the local people. Thus, in Lurgan the leaders would not arrange a public demonstration because they had not sufficient guards and there was tension in the town. But when asked whether he did not think it was courting danger to bring the people of Coalisland out on to the streets Mr Gogarty replied "No, the situation in the Bogside was far too grave". On the other hand he testified that "Many of the people we contacted did inform us that, whether we called for demonstrations or not, feeling was so high that there would be spontaneous demonstrations against the police".

13.9 At 9 pm there was Mr Lynch's broadcast.* It was regarded as provocative in many Protestant and Unionist circles and as an encouragement by some Catholic activists. Mr P Kennedy MP, who was present on the Falls Road on 13 August, said "So you had a situation, a very tense situation, here in Belfast and, because of the Derry situation, this tension was heightened on the Falls, in my opinion—and it is only my opinion—by the Taoiseach's speech of 13 August". According to Max Hastings "It was the opinion of most observers at that time that it was as a direct consequence and immediately following Jack Lynch's television appearance that the attacks on Hastings Street police station and the events of Wednesday night began".

13.10 Neither Mr Boyle nor Mr Gogarty admitted to any knowledge of the Divis Street meeting which took place in the early evening of 13 August nor of participants in it. However a publication called "Terror in Northern Ireland" issued by the Citizens' Defence Committee states that "It seems, however, that the initiative was taken by a small group of young Civil Rights supporters who met at Divis Towers" According to Mr P Kennedy MP (NI) he saw Mr Fergus Woods, an original PD leader, organising or trying to encourage men to act as stewards on 13 August. The Tribunal has evidence that a loudspeaker mounted on a white Cortina called people to such a meeting on the evening of the 13th, but the identity of those concerned was not established.

13.11 The Tribunal is satisfied that the call for demonstrations initiated by NICRA at the request of the Bogside leaders contributed to the deterioration of the situation in the Province and did not go unheeded in Belfast, even though the executive was concerned to exclude the city. The association did not advocate violence but it encouraged a course of action which might well, as in the event it did, offer to others less well controlled the opportunity of violent clashes with the police. It was an opportunity that was seized in many centres, and most dramatically in Belfast itself.

CHAPTER 14—DUNGANNON AND COALISLAND

General

14.1 Dungannon, a town of some 8,000 inhabitants in Co Tyrone, has a sad history of sectarian tension.† Its population is divided very roughly half and half between Catholics and Protestants. Because of the composition of its population and the strong feelings engendered by sectarian animosity in the town, Dungannon is a very sensitive reactor to trouble in the Province. The Protestant and Catholic sections of the community live in separate parts of the town; the Protestants in the east and the Catholics in the west. While both sections of the community recognised that each had the right to their traditional processions passing through the Market Square, the Protestants were extremely sensitive to any Civil Rights activity in the Square or the centre of the town. HC Hyndman, who had been stationed in the town for 14 years, admitted in evidence that the Civil Rights Movement was anathema to the Protestants in so far as the Market Square was concerned.

*Set out in Appendix V A (vii).

14.2 As a matter of history, the disturbances associated with the Civil Rights Movement in Northern Ireland began with a march from Coalisland to Dungannon on 24 August 1968. This demonstration suggested to certain bodies and persons in Londonderry that public attention might be drawn to their claims by way of similar action which they originally intended to be non-violent. There were further disturbances in Dungannon on 23 November and 4 December 1968. The Cameron Commission found that on 4 December certain members of the USC, including at least one officer not on duty, were present among the crowd engaged in hostile demonstration against the Civil Rights supporters. Unfortunately this feature of the riot of 4 December was repeated in Dungannon in August 1969.

14.3 The offices of the Urban District Council are situate on the east side of the Square, ie the Protestant side. The Council enjoyed an unhappy reputation with the Catholics so far as its housing policy and allocation were concerned. Consequently in the months of May, June and July 1969 the Civil Rights supporters picketed the monthly meetings of the Urban District Council. These pickets heightened tension in the town and provoked some indignation among the Protestants. The tension was sufficiently serious for the police to arrange for substantial reinforcements to the Dungannon force on the occasion of the monthly meetings of the Urban District Council.

Events of 11 August

14.4 A monthly meeting of the Council was scheduled for 7 pm on Monday 11 August: the usual Civil Rights picket was expected, and the local police force was reinforced. Its strength of approximately 20 constables was increased to 107 by reinforcements from Belfast, Armagh and Co Tyrone. Unexpectedly, however, the Protestants forestalled the Civil Rights people; for the first time they set up a picket outside the Urban District Council offices. About a dozen or so Protestants with two Union Jacks placed themselves outside the offices around 6 30 pm. When the Civil Rights supporters arrived in the Square they found the Protestant picket in position, and very sensibly withdrew. They remained, however, on the west side of the Square near its junction with Thomas Street. Councillors arrived for the meeting and those who were recognised as being associated with Civil Rights activity or the Opposition were greeted with a certain amount of jeering. During the course of the meeting the crowds slowly increased; when it came to an end at about 9 30 pm, the Protestant crowd was of the order of 100 persons and the Civil Rights crowd at the other side of the Square about half that size. Councillor Hassard told the Tribunal that he recognised in the Protestant crowd certain persons whom he knew as members of the USC. They were in civilian clothes and at least one of them was a flag bearer. The Tribunal has no reason to doubt this identification; it would not be at all surprising to find members of the USC in a Protestant crowd in Dungannon. The Tribunal is, however, completely satisfied that these men were not on duty and that there were no uniformed USC personnel in the Market Square on the evening of 11 August. The Tribunal is also satisfied that no civilians of either crowd were carrying arms. Notwithstanding the tension and a certain amount of cat-calling as the Councillors made their way out of the meeting, there was at this time no violence. Indeed, as the Councillors moved away from the Council offices, so the two crowds began to diminish. By 10 o'clock CI Landale, who was himself in Dungannon, reached the opinion that there was unlikely to be any serious trouble and dismissed the Belfast and Armagh contingents of police and also a substantial number of those from the County force outside Dungannon. He himself returned to Omagh.

14.5 The town remained quiet until about 10 30 pm, when a minor incident occurred which appears to have been the beginning of the night's disturbances. A bin lid was flung from the Civil Rights crowd near Thomas Street in the direction of some Protestants who were in the Square. This trivial incident provoked the Protestants. HC Hyndman, who was at the time touring the town, returned to the Square where he found a situation which he described as one of scuffling between the two crowds. Additional police were brought into the Square and the crowds were separated; the Protestant crowd going down to the mouth of Church Street, the Civil Rights crowd making its way towards Irish Street. At this stage a number of Civil Rights stewards, including Councillor Hassard, did excellent work in shepherding the Civil Rights crowd towards the entrance of Irish Street and persuading them to retreat some distance down the street. Comparative quiet had returned when a private car was observed to be coming at a considerable speed up Irish Street and through the Civil Rights crowd in the direction of the Square. Its speed was estimated at between 20 to 25 miles an hour which was far too fast for the overcrowded narrow street. It was in second gear and the noise must have been almost as frightening as the appearance and speed of the vehicle itself. Members of the Irish Street crowd, and at least one policeman, had to jump out of the way in order to avoid being run down. As the car emerged into the Square a great cheer went up from the Protestant crowd near Church Street. The car moved across the Square and without stopping disappeared down Church Street. This incident incensed the Irish Street crowd. It is not possible to determine whether the driver, who was a Protestant, was intentionally creating an incident amongst the Irish Street crowd or whether, as he said at his subsequent trial for dangerous driving, he was panic stricken at finding himself in the midst of a hostile crowd and anxious only to get away as soon as possible.* The fact remains that the episode was the beginning of serious rioting. Almost immediately after the car had disappeared, stones and other missiles began to fly from Irish Street in the direction of the Square. There was a conflict of evidence as to who began the stoning and which crowd was responsible for the majority of the missile throwing. The Tribunal is satisfied that, angered by the car incident, the Irish Street crowd began it.

*The driver was charged with dangerous driving. He was found guilty of careless driving and fined £10.

But it is equally clear that the Protestant crowd was not slow to reply in kind. In this deteriorating situation HC Hyndman decided that the police would have to clear Irish Street.

14.6 While these events were occurring the Reserve Force and other police reinforcements who had been dismissed had been recalled to Dungannon. HC Stewart and his Belfast Reserve Force Platoon were once more available and he was ordered by HC Hyndman to clear Irish Street. Although Councillor Hassard and others were doing their best to control the Irish Street crowd, they were not succeeding with unruly elements at the back. Stone throwing was persistent, and a police constable had already been injured. The police detached a small party to hold back the Protestant crowd in Church Street while the larger party conducted its baton charge down Irish Street. Unfortunately the baton charge must have appeared to the crowd in Irish Street as yet one more illustration of police partiality: for, while the police charged the Catholics, they merely restrained the Protestants. The Protestant crowd had been and was continuing to exhibit signs of hostility and aggression but it was amenable to control by the police; they had no difficulty in restraining them in Church Street. It is significant that Councillor Hassard, who showed himself a fair minded witness, when asked in cross-examination whether in the 11 August riots the police had shown a partiality against one section of the crowd in favour of another replied that they had not, even though he condemned the conduct of the baton charge as harsh.

14.7 The baton charge succeeded in clearing Irish Street but not without causing a number of casualties. HC Stewart himself was injured and also two of the stewards, Councillors Hassard and McKay, both of whom had been doing their best to control the crowd; Councillor McKay was hit over the head. After the crowd had dispersed, the police withdraw from Irish Street into the Square where by this time CI Landale had arrived on his return from Omagh. Some Protestants remained in the Square and there were others in Church Street. Mr Hassard made his way to the knot of senior policemen in the Square and made his protest about the baton charge. He declared that, unless he could report to his people, who were now gathered in Anne Street, that the Square was clear, it would be very difficult to persuade them to go home. On a second visit to the Square he realised that the Protestants had largely dispersed and with this information he returned to Anne Street.

14.8 Mr Hassard reported back to a meeting of some 60 or 70 people now assembled in Anne Street. They were in angry mood, believing that they were the victims of unfair police attack. At least one speaker suggested that a Defence Committee should be formed in order to defend the Catholic part of the town. There were many young people at the meeting and some of them decided that in order to protect their part of the town they must erect a barricade: they went down William Street and began to erect a barricade at the junction of William Street and Georges Street across the Georges Street carriageway. News of these events reached CI Landale in the Market Square. He decided that the barricade must be dismantled and that the remaining crowds in the western part of the town should be dispe[illegible]here was still a substantial number of Protestants about on their side of t[illegible]Square but they were giving no indication of any intention of invading the western part of the town. The County Inspector organised three parties of police, one to proceed down Scotch Street and along Georges Street to the barricade; another in vehicles out along Quarry Lane and so into the town by the Donaghmore Road; and the third under his personal command to move down Irish Street. The operation was carried out successfully: the barricade was dismantled and the comparatively few people who were still about in William Street, Anne Street and Irish Street were dispersed. The party that had been sent round by Quarry Lane to Donaghmore Road consisted of members of the Reserve Force: they patrolled the Donaghmore Road, coming under attack by stones thrown by youths hiding in gardens and entries. Ultimately this party returned to the Station, as did the County Inspector.

14.9 Some, however, of the two police parties that had been engaged in the dismantling of the barricade in Georges Street moved into Fairmount Park, a predominantly Catholic housing estate situate behind William Street and Anne Street. The ostensible purpose of the move was to disperse and, if possible, arrest rioters: but the manner of the move was calculated to disturb and distress the residents, accompanied, as it was, by a good deal of shouting and of banging of batons upon shields. After the police had withdrawn from Fairmount Park protests were lodged at the police station against the conduct of the police in the matter of the baton charges and in the matter of the intrusion into the Fairmount Park Estate. By 2 am all was quiet.

14.10 Police behaviour in Fairmount Park appeared to the Tribunal to be wholly unjustified: neither the fact that some rioters had dispersed into the Estate nor any other of the events of the night could justify the type of intrusion staged by the police. And its consequences were unfortunate: for it contributed to the bitterness that marked the behaviour of the Catholic community on the 13th.

14.11 The main issue which arises from the events of the night is—were the police guilty of partiality, favouring the Protestants and directing their actions against the Catholics? The Tribunal acquits the police of any intention of being unfair. It is a fact that almost all policing activity on this night was concentrated against the Civil Rights and Catholic crowds and in the Catholic sector of the town. Protestants who were out and about and in hostile mood sustained no more police activity than was necessary to confine them to the Square and Church Street. Undoubtedly this differentiation of treatment made an impression upon the minds of the Civil Rights crowd but in the circumstances it was quite justifiable.

14.12 It is to be noted that no petrol bombs were thrown by either side in the course of 11 August. There is nothing in the evidence to suggest that the rioting on 11 August was planned or organised ahead. It arose out of an existing tension exacerbated by certain quite trivial incidents in the Market Square. Unfortunately it escalated so as to have a very serious effect upon the minds and [illegible]s of both sections of the community. The Catholics set their minds on [illegible]fence"—by which they meant the use of barricades and violence to keep the police and the Protestants out of their areas: the Protestants became hostile and watchful, ready to strike hard at the Catholic rioters if the police did not deal with the situation to their satisfaction. There is no doubt that the tensions aroused by the events of 11 August contributed to the serious riots in both Dungannon and Coalisland on 12 and 13 August.

14.13 On 12 August tension remained high after the previous night's disturbances. Rumours abounded. On the Catholic side there was talk that extreme Protestants planned that night to burn down the two housing estates in the West Ward (Fairmount Park and Ballygawley Road). At the entrances to these estates barricades were erected and manned by the residents. Stones were collected.

14.14 Meanwhile Protestants gathered in considerable numbers in Market Square. Mrs McCool, a Catholic who lived in Castle Hill, saw civilians arriving at the Orange Hall in cars. Some had sticks, axe handles and farming implements: they also collected stones. Despite this activity on the streets by both Protestant and Catholic factions there was no confrontation between the two groups and a precarious peace was preserved: but things turned out very differently this day in neighbouring Coalisland.

Coalisland: General

14.15 Coalisland is an industrial village situated a few miles from Dungannon.* Its population is overwhelmingly Catholic. It suffers from a high rate of unemployment and a lack of job opportunities for young men. One witness informed the Tribunal that out of the total village population of approximately 3,000 there were some 400 men without employment. Its geographical situation, the nature of its population, and the shortage of jobs explain easily enough why Coalisland betrayed a high degree of sensitivity to the troubles that beset the Province in August 1969. It is not without significance that the first of the events in the 1968–69 sequence of disturbances began in this little place.

Events of 12 August

14.16 On 11 August serious disorder had developed in Dungannon. The inhabitants of Coalisland were well aware of it. Some leaders of the Coalisland Civil Rights Group were present in Dungannon on the 11th and a version of those events was soon circulating widely in Coalisland. No doubt as it circulated so it increased in gravity. Mr Dennis Haughey, the Secretary of the Coalisland Civil Action Committee who gave evidence to the Tribunal, was well aware that anything which affected Dungannon by way of disturbance or disorder was bound sooner or later to affect Coalisland and sooner rather than later. Accordingly, his Committee decided to have a meeting early in the afternoon of 12 August to see if they could prevent repercussions in the village.

*Street plan of Coalisland is at Appendix VIII (G).

14.17 The view taken by Civil Rights people in Dungannon was that the police had behaved badly in their handling of the disorders of the 11th. The Action Committee decided, therefore, to place a picket on the police station in Coalisland as a protest against the behaviour of the police. The picket was to be about a dozen persons and Mr Haughey himself was a member. They went to the police station at about 4 30 pm and remained in the neighbourhood picketing the station until about 6 30 pm. The Committee had made arrangements for a further meeting after the withdrawal of the picket and this took place at 8 o'clock. The purpose of the meeting was to consider the further implications for Coalisland following upon the Dungannon disturbances and possible action to meet them.

14.18 The meeting began at about 8 o'clock in a cafe in the town. It became clear to the members of the Committee that a crowd was gathering in the Market Square and was increasing both in numbers and in noisiness. Coming out of the cafe where the meeting had been held Mr Haughey noticed standing about in the Square large groups of young men in their late teens or early twenties discussing the troubles that had occurred in Dungannon. They were, in his words, "very, very angry". Their anger was directed against the police, whom they were accusing of all sorts of misconduct. Mr Haughey and other members of his Committee did their best to quieten the crowd down, but without any success. Their mood of anger worsened as news began to filter through of events then occurring in Londonderry. Many members of the crowd had transistor sets, and were listening to the news bulletins describing the troubles in that city. These current events built upon a communal recollection of events associated with the City of Londonderry in the previous January and April. It must be emphasised that, whatever the truth of those events, the Coalisland crowd, like many others in the Province, were convinced that the police had behaved badly in Londonderry and that their misdemeanours had not been followed either by effective investigation or just retribution. It is not surprising that, as Mr Haughey soon realised, the Coalisland crowd was not amenable to reason.

14.19 In the Police Station there was a force of 10 policemen, one sergeant and 9 constables. When they realised that there was a risk of serious trouble developing and that the trouble was likely to be directed against the Police Station, a message was sent to Dungannon and around 7 30 pm a District Inspector with a considerable force of police was sent to reinforce Coalisland. When this force arrived, there were some 70 police, all of them RUC, in the Station.

14.20 Some time between 8 and 9 30 pm the crowd attempted an attack on the Police Station. The police, appreciating that an ugly situation was developing, called for further reinforcements, which under a Head Constable reached the Station at about 9 30 pm. When this party arrived, the Station was already under attack from petrol bombs. The Police Station was now beleaguered. There was a growing and very aggressive crowd in the Market Square while up Platers Hill above the Station there was also a crowd manning a lightly constructed barricade of wooden planks. A police witness described the situation in these terms: "They had a barricade erected across the road (i.e. Platers Hill) and as soon as the Police would head towards the crowd in the Square this party up above the Police Station would come down the hill past the barricade and throw petrol bombs and stones down the hill". The police made charges, now down into the Market Square, now up the hill: Each time the crowd retreated only to return as the charge itself ended. Ultimately there arrived further police reinforcements together with an armoured vehicle.

14.21 This last reinforcement arrived in Coalisland at about a quarter to eleven. The local member of Parliament (NI), Mr Austin Currie, had also arrived and did his best to persuade the crowd to disperse and go home. The crowd took no notice; almost immediately serious violence broke out, petrol bombs, bricks and stones being flung at the police, who were in a line across the road outside the Station. The pattern of events was graphically described to the Tribunal by a Police witness:—

> "The crowd would charge with petrol bombs either down the hill or up the hill, the attack coming from Market Square at one moment and from Platers Hill at another. The police attempted to disperse the crowd by baton charges, the only effect of which was, however, to cause that part of the crowd which was charged to retreat".

The police wholly failed at this stage to disperse the crowd. This type of rioting continued throughout the night until about 2 am. There were a number of minor casualties amongst the police.

14.22 Finally the police decided to make a determined attempt to drive off the Platers Hill crowd and to destroy their barricade. The attack was successful but in the course of it a young civilian was injured. The young man was hit by the barricade, but no blame is to be attributed to the police, who were acting reasonably in the circumstances.

14.23 The events of 11 and 12 August had been primarily local in origin. But by the evening of 13 August the disturbances in Londonderry which had continued for over 24 hours began to have their impact in Dungannon as well as in other towns in the Province.

14.24 The NICRA's call for diversionary demonstrations "to take the heat off Derry" was received in Dungannon through the news media, although it appears that no specific request was made for a demonstration in the town. After informal conversations between Mr Aidan Corrigan, the Chairman, and other members of the Dungannon CRA it was decided not to hold a meeting in the town because of its sensitivity to any local disturbance. A decision was taken to call a meeting in Coalisland instead.

14.25 In the event, however, not one but two public meetings were held in Dungannon on the steps of the old Technical College in Anne Street. The object of the first, about which the Tribunal heard little evidence, seems to have been to organise the erection and manning of barricades at the entrances to the housing estates in the West Ward, which according to rumour were to be attacked by Protestants and RUC.

14.26 The second meeting, which was attended by about 200 people, was held at about 10 30 pm under the chairmanship of Mr Aidan Corrigan. His explanation for this reversal of his earlier decision was that when he returned from Coalisland he found that a large crowd was gathered in Anne Street. He thought the best way to get them to go home was to hold a meeting. There were three speakers at the meeting, Mr A Corrigan himself, Mr T Corrigan (no relation) and Mr Donnelly.

14.27 According to a journalist witness Mr A Corrigan told the crowd that the meeting had been called to show solidarity with the people of the Bogside and to help draw the police away from there. He praised the speech of Mr Lynch which had been broadcast at 9 pm that evening and condemned the earlier broadcast of Major Chichester-Clark.

14.28 The next speaker was Mr T Corrigan who lived in Fairmount Park. He urged his listeners to seal off the Catholic areas of the town as there were rumours of an impending attack. Earlier in the day Mr Corrigan had been approached by Fairmount Park residents and appointed chairman of a defence committee for the area.

14.29 The third speaker was a Mr Donnelly who did not live in Dungannon and does not appear to have been any sort of a public figure in the locality. He denounced the RUC as sectarian, as the other speakers had done, and called on the Catholic population to "go home and pray, then come out and stand up for your rights". This was a fighting speech in the revolutionary tradition, with Mr Donnelly quoting from the 1916 Proclamation of the Irish Republic.

14.30 When the meeting was brought to an end by a heavy downpour of rain the erection of barricades began (though almost certainly some were already in place). They were so disposed that most of the entrances to, and some road junctions within, the West Ward were sealed off*.

14.31 Because of the prospects of trouble on the night of the 13th, County Inspector Landale tried during the day to obtain police reinforcements for Dungannon as well as other towns in the county. Failing to obtain extra RUC personnel because of the continuing rioting in Londonderry, CI Landale arranged with the County Commandant of the USC for members of that force to be available for duty in the evening. Covering authority for such a request had been given to all County Inspectors by the Inspector-General on 14 July 1969.

14.32 During the evening CI Landale, who personally took charge of the Dungannon situation, had his force of 34 members of the RUC reduced by half when 17 of them were despatched in answer to a call for assistance from Coalisland. The first batch of 20 special constables reported to the police station at about 6 30 pm: another 20 or so reported later, a little after 11 pm.

*The location of these barricades is shown on the street plan of Dungannon.

14.33 Throughout the early part of the evening there was a steady build-up of Protestant crowds in the Market Square. Miss Beattie, a journalist, saw large numbers of cars parked in Castle Hill. Civilians, presumably Protestants, were grouped round these vehicles some of which had their boot lids open. Sgt Dodds, who was on duty with a small party of police in the square at about 9 pm, saw Catholics carrying planks, oil drums and other material from Union Lane into Irish Street where a barricade was being constructed. Some stones were exchanged. The County Inspector was informed that many of the roads into the town were now blocked by barricades.

14.34 At 11 55 pm the fire siren was sounded and shortly afterwards CI Landale learned that fires had been started in the western part of the town in the William Street/Georges Street area. Gathering together a party consisting of about half the USC men available and a small number of regular policemen, he made his way through the Market Square and via Scotch Street into William Street. At the end nearest William Street, the carriageway in Scotch Street was blocked by a barricade composed of a bus and other material. The bus was on fire. At the end of Savings Bank Street the offices of the Tyrone Courier, a local newspaper, were also burning.

14.35 The section leader of Dungannon Fire Brigade, Mr J Johnston, described how when his appliance arrived on the scene he saw a crowd of about 50 young men (none of whom he recognised as being from the area) on a building site at the Upper William Street/Savings Bank Street corner. Between this site and the corner of the Tyrone Courier building was a barricade, consisting largely of an old car which blocked the entrance to the Fairmount Park estate. Mr Johnston explained to the crowd of youths that it was his business to protect lives and property. In reply he was subjected to a bombardment of stones and bottles which knocked him to the ground and as a result of which he sustained two broken ribs. He and his men managed to extinguish a fire which was burning in the Courthouse at the Lower William Street/Georges Street corner as well as that in the bus barricade. Two more buses in Lower William Street/Ballygawley Road were then set on fire and dealt with by the firemen. From here they returned to Savings Bank Street/Lower William Street where a blaze had started in Stevenson's warehouse. As the firemen tackled this blaze they came under stone and petrol bomb attack from behind the barricade at the side of the Courier building. Mr Johnston then noticed that this building itself was ablaze as petrol bombs were being thrown into it from behind the barricade. Eventually, in the face of a heavy barrage of missiles, the firemen managed to train their hoses on the building. The fire in the Courier building proved the most serious of all the fires started in Dungannon that night*; it was not extinguished until 4 am.

14.36 Having left some of his party at Georges Street/Savings Bank Street to protect the firemen, CI Landale took the remainder up William Street towards Anne Street. But his progress was blocked by a barricade of burning vehicles and by stones and petrol bombs th[illegible]om behind it. Returning to Savings Bank Street he moved back a group of [illegible]otestant civilians in order to give police and firemen room to manoeuvre.

14.37 At this stage the County Inspector decided he would have to make a concerted attempt to clear Irish Street and Upper William Street. He returned to the RUC station where he explained his plan to SDC Johnston, Sergt Instructor Clarke and other members of the USC. The police force was to be split into two parties. One party, under CI Landale, would approach the Anne Street/Irish Street/William Street junction from the Square via Irish Street. The other party, composed entirely of special constables under SDC Johnston, was to take a longer route via Thomas Street, Quarry Lane and Donaghmore Road, thus entering Anne Street from the opposite end. CI Landale's evidence was that before setting off he told the men there was to be no shooting. Neither SDC Johnston nor Sergt Instructor Clarke heard this instruction, although both men testified that SDC Johnston had himself warned his party not to do anything hasty and, above all, not to shoot without his orders.

14.38 Most of the special constables who made up the two parties retained their firearms when they went on duty.† This was clearly contrary to the terms of two directives sent by the Inspector-General (dated 14 July and 21 July 1969), the effect of which was that arms were not to be carried by special constables on riot duty without the approval of RUC Headquarters (except in the case of officers or sergeants who were permitted to carry their revolvers). Instead, members of the USC would be issued with batons. CI Landale was aware of these instructions. He told the Tribunal that when he had paraded a number of special [illegible] in Omagh before coming to Dungannon he told them th[illegible]

CI Landale thought that there was some riot equipment for the USC available in Dungannon but he does not appear to have made any attempt to enforce the Inspector-General's order and disarm the special constables before taking them out on duty in the town.

14.39 CI Landale has been criticised for calling out the USC on riot duty after the Prime Minster in a speech broadcast at 6 pm that evening had announced that special constables would not be used for riot or crowd control. The Tribunal rejects this criticism. First, it is not clear whether the County

†But not all: S/Constable Hazelton gave evidence that before joining SDC Johnston's party he had deposited his rifle in the RUC station and equipped himself with baton, shield and helmet.

Inspector was aw[illegible]this limitation on the use of USC—the Inspector-General's directives of 14 July and 21 July clearly contemplated the use of special constables for crowd control. Secondly, and more important, it is the Tribunal's view that with only a small number of RUC to control the serious disturbances which had broken out in the town, CI Landale had no alternative to calling out the USC as the only reserve available to him. But having made this decision the County Inspector was wrong in failing to implement the Inspector-General's order that special constables on riot duty should carry truncheons instead of firearms.

14.40 The two parties under CI Landale and SDC Johnston set off. As the County Inspector led his party through the Square on his way to Irish Street he saw a large crowd of Protestants "who were getting very difficult to handle". He deputed a small number of regular and special constables from his party to remain in the Square to hold the Protestants back. Entering Irish Street the County Inspector and his party passed through an abandoned barricade and penetrated a second which had been built round the corner in Irish Street. Here they halted in order to give SDC Johnston's party time to complete their far longer journey which would bring them into the Donaghmore Road end of Anne Street.

14.41 To CI Landale's great surprise, however, this party emerged behind his own in Irish Street. SDC Johnston, who was a local man, was in no doubt that he had faithfully followed the County Inspector's directions which were to go to Irish Street via Thomas Street and Union Lane. It is not clear how this misunderstanding arose although CI Landale accepted that he may not have made his instructions clear.

[illegible]harge took him beyond the William Street junction and that although he did not see CI Landale he assumed that he remained with the party in Anne Street.

The Shooting in Donaghmore Road

14.43 It was shortly after the County Inspector's departure to William Street, while armed members of the USC were in Anne Street between Irish Street and Donaghmore Road, that three Catholic civilians were shot near the Anne Street end of Donaghmore Road. One of those injured was a Mr Gregory

*Not all of SDC Johnston's party took part in this charge. Sgt Instructor Clarke gave evidence that he with the assistance of Protestant civilians from the Square dismantled a barricade in Irish Street before moving into Anne Street. By the time he reached Anne Street the rioters had dispersed.

Willoughby. He told the Tribunal that during the evening he found himself trapped in Anne Street as all possible exits were either barricaded or rumoured to be guarded by USC. At the Irish Street junction a group of 20 to 25 youths began to throw stones and bottles at a party of armed USC who were confronting them. According to Mr Willoughby missiles were being returned by the USC. When the USC charged, the crowd fled; Mr Willoughby and some 15–20 others ran round the corner into Donaghmore Road stopping near the mouth of Charlemont Street. About 15 or 20 USC men lined up across the Donaghmore Road with their weapons on their shoulders. Some of the youths began to throw stones and bottles at the USC who returned them and then charged. Mr Willoughby turned to run and was shot in the leg. He managed to get up but was shot in the face. He and a Miss Anne Hughes, who had also been shot, were taken into No 1 Charlemont Street where they were attended by a priest and given first-aid treatment before being taken to hospital by ambulance.*

14.44 Other witnesses gave evidence which supported Mr Willoughby's account. Mr A McCourt, who was visiting No 1 Charlemont Street, described how at about 1 am he saw a line of uniformed men armed with rifles spread out across the Donaghmore Road. They were advancing towards Charlemont Street. Five or six young men appeared to be throwing stones at them. From inside No 1 he heard shots; he came out to find Miss Hughes lying injured on the footpath.†

14.45 Mrs Donaghy, who lived in Donaghmore Road not far from the Anne Street junction, saw about 12 civilians running into Donaghmore Road. Behind them were uniformed men whom she took to be special constables. Most of the USC stayed at the end of Donaghmore Road but about eight moved into the street. Jeers and insults were exchanged between the USC and civilians. Mrs Donaghy went into her house and heard shooting. Shortly afterwards she heard a voice calling the special constables back in the direction of Anne Street.

14.46 Shooting from the Donaghmore Road direction was heard by a number of witnesses but not, according to their own evidence, by SDC Johnston and Sgt Instructor Clarke. They told the Tribunal that neither of them got as far along Anne Street as the Donaghmore Road—although some other members of their party did. After the crowd had dispersed the two men entered the premises of George Smith at Anne Street/Donaghmore Road and extinguished a fire there. By about this time the County Inspector had returned to Anne Street/William Street where he learned that shots had been heard from the Donaghmore Road direction. He ordered the police to return to the station.

14.47 Sgt Macauley appears to have arrived on the scene after the charge led by CI Landale along Irish Street/Anne Street but before the police withdrawal. On his way down Irish Street Sgt Macauley had heard noises which sounded like gu... When he reached the Anne Street/Donaghmore Road junction he saw about 30 youths in the mouth of Donaghmore Road throwing missiles at a group of USC at the end of Anne Street. Sgt Macauley moved the special constables out of sight of the stone-throwers but, as the stone throwing continued he ordered six men with riot equipment, but without rifles, to charge: as a result the missile-throwers were scattered. At no time did Sgt Macauley see or hear any shooting; nor did he see any sign of anyone having been injured in Donaghmore Road.

14.48 As CI Landale was returning from Anne Street along Irish Street to the RUC station he met a Protestant crowd in ugly mood which had come from the Square.

"With great luck I got them turned and got them to follow me up into the Square. I shouted 'Back to the Square quick' and I ran towards them and to my amazement they turned and they followed me".

14.49 The County Inspector succeeded in keeping the Protestants contained in the Square but by this stage they were extremely angry, and when police brought Catholics who had been arrested through the Square on the way to the RUC station the prisoners were attacked by the Protestants. Apart from these attacks the Protestants played little part in the disturbances although, as we have seen, they were present in the Square in large numbers for much of the night. Mr McMullan, a Protestant from Moygashel, told the Tribunal that he went into Dungannon in response to a message which had been left with his wife that it was important to go into the town that night as there might be trouble and the town was liable to be burned down. Mr McMullan believed that the message came from Mr John Taylor, MP (NI) for South Tyrone.

The RUC investigation of the Donaghmore Road shooting

14.50 In the early hours of the morning of 14 August, CI Landale learned that two or three people had been shot. Later he detailed DI Cordner to investigate the whole matter with the assistance of Sgt Masterson and D/Constable Simpson. A number of statements were taken and a pro forma was drawn up for completion by members of the USC and RUC who had been on duty. The investigation proved inconclusive; the police officers concerned were not able to identify those responsible for the shooting. Some criticisms of the RUC's investigation were made before the Tribunal on the ground that it was not pursued with sufficient vigour. But this view ignores the very real difficulties which confronted the investigating officers. On the one hand they met with a complete denial of firing by all USC men on duty; on the other they were hampered by the unwillingness of some civilian witnesses to co-operate with them. A number of Catholic witnesses had made statements to a Mr P Duffy, Solicitor, but although he gave their names to D/Constable Simpson he was unwilling to pass the statements on to the police without their consent which, he said, had not been forthcoming. While this was a wholly legitimate position for Mr Duffy to take, he was clearly inhibited from affording greater assistance to the police investigation by the fact that he "was never satisfied at any time as to the impartiality of the police so far as the investigation was concerned".

14.51 It should be pointed out that it was clear to all concerned before the end of August 1969 that the Donaghmore Road shooting fell within the Tribunal's terms of reference. This must have reduced the momentum behind what had become a dauntingly difficult police inquiry.

The Tribunal's investigation of the Donaghmore Road shooting

14.52 Thus the matter of the shooting was still unresolved by the time the Tribunal heard evidence relating to it. No member of the RUC or USC made any report of having discharged his firearm, and in the subsequent investigation of the incident by the RUC all police officers, both regular and special, who had been on duty in the area that night denied using their guns. That there had been a considerable amount of shooting in the area was confirmed by the number of bullets and cartridge cases picked up in the Anne Street/Donaghmore Road area. Eighteen items were handed in to the Tribunal and subjected to ballistic examination. They included cartridges, cartridge cases and spent bullets which appear to have been made for or fired from at least three different types of weapon: ·303 rifle, sub-machine gun and ·455 revolver. All of these types of weapons were on issue to members of the USC on duty in Donaghmore Road/ Anne Street on 13/14 August. There is no evidence that any of these weapons was on issue to or in the hands of members of the RUC.

14.53 Because of the strong circumstantial evidence linking members of the Special Constabulary with the shooting the Tribunal arranged for ballistics experts to compare cartridge cases with the firearms recorded as having been on issue to USC men on duty in Dungannon. As a result of these tests 4 specific weapons were unequivocally connected with the ballistic material: two Sterling sub-machine guns (each of which had fired 3 9mm cartridge cases) a ·455 revolver (two ·455 cartridge cases) and a ·303 rifle (five ·303 cartridge cases).

14.54 Each of the four men to whom USC records indicated these weapons had been assigned on 13 August 1969 was called to give evidence. All were from the Kilnaslee USC platoon. It is not necessary to examine their testimony in detail. It is sufficient to say that while all four admitted to having been present in Anne Street/Donaghmore Road at the critical time, they all denied having fired their guns. None was prepared to accept that the weapon recorded as having been on issue to him was in his possession while he was on duty that night. S/Sgt Paisley told the Tribunal that it was his custom to exchange his issue ·455 revolver for another weapon at the beginning of the summer before the competition shooting season began. S/Constables Fleming and Moore said that the Sterlings they carried with them in Dungannon were not necessarily their own weapons since guns often got mixed up. S/Constable Hazelton denied that he had any weapon at all with him. He said that he exchanged his rifle for riot equipment (baton, shield, truncheon) in the Dungannon RUC Station before going on duty.

14.55 While evidence of laxity in some aspects of USC administration, as well as Sgt Instructor Clarke's evidence that men sometimes had in their possession weapons which were not their personal issue, lends some plausibility to these stories, the Tribunal is not prepared to accept that all four witnesses were telling the truth. That four men all from the same platoon and all of whom performed duty in the critical area should have been without their own guns when these weapons were certainly discharged in that area, puts an unbearable strain on the Tribunal's credulity.

14.56 But the extent to which any or all of these witnesses was telling the truth is irrelevant to the main conclusion to be drawn from this unhappy incident. This conclusion is that contrary to orders at least four members of the USC opened fire on an unarmed Catholic crowd, injuring three of them. Even though some of the civilians in the Catholic crowd may have been taunting the USC and throwing missiles there can be no justification for this shooting, which occurred at a time when there was no effective RUC leadership in Anne Street.

The case of John Arthurs

14.57 The Tribunal also investigated the circumstances of the arrest of Mr John Arthurs. It did so because of the continuing and strong local concern that the young man had been the subject of brutality and injustice at the hands of the police. On 1 December 1969 Mr Arthurs was convicted at County Tyrone Assizes of causing malicious damage to the Courier building on the night of 13 August. He received a sentence of three years imprisonment which was subsequently affirmed by the Court of Criminal Appeal.

14.58 Detailed examination of all the evidence relating to Mr Arthurs is unnecessary. It is sufficient to summarise the conflicting accounts given to the Tribunal. The case against Mr Arthurs rested largely on the testimony of a Constable Spiers who was among a number of USC and RUC men on duty in Saving Bank Street near the Courier building. On one occasion during the evening Constable Spiers approached the barricade at the side of the building and saw a man whom he recognised as Arthurs throw two petrol bombs, one of which went over the parapet of a lean-to-building at the side of the main building. Some time later in the evening, after the police had advanced across the barricade, Constable Spiers saw Arthurs being taken into custody by two Special Constables. Constable Spiers then took over custody of Arthurs himself, but before he could be taken to the station Arthurs was snatched from his possession by a Protestant crowd at William Street and George Street. This crowd, according to Constable Spiers, gave Arthurs such a severe beating that when he was released by them he appeared to be unconscious.

14.59 In his evidence both to the Tribunal and to the trial court Mr Arthurs denied having thrown a petrol bomb at any time during the evening. He admitted that he was present at the Courier barricade from about 10 00 pm until about 11 30 pm during which time he and a companion were acting as vigilantes. He moved away but returned later for a short time to find the Courier building on fire. Petrol bombs and stones were being thrown from behind the barricade. Mr Arthurs then left the barricade for the second time and went into Fairmount Park where he was arrested by two Special Constables. They did not hand him over to Constable Spiers nor was there a crowd at the William Street/George Street intersection. Mr Arthurs' evidence was that the beating he received came from the police and not from any civilian.

14.60 Evidence was taken from other witnesses some of whom tended to support Constable Spiers' evidence while others tended to support Mr Arthurs. Nothing came to light in evidence before the Tribunal which would justify a finding of police brutality. In so far as the conviction is concerned the Tribunal is not a court of appeal, and it would be improper, in the absence of fresh evidence, to substitute the Tribunal's opinion for that of the jury which unanimously convicted Mr Arthurs. He received a fair trial—neither he nor anyone on his behalf alleged otherwise—which passed the scrutiny of the Court of Criminal Appeal presided over by the then Lord Chief Justice of Northern Ireland, Lord MacDermott. A further appeal on a point of law was dismissed by the House of Lords.

14.61 It is one of the afflictions imposed on a society in which law and order have broken down, that some like Mr Arthurs are made amenable to justice while others who have committed equally or more serious offences go undetected and unpunished. Nevertheless the Tribunal agrees with the comment of the Lord Chief Justice that the crime of which Mr Arthurs was found guilty was "of a grave nature and cannot be tolerated in either settled or tumultuous times".

14.62 The morning and afternoon were quiet. At about 3 pm the Action Committee met to discuss the problem of the coming evening. At this meeting a decision was taken to hold a public meeting and Mr Austin Currie was invited to address it. The purpose of the meeting was to get across to the population of Coalisland the gravity of the situation and to persuade them to go home. The meeting was to be held in Main Street as far away as possible from that focus of trouble, the Police Station. A crowd of some three to four hundred assembled on a piece of open ground at the far end of Main Street and was addressed by 4 speakers—Mr Austin Currie MP (NI), Mr Aidan Corrigan, Mr Dennis Haughey and a Mr O'Donnell of Dungannon. The Tribunal has no doubt that these speakers did their best to quieten the crowd and to lower tension. Nevertheless the meeting was a failure. As soon as it was over the crowd drifted down Main Street in the direction of Market Square and the Police Station. Members of the Action Committee moved amongst the people attempting individually to persuade them to go home. They had no more success than the meeting had in tranquillising the population. To quote Mr Haughey "the whole situation had got completely out of hand. People were no longer amenable to reason. Emotion had taken over completely and there was a terribly high pitch of excitement". The members of the Committee gave up their attempt at pacification and the crowd took over. For the rest of the night the crowd was in ungovernable and violent mood.

14.63 The police were expecting trouble. At 7.30 pm DI Cordner arrived. He took immediate steps to secure the Police Station by closing doors and drawing the steel shutters across the windows. Police in the station were issued with riot equipment. Meantime two uniformed policemen were on patrol duty in the town. At about 9.30 the Market Square was practically deserted thanks to a heavy shower of rain. There was no indication of impending trouble save for a distant chant of "SS RUC" from the direction of the town. Suddenly there was a hammering on the outer door of the Police Station and in rushed the two patrol men. They reported they had been attacked in the town by petrol bombs. It was then observed from within the Station that a large crowd was approaching from the area of the Market Square. The vanguard of this crowd was already close to the Married Quarters of the Station. When DI Cordner came out to the gate he could see the crowd throwing stones and petrol bombs in the direction of the Married Quarters. As soon as he was seen, the missiles were directed at him. He ordered Police into the street and led a charge, the effect of which was that the rioters retreated back to the Square. They did not disperse and again moved against the Police Station. He estimated the numbers at this time to be about 200. Already the police were suffering casualties, one constable sustaining serious burns from a petrol bomb.

14.64 The police were outnumbered and forced slowly back towards the Station. Meanwhile reinforcements had been sought and it was not long before they arrived in two vehicles, an armoured car and a land rover. In the minutes that elapsed between the call for help and the arrival of the police vehicles the crowd mounted a heavy attack on the Station. Petrol bombs penetrated the windows of the Married Quarters and serious damage was done.

14.65 Reinforced by the 2 vehicles and some 6 constables, DI Cordner decided to make an attempt to remove the barricade on Platers Hill. A vehicle was despatched and it would appear succeeded in clearing Platers Hill. Unlike the previous night Platers Hill then remained clear for the rest of the night. When within an hour or so further reinforcements arrived from Dungannon, they were able to approach the Police Station down Platers Hill which was clear at the time. The reinforcements were a party of USC under the command of a Head Constable. They came in some 4 or 5 cars and were armed with revolvers, rifles and one Sterling sub-machine gun. They did not have riot gear.

14.66 DI Cordner appreciated that he was faced with a determined attack on the Police Station. The rioters appeared to have made their dispositions with some shrewdness. Barricades set up on the key streets in the town had the effect of isolating the Police Station from the outside world, except for one road leading to Dungannon which it was difficult for the rioters to reach. The barricades, the position of which can be seen on the map at Appendix VIII (G), served also as a refuge for the rioters if forced by a Police charge to retreat. The rioting crowd assembled within the area of the town marked out by the barriers. The District Inspector sent one small party of police under a Head Constable to the Stewartstown Road and another under a Sergeant up Platers Hill. The purpose of these moves was to watch the movement of the crowds at the opposite ends of the town. The remainder of his force which consisted of RUC and USC were concentrated in and about the Station. The RUC were placed between the rioters and the USC, the object being to ensure so far as possible no direct contact between the rioting crowd and the USC. The RUC were in riot gear, the USC were not but they had their guns.

14.67 The mob now moved slowly towa[illegible] Station. In the forefront there was a large mechanical shovel; its headlights were lit and, as it moved forward, the crowd threw petrol bombs in the direction of the police and the Station. Petrol bombs came not only from either side of the advancing mechanical shovel but also over the top of it.

14.68 The District Inspector's plan was to use his men and vehicles in a series of charges to force the rioters back to the Square and then to retreat to the Station where he would await any further attack and, if necessary, repeat the process. In other words he was simply concerned to keep the rioters as far away from the Station as he could. He told the Tribunal and the Tribunal accepts his evidence that he had no intention of ordering his men to fire. Indeed he took the view that although the situation was serious it was not so critical as to justify the use of firearms. Nevertheless without any instructions from him there were shots fired from the USC in the rear of the police. Although a weapons inspection after the event revealed only 4 weapons that could be seen to have been fired, the Tribunal accepts the evidence of the District Inspector that there was one volley of about 12 shots fired by the USC and that a majority of the shots fired were discharged from rifles.

14.69 DI Cordner ordered an immediate cease fire and then proceeded to put into operation his plan for dispersing the crowd. One of his armoured cars moved forward in the direction of the Square while the land rover came in round the back of the rioting mob in an attempt to scatter it. The manoeuvre was successful, the rioters were scattered and the mechanical shovel captured. The shovel was brought into the yard of the Police Station. This operation ended the riot for the night. The crowd withdrew behind the barricades in the Brackaville and Stewartstown Roads from which places of comparative safety they continued to hurl petrol bombs and abuse in the general direction of the police. The District Inspector refused however to commit his police and slowly the rioting fervour of the crowds diminished.

14.70 The volley of shots discharged by the USC caused some injury to rioters and damage to property. The District Inspector thought at the time that the shots had been fired into the air but the evidence is compelling that at least some fire was directed in the general direction of the crowd and at the mechanical shovel. The personal injuries and physical damage sustained admit of no other conclusion. Somewhat later at about 1 40 am Mr Currie MP (NI) made a formal protest concerning the casualties arising from the gun fire and a police investigation into the discharge of firearms was put into operation at once.

The cause of the rioting

14.71 The rioting in Coalisland on the nights of 12 and 13 August arose as a result of the anger felt by the people of Coalisland on hearing the news of the disturbances in Dungannon and later in Londonderry. The effect of this news upon the crowd was to make them quite uncontrollable even by their own leaders. As Mr Haughey commented they were no longer amenable to reason. Their spleen was directed exclusively against the police; there was no sectarian trouble of any sort: indeed, there were no Protestants to be found in the area of the ri[illegible]lthough there is no indication in the evidence of any very elaborate planning, the riots were undoubtedly organised. The siting of the barricades on 12 August and their maintenance in position throughout the night of the 13th indicated that the rioters had a plan for disrupting communications between the police station and the outside world and for providing a retreat for their own forces. The way in which the riot moved between the Square and Platers Hill on the night of 12 August constitutes further evidence of organisation. It would, however, be inferring too much in these events to find that there was any prior planning; the riots were organised no doubt within a few hours.

The conduct of the police

14.72 In the opinion of the Tribunal the conduct of the police on these two nights of rioting cannot be criticised, save in one respect. Faced with a very serious situation, the RUC used no more force than was necessary to contain and suppress the riot. The one feature of police action which calls for consideration is the discharge of firearms by members of the USC. DI Cordner plainly considered the firing was unjustified. It was a pity, therefore, that he disregarded existing police instructions and failed to disarm the USC before using them for riot control. Nevertheless, he was in a very difficult situation and the volley undoubtedly relieved the pressure on the station. Certainly he never ordered or authorised them to fire; and he ordered a ceasefire at once. In assessing the conduct of the USC it has to be borne in mind that the USC were untrained and unequipped to handle a riot situation. They were also faced with what looked like a very threatening crowd advancing towards them and already at close quarters. They may not have appreciated either that the District Inspector had a plan or that they should have governed their conduct according to his orders. It is understandable that in what must have appeared to be a very ugly emergency they had resort to the only weapon with which they were equipped, namely, their guns. Nevertheless, the action was unjustifiable and might well have resulted in much more serious casualties than were in fact inflicted.

14.73 Some criticism was directed as to the thoroughness of the police investigation into the discharge of firearms on this occasion. The Tribunal has, however, no fault to find with the way in which the Police attempted to establish the extent to which firearms had been used on this night and the identity of those who used them.

CHAPTER 15—NEWRY

15.1 Newry is a town of 12,500 inhabitants. It is in South Down. It is inhabited largely by Catholics, but there is a Protestant population of about 2,000.*

12 August

15.2 On the evening of 12 August the Newry contingent of the Apprentice Boys returned from Londonderry to a town already alive with tension and excitement arising from the news of the riots in that city. At 9 pm a car had toured the housing estates calling on the citizens to assemble in Margaret

*Street plan is at Appendix VIII (I).

Square for a meeting organised by the [illegible]and District Civil Rights Association. At 9 30 pm some 200 people assembled in Margaret Square and then marched to the police station in Corry's Square, where the Chairman of the District Civil Rights Association, Mr Dowling, addressed them.* The purpose of the meeting was to protest against "police brutality" in Londonderry.

15.3 The meeting posed a serious problem for the police. The returning Apprentice Boys were in Railway Avenue just behind the police station and waiting to make their annual march through the town to Trevor Hill. The risk of serious disturbance should the returning Apprentice Boys and the protesting civil righters come face to face was clear to DI Edgar, the senior police officer present in the town. Mr Dowling and others were allowed to enter the police station and make their protest. The DI persuaded Mr Dowling and his colleagues to lead their followers away in the direction of the Dublin Road, thereby enabling the Apprentice Boys to march to Trevor Hill and Downshire Road, where they dispersed. The only incidents of violence that night occurred after the civil rights crowd had left the police station. They were of minor significance and the crowd soon dispersed. Thanks to the skill and tact of the District Inspector and the co-operation of Mr Dowling and his colleagues the night of the 12th passed without any serious trouble.

15.4 The day of the 13th was one of mounting tension. Mr Dowling received a telephone call from the central executive of NICRA asking for street demonstrations to divert police effort away from the Bogside. He and his colleagues, one of whom was Mr O'Hanlon MP (NI) for South Armagh, spent a substantial part of the day in St Colman's Hall, Castle Street, discussing their plans. Some of them, including Mr O'Hanlon, went across the border to enlist support in Dundalk. All of them were in a state of high excitement and the Tribunal has no doubt that at the meeting in Dundalk an appeal was made for supporters to come to Newry to help in the demonstrations planned for that evening. The response did not prove to be very great, but some, including no doubt some members of the IRA, did come and those who came were active in helping to build and man the barricades which went up in Newry that night.

15.5 At about 8 30 pm the civil rights demonstration assembled in Castle Street. They marched to the RUC Station, where Mr O'Hanlon and Mr Hugh Mallon addressed the crowd. Mr Dowling left the march before it reached the police station. The Tribunal finds as a fact that he did so to assist in the building of barricades. Whether or not Mr O'Hanlon or Mr Hugh Mallon had any knowledge of a plan to build barricades, it is certain that some activists in the civil rights movement intended that night to erect barricades. Mr Dowling was one of these activists.

15.6 Having heard Mr Dowling, Mr O'Hanlon and Mr Mallon, the Tribunal finds that the demonstration outside the police station followed by the manning

*Mr Dowling features prominently in the Newry story. Born in Dublin, he came to Newry in 1953, where he practised as a quantity surveyor. He became interested in the Civil Rights movement in October 1968, joined the District Association in January 1969, becoming Chairman later in the year.

of the barricades [illegible]nned. There is, however, no evidence to support a finding that the e[illegible] hooliganism which manifested itself in widespread damage to property by roving bands of agitators was any part of the plan.

15.7 As one would expect the direct evidence of a plan is not complete. Mr O'Hanlon declared he knew of none. Mr Dowling admitted that there was in existence a contingency plan formulated within the Civil Rights Association for dividing Newry up into 6 areas each under a chief steward. A situation, he said, might arise "where there would be an attempted pogrom and a situation was visualised whereby the civil rights stewards could function to maintain law and order, or certainly basic amenities in their own streets". He was less definite about barricades, but his answers left the Tribunal in no doubt that the setting up of barricades was envisaged as part of the plan.

15.8 These plans and discussions were the work of an activist group within the Civil Rights Association, the existence of which was known to the police by June 1969 and was mentioned in the public statement of the 5 Committee members who subsequently—in shock at the events of 13/14 August—resigned from the District Committee. The Tribunal finds that this group (variously described as an Action or a Defence Committee) was in existence prior to August 1969, had formulated some contingency plans for a Civil Rights take-over of Newry, and played a leading part in the events of 13/14 August. Its effectiveness was shattered by a combination of events—skilful police tactics, the absence of any substantial support among the citizens of Newry, and the sense of shock throughout the town when on the morning of the 14th it was possible to survey the damage done during the hours of darkness.

15.9 Outside the police station the crowd was noisy and violent, attacking the station with missiles of various sorts. Mr O'Hanlon did his best to control them: but he was in a familiar dilemma. He wished to impress the police with the threat of the local situation while ensuring that the threat did not materialise. As soon as word came through that the barricades were in being, he and others led the crowd away, towards the barricades. The barricades were formidable, and skilfully sited. Heavy lorries had been seized, and placed, with their loads, across streets which commanded the approaches to the Dublin Road. They effectively sealed off the west and south of the town from the north and east. The police could not make their way through the town to the Border without passing one or more of the barricades: thus, the demonstrators had their communications with the South protected by the barricades.

15.10 It is by no means certain that these strategic factors were present to the minds of the mass of the demonstrators, though they were well appreciated by a few. The barricades, with the demonstrations outside the police station, were intended to commit the police to the local situation, thereby preventing the reinforcement of police strength in Londonderry—the process known as "taking the heat off the Bogside". But the police did not allow themselves to become committed. DI Edgar appreciated that, if he attempted to reduce the barricades, his small outnumbered force might suffer a disastrous reverse. He therefore decided to keep the police in their station. A consequence of this decision was that the police were unable to [illegible] hooligans, some on foot, some in commandeered vehicles, from roaming f[illegible]d the town, setting fire to, and smashing up property. Buildings that suffered included the Electricity Board Offices, the Government Training Centre, the Ulsterbus Office, and the Post Office as well as many commercial and business premises. The damage was widespread. At least £20 000 is the measure sustained by private property alone. The extent of the damage to public property was also substantial.

15.11 These hooligans came from the criminal element to be found among the demonstrators. They were, no doubt, only a tiny minority: but they were determined to commit the police to action, if they could. It is known from Mr Dowling's evidence that during the day of the 13th some hot heads had called for widespread burnings: and all were concerned at the lack of any effective action to involve the police on the previous night. It was suggested that some of this damage was done by Protestant mobs. But there were few Protestants on the streets that night and the only damage which can be attributed to them was the breaking of some windows.

15.12 After midnight the crowd behind the barricades, which was never more than 1,000 in all and, for most of the time, much less, began to thin. By 1 15 am only a few militants remained on the streets: but they had available by the barricades stocks of petrol bombs got together by theft of bottles from a creamery and petrol from a petrol station. When morning came, DI Edgar decided to use his force of police in an attempt to over-run the barricades. Though assailed by petrol bombs and other missiles, the police were successful and the small numbers still at the barricades fled.

15.13 As the rioters fled, two lorries crowded with men were seen moving off down the road near the Albert Basin leading to the Border and Omeath. There can be no doubt that the two lorry parties included some of those who had early in the day crossed the border in response to Mr O'Hanlon's appeal The Tribunal finds that Mr Dowling jumped on one of the lorries and so escaped across the border to Omeath. At about 8 30 am the British Customs Post on the Omeath Road was found severely damaged by fire. Its clock had stopped at 7: there were crates of petrol bombs in the vicinity: and a Colt automatic pistol was found in the debris. Police enquiries elicited the information that, while the building was being saturated with petrol, it ignited prematurely causing a number of men very extensive burns. Seven persons were treated for burn injuries in Dundalk. Later in the day two vehicles, the property of a Newry coal and timber merchant, were found abandoned in Omeath. The Tribunal finds that the Customs Post was set on fire by men who had been rioting in Newry and were making their escape across the border. Mr Dowling must have witnessed the attack; but there is no evidence that he participated in it. The incident illustrates the willingness of some of those who manned the barricades that night to resort to senseless violence.

15.14 The day of the 14th was quiet, but the police expected further trouble at night: there was now a real risk of angry Protestants coming on the streets, an event which c[illegible]d to serious sectarian riots. At this stage it is to be doubted whether the [illegible]lice appreciated the measure of their success on the previous night. At about 7 pm USC personnel, answering the broadcast call-up, began to report for duty. In accordance with standing instructions the police ensured that special constables, if required that night for duty in the town, would be instructed to leave their rifles in the station; they were to be issued with shields, helmets and batons as they became available.*

15.15 Thus by the time rioting began on the evening of the 14th, police numbers were reinforced substantially by USC personnel. At about 9 45 pm a crowd assembled in Marcus Square: DI Edgar immediately sent out a combined force of RUC and USC, at least one hundred strong. As the police had feared, there was also a Protestant crowd abroad—some 60 to 80 persons in the Trevor Hill/Kildare Street area. The USC were detailed to hold them back, while the RUC proceeded to Marcus Square. The police party, preceded by a Shorland and a Land-Rover, came under petrol bomb attack as they approached the barricade: but the crowd behind it soon fled south along Hill Street. Leaving a party to dismantle the barricade, the police, who were under sporadic attack from missiles hurled by a few youths, moved against a barricade in Buttercrane Quay, where they were joined by the USC who had had no trouble in restraining and dispersing the Protestant crowd in Trevor Hill. Having dismantled that barricade they then turned their attention to one in Francis Street, where the opposition was fiercer, petrol bombs being used quite heavily. But the crowd soon scattered up Kiln Street. In the course of these operations, Mr O'Hanlon presented himself and offered to do what he could to persuade those behind the barricades to go home. There was no immediately apparent effect from this intervention: but when the police reached the most southerly of the barricades, one across the Dublin Road, Mr O'Hanlon appeared again and asked the DI if he would allow the crowd behind the barricade to pass through the police lines and disperse to their homes. The police agreed: and about 120 people emerged from behind the barricade and dispersed. This was not, however the end of the night's rioting. A barricade of burning vehicles had been thrown up across Dominick Street near its junction with Francis Street. As the police moved up and down Dominick Street, they were subjected to petrol bomb attack: but again resistance proved to be more apparent than real, and the barricade was soon over-run. Sporadic fires occurred at various places in the town, notably at the Crown Building: the police were never wholly free from missile and petrol bomb attack: but the police felt themselves well in control of the situation. By 4 am on the 15th all was quiet.

15.16 During the day of the 15th a rumour spread that the B specials and the police were going to attack the housing estates that night. Indeed, in the Derrybeg Estate, men were going around encouraging families to evacuate their houses. It was hardly surprising, therefore, that in the evening a crowd assembled and a barricade was thrown across Kiln Street, the natural access from the town to some of the housing estates. Mr Keogh, Stormont MP for South Down, approached the DI and suggested that he talk to the people behind the barricade in Kiln Street. He did so in the presence of Mr Keogh and a priest, Father O'Hare. The result was a friendly agreement to dismantle the barricade and go home. The barricade, which consisted of one undamaged CIE bus, was removed to the police station and later returned to its owners.

15.17 DI Edgar's comment, made in his evidence to the Tribunal, sums up the events of 14 and 15 August:—

> "I would say that the 14th/15th, the night when we dismantled the barricades, the leaders were absent. They all fled to Omeath that morning . . . There was nobody to organise them and secondly I would say the vast majority of the people of Newry do not want this type of trouble".

It is clear that, had a substantial proportion of the people supported the rioting, there were men present in Newry on the 13th/14th who were ready to organise a resistance which could well have proved beyond the power of the police to reduce. But the people did not wish it; and the wild men retreated across the border. Newry had regained its balance by 16 August.

CHAPTER 16—DUNGIVEN

The attacks on the police station

16.1 Following the disturbances in Dungiven in mid July the town remained quiet until the night of 13 August. It appears that on the evening of the 13th there was a meeting of the Action Committee. There is no evidence as to what was said, but at 10 20 pm the RUC station was attacked with stones, petrol bombs, and other missiles. There was no provocation whatever. Whether or not it was so intended, the attack constituted a particular threat to the married quarters, where a Constable Miller lived. DI Harrison ordered the use of firearms. HC Irwin and two other policeman first fired five shots each into the air from an entry beside the police station. This had no effect. They then lined up, and fired a volley (3 shots each) into the air. At about the same time Constable Miller and a special constable also fired a few rounds—it is not known whether into the air or the crowd.

16.2 It appears that these shots coincided with efforts by Fr Doherty to stop the rioters. It was Fr Doherty's evidence that about 50 people were directly involved and that as they moved away further shots were fired: these may have been the shots fired by Constable Miller and the special constable.

16.3 With the possible exception of a Mr John Brolly, no one was injured by this police fire. Mr Brolly has made no claim for compensation: neither did he give evidence. But he is said to have declared that a man with a helmet and black overcoat fired a machine gun in his direction from the mouth of the entry. There was no automatic weapon in the station and the bullet which wounded him was ·38 calibre and probably fired from a revolver. A ballistics check was carried out on the guns of policemen who admitted to firing, and on other weapons, but no link could be established.

16.4 There can be no doubt that the police were fully justified in firing into the air. It is not established that they fired into the crowd: but, if any did (and some one, though not necessarily a policeman, did shoot into the crowd, as Mr Brolly's injury shows), it was in the circumstances excusable, when one bears in mind the dangerous attack being mounted on the station and its married quarters.

16.5 The crowd now moved up the street although about half an hour later there was another attack with petrol bombs on the police station. This was much shorter than the first attack.

The destruction of the Orange Hall and Courthouse

16.6 The Orange Hall and courthouse were set on fire by the crowd. There had already been a minor fire at the Bus Depot. The courthouse fire cut off electricity supplies throughout the town. The Fire Authority headquarters in Londonderry was contacted. At 12 06 am on 14 August the Fire Authority found they could not operate the remotely controlled siren in Dungiven because of a power failure. The RUC operated the hand siren from the police station yard, but without response from the Dungiven crew. At 12 20 am, after a call from the Fire Authority, the Maghera major pump left for the town. On arrival they turned into the Garvagh Road, thereby complying with the standing instruction not to endanger their lives or the appliance in times of civil disturbance. With no one to control the fire, the Orange Hall, the courthouse and some other property were gutted, leaving only the outer shell.

The shooting in Main Street

16.7 By 1 am there were 20/25 police at Garvagh Road. When relief parties arrived from Coleraine and Limavady they had joined parties of Dungiven police on mobile patrol. At this stage there is a conflict of evidence. Mr McFaul, one of the Maghera fire crew, said he and a group of some 50 people walked down Main Street to see what was happening. He thought the group included some police, and also two men, who left it in order to fire some shots down the street. He saw these two men, one of them in a long coat, fire two shots from a single-shot weapon, and a short burst from an automatic weapon. On the other hand Sgt O'Hare, who was with the police at Garvagh Road, did not see such a group nor could he identify any shots, although he heard noises that could have been shots.

16.8 There is no doubt that a Mr Doherty was injured by gunfire. Also a 9 mm bullet was found in the bedroom of a Mr McDermott: and Mr Ivan Cooper alleged that on 14 August he had been given 120/130 spent cartridges which had been found near the Castle ballroom.

16.9 It appears that in the small hours of 14 August there was a suggestion that the USC should assist the Fire Brigade in putting out fires. This was discussed by District Inspector Harrison and the USC County Adjutant, but the Fire Brigade had left Dungiven before this could take place. In fact the appliance returned to Maghera, reaching there at about 1 30 am. It was District Inspector Harrison's belief that there were no USC in that part of town where the shots were fired.

16.10 While it is clear that some shots were fired in Main Street in the early hours of the morning, it has not proved possible to identify who was doing the shooting, save that the shots were discharged by members of a Protestant crowd.

16.11 The final episode in the Dungiven disturbances occurred on 15 August. This was the date when the Ancient Order of Hibernians had arranged their procession. However, the Minister's ban was now in effect. District Inspector Harrison and Head Constable Irwin spoke to the leaders, who said it had been decided that the procession would proceed. There was some danger of violence against the two policemen, and they were escorted to safety by some Hibernian leaders, together with Mr Cooper and Fr Doherty. The procession took place without incident. Later three people were prosecuted in connection with organising it.

Dungiven: General

16.12 The Dungiven riots during the summer of 1969 were Catholic. The police handled them well: the local leaders, Catholic and Protestant, did what they could—and did prevent violent conflicts developing between factions. Apart from one undisciplined intervention on the night of 13/14 July the USC did little. And, with the exception of the incident in the early hours of 14 August, the Protestants did not participate in the disturbances.

16.13 There has been criticism of the police for their alleged failure in Dungiven to prosecute Protestant offenders. This has been contrasted with a willingness to prosecute Catholics. The Tribunal rejects the criticism: nevertheless in its opinion, the decision (which appears to have been referred by the police to higher authority) not to prosecute Mr King for unlawfully possessing a sub-machine gun on 13 July was unwise, although no doubt taken after a full consideration of all the facts. It would have been better if the extenuating circumstances which influenced the decision had been made clear in a court of law.

CHAPTER 17—ARDOYNE AND CRUMLIN ROAD

17.1 Between 5 August and Wednesday, 13 August, there had been no disturbances in the Disraeli Street/Hooker Street area of the Crumlin Road. On the 13th the Ardoyne had its share of disturbance. There is no direct evidence of a link with the Falls riots that evening, although it is to be noted that the white Cortina which gave notice of a meeting at Divis Flats was owned by a man living in the Ardoyne.

17.2 The evening of 13 August was quiet up until 10 30 pm. The only police on duty were a sergeant and 7 constables who were positioned at the junctions of Crumlin Road with Disraeli Street and the neighbouring streets on the south side. There were no crowds in either Disraeli Street or Hooker Street.

17.3 Quite without warning (shortly after 10 30 pm) a group of youths appeared in Hooker Street and attacked with stones and petrol bombs the 2 or 3 policemen who were on duty on the opposite side of the Crumlin Road. The noise of the attack aroused the attention of some of the residents of Disraeli Street who rushed to the aid of the police. Others ran across the Crumlin Road into the mouth of Hooker Street and returned missiles into that street.

17.4 Within minutes police reinforcements arrived. By this time crowds had formed in the mouths of Disraeli Street (100) and Hooker Street (150–175). The police lined up in the middle of the Crumlin Road and stones and petrol bombs were thrown at them from Hooker Street. While some police were deputed to restrain the Disraeli Street crowd, the remainder, led by HC Wallace, mounted a baton charge against the Hooker Street crowd.

17.5 Armoured vehicles preceded foot police down Hooker Street and succeeded in penetrating a barricade at the junction with Butler Street. At this point the police were bombarded with missiles from the higher ground at the Butler Street/Herbert Street junction. Eventually the police succeeded in forcing the crowd into the section of Herbert Street to the north of Butler Street. The police were unable to advance any further because of the severity of the missile attack; nor were they able to approach the rioters from the rear with vehicles because of the presence of barricades in Jamaica Street and Brompton Park.

17.6 In order to avoid being cut off from the rear, the police withdrew to Hooker Street/Chatham Street but were pursued by the rioters. Again they baton-charged down Hooker Street and again the crowd was forced into Herbert Street, near the entrance to Brompton Park. From here they attacked the police with stones, petrol bombs and a number of improvised explosive devices made from six-inch pieces of copper tubing. Having staved off an attack on their right flank from the Flax Street direction, the police ultimately succeeded in putting vehicles into Brompton Park and the rioters were dispersed.

17.7 During the time when the police were engaging rioters within the Ardoyne area, an angry and noisy Protestant crowd had built up on the Disraeli Street side of the Crumlin Road. The Tribunal has no doubt that Mr McKeague was on this night, as on others, active in the area. It was his practice to move about the streets wearing a helmet and carrying a stick. His object, so he said, was to organise the residents "to make sure that there was no infiltration of any Republican elements into these streets". Various witnesses spoke of strangers entering the streets and participating in the disturbances. Undoubtedly Mr McKeague and his associates of the SDA must have attracted a number of turbulent characters to the south side of the Crumlin Road. Nevertheless on this evening the Protestants were restrained by police officers and clergymen and it seems that at no time did any of them get beyond the mouth of Hooker Street. Earlier in the evening some Protestants had collected bin-lids and supplied them to the police officers who were not equipped with shields.

17.8 In the early hours of the morning of 14 August, the Rosebank public house and Graham's betting shop, [illegible] were on opposite sides of Disraeli Street at the Crumlin Road junction were set on fire. The Tribunal has no direct evidence as to who caused the two fires; but a number of factors support the inference, which we draw, that some elements in the Protestant crowd were responsible. The premises were in Catholic ownership on the Protestant side of the road, and in the earlier disturbances had been attacked (Rosebank public house, 4 August): the crowd was in ugly mood, well within range, and received with hostility the fire appliance when it arrived.

17.9 We find that the events of the night of the 13th in the Ardoyne began with an attack by Catholic elements on policemen at the junction of Crumlin Road/Disraeli Street for which there was no provocation. Father Marcellus Gillespie told the Tribunal that he learned that evening that the object of the attack was to occupy the attention of the police in the hope of drawing their forces away from the Bogside in Londonderry. He had heard a rumour that two men who had been fighting in Derry had come to the area suggesting this course of action, but he was unable to find anyone who had actually seen them. Father Gillespie agreed that those engaging in riotous behaviour this night in the Ardoyne area were not motivated by a desire to defend the area. He also said in evidence that "the people who were engaged on the Wednesday were generally the ones who would find themselves engaged against the police".

17.10 We have noted two features of the night's disturbances, as typical of so much that troubled the Province in August. First, the riot was started by a few Catholics without warning and after a period of peace: undoubtedly their objective was to involve the police and so prevent reinforcements going to Londonderry. The second feature is the Protestant reaction. The Catholic tactic of stretching the police brought the Protestants on to the streets with the inevitable consequence of serious rioting. In August this riot cycle led to death, injury, fire and destruction with their accompaniment of communal relations inevitably embittered, personal hatreds engendered, and human misery intensified.

CHAPTER 18—WEST BELFAST

Introduction

18.1 One of the most distinctive features of the social geography of Belfast is a large area of Catholic occupied housing beginning at the very centre of the city and widening out towards the west. This district, which is often described as the Falls Road area, lies to the south of a large area of Protestant territory centred on the Shankill Road. The notional but fairly well defined line running roughly east-west which marks the boundary between the two communities is sometimes referred to as the "Orange-Green line". It was in the vicinity of this line that serious disturbances took place during mid-August 1969.*

18.2 [illegible] to the north of the [illegible] road, known as Falls Road west of Northumberland Street and as Divis [illegible] between Northumberland Street and the city centre. The vast majority of the Catholics in the area live south of the main road. The relatively small number of Catholics living immediately to the north of Falls Road/Divis Street are divided by a mill and factory area which extends from Conway Street to Percy Street. East of this divide the Catholic occupied area included the southern ends of Percy Street and Dover Street and the whole of Beverley Street and Ardmoulin Avenue. West of this divide the Catholic area included the southern end of Conway Street and Clonard, enclosed by Cupar Street, Falls Road and Springfield Road. It was in these two areas north of Falls Road/Divis Street, as well as on the main road itself, that violence took place on 13, 14 and 15 August 1969.

18.3 For the convenience of hearing evidence, the Tribunal subdivided this area into "Divis Street/Lower Falls Road", which included events taking place on the main road as well as in Percy Street, Dover Street, Cupar Street, Conway Street and neighbouring streets, and "Clonard". Although this distinction is geographically arbitrary (Conway Street and Cupar Street can be regarded as part of the Clonard area) it is convenient in terms of the pattern and timing of events. The most serious trouble in Divis Street/Lower Falls Road took place on Wednesday 13 and Thursday, 14 August; major disturbance in Clonard took place on the following day, Friday 15.

18.4 The whole area with which the Tribunal was concerned is predominantly working class. With the exception of a series of modern Catholic occupied blocks of flats and maisonettes on the south side of Divis Street, housing is poor by the standards of today*.

18.5 Both the Clonard and Divis Street/Lower Falls areas were included in city police district B. In July and August 1969 the headquarters of B district were at Hastings Street RUC Station. There were two other police stations in the district: at Springfield Road and at Andersonstown. At that time the district inspector in charge of B district was Mr Lagan. DI Lagan was however on leave in July 1969 and absent on sick leave until 14 August. In his absence the senior head constable, a Mr Stinson, was in charge of the district.

18.6 For some time before the period with which the Tribunal was directly concerned it appears that relations between the RUC and at least some sections of the Catholic population of B district were less than satisfactory. This may be illustrated in relation to one area within the district by an event which took place in 1968 and its consequences. In July of that year a hand grenade was thrown at a police vehicle summoned to Cyprus Street by a bogus 999 call. The police authorities then found it necessary to devise a special procedure for dealing with 999 calls from this area [illegible]alls made between 10 p[illegible] 6 am were not to be investigated by foot po[illegible]emen (except on the per[illegible] of the area where their escape route was unimpeded) but by two patrol[illegible] approaching by different routes and arriving at different times. The [illegible] bounded by Falls Road, Grosvenor Road, Albert Street and Cullingtree [illegible] which included all the streets to which this procedure applied was code[illegible] by the police—somewhat misleadingly—Nogoland*. It appears also to [illegible] been the practice that police foot patrols did not go into the centre of No[illegible] in the late evening or early morning†.

*A report entitled "People and Their Homes" was published in 1967. It was prepared by Building Design Partnership, and dealt with conditions in Belfast redevelopment areas. Some of the material related to the area north of Falls Road, where the main rioting occurred in 1969. It is shown, for example, that houses there were grossly deficient in inside WCs, fixed baths, hand basins and hot water supply.

July–12 August

18.7 Before examining in detail the events of 13, 14 and 15 Augu[illegible] necessary to consider briefly the situation in west Belfast during July [illegible] early part of August. The month of July was relatively peaceful in th[illegible] of the City. In the period up to 11 July there were a number of minor in[illegible] involving the unauthorised removal of Union flags and bunting o[illegible] display but they amounted to nothing more serious than would be [illegible] in any other year. The nights of 11 and 12 July passed off without [illegible] trouble and although there were some incidents of a sectarian nature [illegible] the remainder of that month, none was especially significant.

18.8 On 5 August at about 4 30 am a car was burned out against th[illegible] of the motor car showroom of Messrs Isaac Agnew at the junction of O[illegible] Street and the Falls Road. On responding to a call from the same prem[illegible] the following night the police found that 2 large plate glass windows ha[illegible] broken and slight damage to the inside of the building had been caus[illegible] petrol bomb. Although this building was Protestant-owned, the re[illegible] its attracting such vandalism seems not to have been sectarian, but [illegible] that it was the most elaborate and modern in the Falls Road, with lar[illegible] glass windows, displaying a valuable stock of motor cars.

18.9 Three days later, on 9 August, 4 or 5 youths were seen th[illegible] stones in the direction of Hastings Street police station. One youth, a [illegible] at Queen's University, was detained and found to have in his posse[illegible] pamphlet entitled "How to discredit the police force".

18.10 On the morning of 12 August contingents from Shankill R[illegible] Sandy Row travelled to Londonderry for the Apprentice Boys parade, re[illegible] in the evening. During these movements the Orange-Green border was [illegible] by what was then regarded as a substantial contingent of RUC (20-2[illegible] there was no disturbance of any kind. Later on in the evening of 12th [illegible] numbering about 100 gathered opposite the new RUC station in S[illegible] Road. Some were armed with hurling sticks. The crowd dispersed wi[illegible] direct action on the part of the police.

*The Deputy Commissioner, Mr Bradley, had not heard this term applied to areas of [illegible] prior to the deployment of the army on 15 August 1969.

†However, despite these limitations on the freedom of action of the RUC, DI Lagan des[illegible] police/public relations in B district as "quite good". We believe that, for the wor[illegible] of motives DI Lagan was painting too favourable a picture: the anti-police demonst[illegible] in April 1969, in which DI Lagan himself was savagely beaten up, illustrates the truth, [illegible] relations were not good.

[illegible]11. In the ea[illegible]rs of the morning of Wednesday 13th, petrol bombs [illegible]hrown into the [illegible] of Detective Sgt McBryan in the Andersonstown area. [illegible]cBryan was involved in a well known criminal investigation in 1966 [illegible]had led to a successful prosecution for murder. At around the same time [illegible] bombs were thrown at police foot patrols in Springfield Road by two [illegible], possibly one Catholic and one Protestant.

[illegible]12 It will be noted that during the period from 1 July to mid-August [illegible]was very little advance indication of the trouble which was to erupt [illegible]3 and 14 August. Although there was intimidation, primarily of Catholics, [illegible]ring in other parts of the city during this period, the evidence, statistical and [illegible]rwise, given to the Tribunal suggests there was little or none in police district [illegible]July or in the first 12 days of August. Indeed, HC Stinson said that up to [illegible]gust he had had no experience in the district of "actual and real [illegible]idation". He was, however, aware of rumours going round.

[illegible]13 On Wednesday, 13 August, police and residents of the Bogside, [illegible]nderry were confronting one another for the second day running. Over [illegible]wo days a number of individuals in that city (including Miss B Devlin, [illegible] McCann and Mr S Keenan) appealed to the Northern Ireland Civil [illegible] Association through its chairman, Mr Frank Gogarty, to do something [illegible]w the police away from the Bogside. Mr Gogarty convened a meeting [illegible] NICRA Executive in his home on 13 August. A decision was taken [illegible] for demonstrations to be organised that evening throughout the towns [illegible]ies of Northern Ireland by local branches of the civil rights association. [illegible] demonstrations, to include sit-downs and the blocking of roads, were [illegible]d to put pressure on the civil authorities to draw the police away from [illegible]nderry. It was however decided that no demonstration would be held in [illegible], because of the special risk of provoking sectarian violence there.* [illegible]ing to one member of the Executive, Mr Kevin Boyle, while Belfast [illegible]pressly excluded from the places where demonstrations would be held on [illegible]sday 13th, the possibility of a meeting being held there on the following [illegible]s left open. This was referred to in a press report quoting Mr Boyle [illegible]ppeared in the Belfast Telegraph on 13 August. We have no doubt [illegible]r Boyle accurately indicated the views of some who were present.

[illegible]14 Despite the fact that, according to the evidence submitted to the [illegible], the NICRA did not call a meeting in Belfast to protest against the [illegible]ction in Londonderry, such a meeting was in fact held outside Divis [illegible]e large Catholic-occupied complex of flats and maisonettes on the south [illegible] Divis Street between Durham Street and Ardmoulin Street.

[illegible]15 At about 6 30 pm on the evening of the 13th a police constable on [illegible]y at Upper Library Street/Peters Hill heard a loudspeaker being used in the [illegible]nity of Unity Flats. The speaker was appealing for support for the people [illegible]the Bogside and urging his listeners to attend a meeting later in the evening [illegible]Divis Flats. The constable then saw a white Ford Cortina car, with amplifier equipment protruding from the boot, emerging from the courtyard of Unity Flats. This car was owned by a Mr Stewart whose evidence was that on the evening of the 13th he lent it to a man whom he did not know but to whom he had previously lent it. He did not know for what purpose the car was to be used (although he assumed it was for refugee work for which it had been lent before) until fifteen minutes later, when he heard that it was touring the streets advertising the Divis Street meeting.

18.16 The Tribunal had no evidence as to who was responsible for the activities of the white Cortina or who organised and addressed the meeting held at Divis Flats between 8 and 9 pm. One witness, Mr A, thought the organisers of the meeting were well known people whom he recognised by sight from the television. Another, Mr A McGarrigan, thought the organisers looked like students. It is a fair inference that some civil rights supporters decided to call the meeting.*

18.17 The Tribunal has no doubt that the meeting which was almost immediately followed, at 9 pm, by Mr Lynch's broadcast raised tension in the Falls Road area although people had gathered on the streets before this time. Mr P Kennedy MP (NI) testified to the confusion and speculation to which this speech gave rise, many people thinking there was a possibility that the army of the Irish Republic would intervene in Northern Ireland.

The march to Springfield Road RUC station

18.18 The people who attended the meeting decided to hand in a petition at Springfield Road RUC station protesting against police brutality in Londonderry. About 100 people marched from Divis Flats, the number increasing as they went along Divis Street in the direction of Springfield Road. A motor-car preceded the procession. Mr A denied that a tricolour was carried at the front of this crowd, but one witness, who described a crowd of 300–500 singing the Soldiers Song, saw a man in the centre of the crowd carrying a tricolour. It is possible that as Mr A was at the front of the crowd he did not see this. Father McLaughlin described the procession as numbering between 100 and 200 people and "good humoured". In front was a light coloured motor car with an open boot which appeared to contain a loudspeaker. Although there was no positive identification, this car may well have been Mr Stewart's Cortina.

18.19 At about 9 pm Sgt Devine, who was station sergeant at Springfield Road station, received a radio message that a mob was advancing up the Falls Road in his direction. At that time the police were operating from a temporary station in Violet Street at the rear of the newly-built but not yet occupied station fronting on to the Springfield Road. Sgt Devine, having secured the doors and windows, remained with four constables inside the temporary station; a fifth constable was posted in the new station.

18.20 The crowd arrived at Springfield Road at about 9 15 pm. From his position within the temporary station Sgt Devine heard the noise of missiles against the corrugated iron hoarding protecting the front of the new station and the sound of breaking glass. From outside the door he was then informed by a man who identified himself as Malachy Dornan or Doran that this was a deputation of the citizens of the Falls Road who desired to hand in a written petition containing several signatures and protesting against police brutality in Londonderry. Sgt Devine did not accept the petition nor did he at any time open the door. After about 15 minutes the crowd departed, having broken four windows on the first floor of the new station.

18.21 Shortly before the crowd had dispersed, DI Cushley, who at 8 00 pm had been seconded from the Commissioner's headquarters to take command of "B" district in place of the injured DI Lagan, arrived at Springfield Road Station. DI Cushley observed that the crowd, which numbered about 200 and was now quite peaceable, was beginning to make its way back along the Falls Road in the direction of Divis Street. Anticipating that the crowd was destined for Hastings Street Station, Mr Cushley quickly made his way there. By the time the crowd reached Townsend Street he estimated its size to have grown to about 500. Mr P Devlin MP (NI) and the RUC Deputy Commissioner, Mr Bradley, who appears to have been in overall command of police operations in the area, both however put the figure at about 300.

18.22 While other police remained out of sight DI Cushley, HC Stinson and a constable with a pocket radio stood outside Hastings Street station ready to receive any petition or deputation which might appear. Neither did. Instead, individuals at the front of the crowd ran forward hurling pieces of grating, stones and petrol bombs in the direction of the three policemen who were forced to retreat into the station.

18.23 DI Cushley then instructed armoured vehicles, which he had previously deployed in the vicinity of Hastings Street, to advance along Divis Street with orders to disperse the crowds and to arrest the ringleaders. These vehicles were armoured Commer personnel carriers which DI Cushley had withdrawn from storage that evening—hence their code name, "Mothball"—to replace the normal police transport which was in use elsewhere. The operation succeeded in breaking up the crowds in Divis Street but it was not possible to arrest the ringleaders because of the poor visibility from the Commer vehicles, their lack of manoeuvrability and the impossibility of a party of men dismounting rapidly from them. In fact these vehicles were designed for patrolling border areas in the Province and not for urban riot control.

The Leeson Street incident

18.24 At about 10 30 pm a Commer vehicle under the command of HC Ramsey was ordered to Grosvenor Road/Leeson Street, where it took up position in the mouth of, and facing into, Leeson Street. Mr Bradley had received reports that a crowd, possibly that which had been attacking Hastings Street RUC Station, was moving down Leeson Street towards Grosvenor Road. In order to prevent this crowd crossing Grosvenor Road into a mixed and, ultimately, Protestant area, he decided to put a vehicle at the Leeson Street/Grosvenor Road junction.

18.25 Thinking that his position in the mouth of Leeson Street might be regarded as provocative—for he knew the area to contain a Republican element HC Ramsey moved his vehicle across the Grosvenor Road into Malt Street, which still gave him a view into Leeson Street. From this location he saw a crowd gather in Leeson Street at the junction with McDonnell Street and grow rapidly to about 200. The crowd advanced towards the Grosvenor Road and stones and about three petrol bombs were thrown in the direction of the armoured vehicle. HC Ramsey ordered his men to dismount and advance into Leeson Street behind the vehicle. Just as they entered Leeson Street about five shots rang out and HC Ramsey heard them striking the front of his vehicle. At the same time there was an explosion accompanied by an orange flash and one of his men, Sgt Curral, fell injured. At 10 45 pm HC Ramsey radioed to police headquarters that Sgt Curral had been shot; in fact he had been bowled over by the force of the explosion, sustaining a burn on his right groin.

18.26 This explosion was almost certainly caused by a hand grenade since fragments of such a device were found in the area shortly afterwards. An unexploded hand grenade was also discovered in Malt Street*, and according to an expert witness the fragments were from a similar type of grenade.

18.27 HC Ramsey was joined by HC Gray and the two Commer vehicles under his command. There were still crowds in McDonnell Street and Leeson Street and more petrol bombs were thrown. Five or six further shots were then fired from the Leeson Street direction. By the sound HC Gray took them to be from a ·455 revolver.

18.28 That police officers and vehicles were in fact fired on in this, the first shooting incident in the Falls Road area in August 1969, is confirmed by bullet damage to the front of premises at 180 Grosvenor Road (immediately opposite the mouth of Leeson Street) and bullet marks on the front of HC Ramsey's armoured vehicle. There is no evidence of any return of fire by the police.

18.29 Immediately the incident was reported to him, the Deputy City Commissioner, Mr Bradley, who was in overall charge of police operations in Hastings Street, ordered all police forces to withdraw. Mr Bradley took the view that the Leeson Street incident indicated that the IRA had become involved in the rioting.† A conference of senior police officers was held in Hastings Street at which it was decided to cease police patrols in land rovers and re-deploy all forces in armoured vehicles. These vehicles were Shorland armoured cars. Their normal armament is a ·30 Browning machine gun but these weapons were not fitted on the night of 13th. According to DI Gilchrist: "The Shorlands were brought out on the instructions of the Commissioner, but the guns were not mounted simply because it takes some time to do so". Mr Wolseley testified that he could not understand why the Shorlands had been used unarmed. DI Cushley also told the Tribunal that he expected the Brownings to be mounted on the Shorlands: "It was a useless vehicle without its mounting". The evidence

*It was an American World War II hand grenade which had not exploded since the cap was missing.

†In connection with the incident it may be noted that on or before 13 August HC Stimson received information from an influential person in the area that a trap was to be set for the police in Leeson Street and that they should keep out. HC Ramsey had no knowledge of this and there is no evidence on which the Tribunal can make a finding. But it is indicative of police thinking at the time.

of these senior officers confirms the suggestion in DI Gilchrist's evidence that the Shorlands were unarmed, not as a deliberate act of policy but simply because there had been insufficient time to mount the Browning gun.

18.30 By about 11 pm trouble had broken out in Hooker Street and reinforcements were sent there from "B" district. Crowds were still roaming around in the Falls Road area and at about 11 30 windows were broken at Messrs Isaac Agnew's showrooms. In the course of the evening these premises were set on fire by the mob. Cars were dragged out in the street and set on fire and property was looted. The fire brigade was summoned at six minutes past midnight and reported the ground floor showroom and five cars completely destroyed by fire. Mr P Kennedy MP (NI) for Belfast (Central), described the burning of Agnew's as "totally senseless violence". Although this business was Protestant owned he did not see its destruction as a sectarian act ("I think if it had been a Catholic firm then it would have been burned with the same degree of wantonness"): but we have no doubt that at least part of its motivation was sectarian.

18.31 Tyres were removed from a factory and set on fire at the Falls Road/Albert Street junction. A block of offices at the New Northern Mill (between North Howard Street and Northumberland Street) was also destroyed by fire. According to one witness, a journalist, the New Northern Mill was set on fire by petrol bombs first and it was while the brigade was dealing with this fire that petrol bombs were thrown into Agnews.

18.32 A Catholic witness described the youths responsible for the burning of Agnews as "a mob out of control" and, although there is evidence that responsible residents in the Falls Road area deplored this wanton destructiveness and attempted to restrain the rioters, they were able to do little beyond giving assistance to the fire brigade and attempting to rescue property threatened by fire.

18.33 While Agnews was burning a particularly unfortunate, and very revealing, incident took place. A white saloon car with a flashing blue beacon on the roof occupied by two uniformed fire officers was driving along the Falls Road in the direction of the city. As it approached Agnews a man stepped out from a side street and threw a petrol bomb through the windscreen. The car went out of control and struck the gable end of a public house at the corner of Peel Street. At that time it seems that the crowd of about 200 which was in the vicinity assumed that the two occupants were policemen and that the car was a police car and some of the crowd were hostile towards them. When, however, it was realised that they were fire officers and the car they were travelling in was a fire service car, hostility diminished and they were not harmed. One wonders what would have happened if they had been police officers. The two men were eventually taken to the Royal Victoria Hospital for treatment.

18.34 The violence to persons and, particularly, to property in the Falls Road area on the night of 13/14 August was intended to bring the police into the district. In this, however, the rioters met with only limited success. In the earlier part of the evening there had been clashes in the Falls Road (near the Northumberland Street junction) between missile throwing youths and the police who now withdrew from the area. Mr Bradley and Mr Cushley, their forces depleted as a result of the call for assistance from the Hooker Street area, decided it would be futile to attempt to disperse the mobs in and around the Falls Road. They were forced, in Mr Cushley's words, "to deploy the forces only in patrolling the border areas and to concede to the rioters that portion of the road which they were determined to wreck and destroy". No attempt was therefore made to break up the crowds and the police confined their activities to patrolling the periphery of the area in order to prevent the spread of trouble beyond the Catholic areas and thus to avoid any possibility of sectarian conflict.

18.35 Following the shooting incident in Leeson Street, Mr Bradley thought it necessary to apply for permission to use CS gas in the area.* Permission was refused and gas was not used in Belfast any time on the night of 13th/14th.

18.36 Shortly after midnight the third police station in B district came under attack when shots were fired from a passing vehicle at Andersonstown station.

The Springfield Road Shooting

18.37 A little after 12 30 am Sgt Devine got word that a crowd was again making its way towards Springfield Road RUC Station. More police had come on duty after the previous attack and Sgt Devine now had ten constables with him, four of whom he posted in the new station.

18.38 At this time the unoccupied building was surrounded by a corrugated iron hoarding about 9–10 feet in height and separated from the front of the building by a gap of about 12–15 feet. The four constables were told that if there was an attempt to climb over the hoarding warning shots were to be fired over the heads of the crowd. If anyone succeeded in getting over the hoarding intending to invade the station they were to fire for effect.

18.39 At about 1 00 am the crowd arrived outside the station in Springfield Road. From his position in a first floor room of the station in which he and another two constables had positioned themselves, Constable Knowles saw a crowd of about 50 youths emerge from Colligan Street, some of whom threw petrol bombs at the station. Hearing sounds which he took to be revolver shots he looked out from a window (which was protected by steel shutters which were partly open leaving a gap of 18 inches) and saw two youths to the rear of the crowd each with a revolver in his hand. The two other constables in the room then fired their revolvers from the windows over the heads of the crowd. These shots did not apparently succeed in dispersing the crowd for, according to Constable Knowles' testimony, more petrol bombs and stones were thrown at the station.

*The application was made to the Minister of Home Affairs by the Commissioner, Mr Wolseley. The Minister did not agree since Mr Wolseley had not seen the situation on the ground himself in accordance with the regulations. Mr Wolseley was asked to get Mr Bradley himself to contact the Minister, but he did not do so.

18.40 The Tribunal heard evidence from one of the two constables who, between them, discharged 11 revolver shots from the first floor room. The shutters over the window at which Constable E was standing were completely closed, the only visibility being permitted by a circular aperture about 4 inches in diameter. Through the aperture Constable E saw the crowd throwing petrol bombs and two youths firing revolvers towards the station. As the senior of the two constables at the windows he drew his revolver and gave an order to fire over the heads of the crowd. He said he fired three shots at 45° into the air, through the aperture in the steel shutters and a hole in the window which had been broken earlier. At the same time the other constable fired about the same number of rounds. These shots had no effect on the crowd, perhaps because they could not be heard above the din of rioting, and Constable E fired a further three shots into the air. The other constable discharged two more rounds. At about the same time as this firing two armoured Commer vehicles arrived on the scene and the crowd scattered.

18.41 Despite the police insistence that the two constables fired into the air there is clear evidence that two young men, Mr Smyth and Mr Carberry, sustained gunshot injuries in Colligan Street at about this time. Mr Carberry testified that as he was crossing this street at a point between McQuillan Street and Springfield Road he was struck in the neck by a bullet. Mr T Smyth also appears to have received a gunshot wound in the right hip at the same time.

18.42 There are difficulties, which it is unnecessary to enumerate, in accepting in its totality the evidence of Mr Carberry and of a Mr Linton, who was with the shot man. Nevertheless none of these difficulties affects the fact that two civilians were injured by gunfire at the same time as two police constables claim to have fired warning shots over the heads of the crowd of which they were members. Tests by ballistic experts have established that the bullet which injured Mr Carberry was fired from the revolver on issue to and used by one of the constables on 13 August. The question which immediately arises is how bullets fired from a first floor window, according to police evidence, "upwards at an angle" and "well over the heads" of the crowd could strike targets at ground level a short distance away.

18.43 One explanation might be that the bullet which struck Mr Carberry had ricocheted from a hard surface; the fact that it displayed "damage to the nose together with extensive damage to one side" lends some colour to this hypothesis. The two ballistics experts who examined the bullet reported that the damage to it could have been caused either by ricochet or by striking bone. After consideration of the hospital report, however, both experts thought that the nature of the wound sustained by Mr Carberry suggested the second alternative: that the bullet had not ricocheted before entry.

18.44 The conclusion must be that at least one of the two police constables who fired from the station fired for effect. There can be little doubt that shooting was in fact directed at the station from the crowd outside; a spent bullet of a kind not on issue to the RUC was found on the first floor window sill the following morning and two areas of bullet damage were identified. Nevertheless, there was no justification in the circumstances for firing for effect. Ugly in mood and aggressive in action though the crowd was, neither the security of the station nor the safety of the police was at such risk as to permit "firing for effect", a euphemism for firing to injure or kill people in the street below.

18.45 As we have already described, this second attack on Springfield Road station was brought to an end by the arrival of armoured vehicles under the command of DI Cushley. It was probably when leaving the vicinity of the station on this occasion that Mr Cushley heard light pistol shots and the sound of bullets striking the side of the vehicle. No fire was returned.

18.46 A third attack on Springfield Road station took place at about 2 00 am on the morning of the 14th. After the previous incident Sgt Devine had placed a policeman with a Sterling sub-machine gun on the roof of the station. A number of people threw petrol bombs at the station but this was checked when the officer on the roof discharged eight rounds into the air. Mr Linton was among this crowd, which he described as being in aggressive mood after the shooting of the two men earlier on. By the time of this third attack petrol bombs had been prepared in quantity and people were seen carrying crates filled with them.

18.47 All the disturbances so far described involved the activities of Catholic crowds in Catholic areas. In marked contrast with what took place on the following night there is no evidence of any sectarian clash on the night of 13/14 August.

18.48 The RUC Deputy Commissioner, Mr Bradley, told the Tribunal that during the evening Protestants did gather in Percy Street and Dover Street and were contained by members of the RUC and USC. DI Cushley, however, who was in these streets and better able to observe what was happening, denied that there were any gatherings of Protestants which had to be contained by the police. There are also a number of references in the police log (Exhibit 43) to Protestant crowds at North Howard Street, Third Street and Cupar Street. During the night DI Cushley saw a crowd of Protestants at the junction of North Howard Street and Third Street. This crowd, which was out of sight of the Falls Road, had collected piles of missiles as well as some petrol bombs. Some time before midnight members of this crowd erected a barricade across North Howard Street. DI Cushley did not disperse them because he was unwilling to open up another front as he did not have sufficient men with him. In addition he seems to have regarded their activities as defensive and perhaps therefore as legitimate. However, an entry in the police log suggests that Finnegan's pub at Cupar Street/Argyle Street junction was looted (presumably by Protestants).

18.49 A significant feature of the rioting on 13 August in the Divis/Lower Falls area was the use of firearms. A further point to note is the similarity between the events of the early part of the evening of 13 August and those of 20 and 21 April of the same year when after confrontations between the police and residents of the Bogside, there were demonstrations at, and attacks on, the RUC stations at Hastings Street and Springfield Road in protest against "police brutality" in Londonderry*. This similarity tends to confirm the evidence of several witnesses that the Catholics responsible for the disturbances on 13 August were motivated by a desire to protest against the activities of the RUC in Londonderry. Some of them appeared to want to draw the police into the area and engage them. The element of simple hooliganism was also present —as always.

The reaction of the authorities to the disturbances of 13 August.

18.50 One effect of the province—wide disturbances on the night of the 13th was to convince the heads of the RUC, and the Government, that they should expect very serious trouble on 14 August. The Belfast Deputy Commissioner managed to arrange for a force of about 400 RUC to be available for riot duty in Belfast on the evening of the 14th. It was also decided, in spite of the risks, that County Inspectors could, if necessary use the USC for riot control.

18.51 During the early hours of 14 August Dr Paisley, and some of his colleagues in the Ulster Constitution Defence Committee, had a meeting with the Northern Ireland Prime Minister. Dr Paisley called for much stronger action by the Government, and offered to organise a Protestant force to assist the Government, if the Army was to be available only upon unacceptable terms. This meeting must have made clear to the Government the greatly increased risk of communal tension.

18.52 It was, in fact, the only occasion, of which we have evidence, of any action by the Ulster Constitution Defence Committee in the events under review. That committee, in which Dr Paisley was the dominating figure, had been founded by him and controlled a politically active organisation, the Ulster Protestant Volunteers. There is no evidence that the Ulster Protestant Volunteers as a body played any part in the disturbances under review.

*It was on 21 April that DI Lagan, the senior officer in Belfast "B" District, was savagely attacked by rioters at Falls Road/Balaclava Street. Mr P Devlin MP and others attempted to protect him but he sustained injuries to his back.

PART VI—THE ARMY

CHAPTER 19—OFFICIAL DISCUSSIONS ABOUT DEPLOYMENT OF THE ARMY IN EARLY AUGUST

19.1 At the beginning of August 1969 39 Brigade was the Garrison Brigade for Northern Ireland. It comprised the 1 battalion, Royal Regiment of Wales, the 2 battalion, Queen's Regiment, the 1 battalion Prince of Wales Own Regiment and the 17/21 Lancers at Omagh. In July 1 Prince of Wales Own Regiment had been moved to Magilligan, because of possible risks arising from the situation in Londonderry. During 1969 there had been some modest liaison about crowd control between the Army and the RUC, culminating in two half-day study periods about how the army and police would work together if the army was called in. Brigadier Hudson told the Tribunal that the likelihood of the Army being called in had been growing throughout the summer and that the Army was taking all measures short of actually deploying soldiers to be ready if they were called upon to intervene.

19.2 When the crisis came in mid-August 1 Prince of Wales Own Regiment was near Londonderry. One company of the Royal Regiment of Wales was in Omagh with the 17/21 Lancers. The total effective strength available for deployment in the Belfast area was five companies which totalled, excluding one company in reserve at Holywood, about 300 men. Once troops began to be committed a further battalion—the 3rd Light Infantry—was brought into Belfast. It arrived during the night of 15/16 August. The Tribunal did not inquire into the policy of the Ministry of Defence, but it is a striking fact that the troops available for deployment were so few. It is a reasonable inference that their role was expected to be very limited.

19.3 Mr Wolseley, the Police Commissioner for Belfast, told the Tribunal that after the rioting on the night 2/3 August he recognised that his men were exhausted and had to be sent home to rest. The result was that, when trouble did break out in the afternoon of the 3rd, there were very few policemen available. Mr Wolseley contacted Lt Col J Fletcher, commanding officer of the 2 battalion the Queen's Regiment, which was based at Palace Barracks Holywood. At 10 am one company of this battalion had been ordered to be placed on 2 hours notice from 4 pm onwards. Col Fletcher travelled to Mr. Wolseley's headquarters at Castlereagh. At about 4 45 pm Mr Wolseley told Col Fletcher that all police reserves had been committed and asked for his assistance. Col Fletcher replied that he would do all he could to help but that he would not deploy any of his soldiers without permission from higher authority. He communicated with Brigadier Dyball, the then Chief of Staff, who said that this was a political decision and confirmed that troops were not to be committed without the approval of higher authority.

19.4 During the afternoon Mr Wolseley telephoned the Inspector General, who with his Deputy was attending a Cabinet meeting called at 4 00 pm, and told him that he had been in touch with the military. Mr Wolseley and Mr Bradley, the Deputy Commissioner, were both of the opinion that the situation was such that troops would have to be deployed on the ground in West Belfast.

19.5 The Inspector-General did not, however, support Mr Wolseley's request for army assistance: he did not think the representations made to him by the Commissioner warranted the taking of such a grave step. (This view appears to have been shared by the GOC, Lt Gen Sir Ian Freeland.) Quite apart from purely tactical considerations on the ground, the Inspector-General was aware of the possible constitutional consequences of calling in troops. He explained to the Tribunal the "background" to his decision not to recommend military intervention in the following terms:

> "(1) I did not think the situation in Belfast—there had been reinforcements brought in from quiet country areas on the previous evening—had got so far as it would be desirable for troops to come in in aid of the civil power; and
> (2) there was the point which had been made to me from the political angle that there were constitutional issues involved".

But, while very much aware of the "political angle", by which he meant the risk that, if Westminster committed the troops, it might suspend Stormont, he claimed that it was not a factor in his advice.

19.6 As a result of discussions between the Inspector-General, the Minister of Home Affairs, the Chief of Staff (Brigadier Dyball) and the Secretary to the Cabinet (NI) it was decided to bring in troops on a standby basis. Originally they were to be sent to Musgrave Street RUC Station but in the event, at 5 50 pm, a company of soldiers was ordered to the Commissioner's headquarters at Castlereagh. They arrived at about 6 35 pm by which time police reserves had been summoned from elsewhere in the Province and men from the local force had returned to duty. In the event, the RUC did not lose control of the situation.

19.7 The Minister of Home Affairs, Mr Porter, confirmed that at no stage on 3 August was he advised by the Inspector-General, the Deputy Inspector-General or the Commissioner that army assistance was necessary in Belfast. The Minister had been made aware from as early as April 1969 that "if troops were needed in an extended way in Northern Ireland the Government in the United Kingdom would have to keep under consideration the implication of such a movement" (no doubt, the reason for Mr Peacocke's awareness of "the political angle").

19.8 In case military intervention did become necessary over the weekend the NI Cabinet agreed to seek advance clearance against this contingency from the UK Government in order to avoid any delay once a specific request was made. During the discussions at official level between Stormont and Westminster it became clear to Mr Porter that it was the view of the UK Government that any extensive use of troops to cope with civil disturbances in Northern Ireland could have serious constitutional consequences. This view was also communicated to the GOC by the UK Government. Mr Porter told the Tribunal that the contingent request to Whitehall for military assistance was later withdrawn on the basis that a negative response might inhibit the GOC who was left to rely on his common law powers.

CHAPTER 20—CONSTITUTIONAL IMPLICATIONS OF CALLING IN ARMY

20.1 Discussion between the UK and NI Governments about the calling in of troops in aid of the civil power had taken place in 1966 and again in April 1969. The Minister of Home Affairs told the Tribunal that after the 1966 discussion

> "It was understood that while the Inspector-General should feel free to make the request* if the situation demanded his doing so immediately; it was understood also that where possible a consultation should take place at government level through the Minister of Home Affairs in the first instance and in the normal way that would be taken up through the cabinet office."

When the matter was raised again in 1969

> ". . . it was made clear that the GOC should only consider this question after consultation with London and again it was understood that there would be consultation at government level. I think at the time my Lord, it was also indicated that in that eventuality the government in Westminster would have to consider the implications of such intervention".

20.2 The possible constitutional consequences of the use of the army in Northern Ireland were, as we have seen, very much to the fore of the minds of the Minister of Home Affairs and the Inspector-General on Sunday, 3 August. During the following week consultations took place between officials at Stormont and Westminster; on Tuesday, 5 August, the Secretary to the NI Cabinet visited the Permanent Secretary to the Home Office in London.

20.3 On the next day Wednesday, 6 August, a report appeared in the Financial Times by the Lobby Editor, John Bourne. It was in the following terms:—

> "British troops would be used to restore law and order in Ulster only if the Northern Ireland Government first agreed to surrender its political authority to Westminster. This, it is understood, is the position as explained by Mr Wilson and Mr Callaghan first to Captain O'Neill when he was Prime Minister of Northern Ireland, and then to his successor, Major Chichester-Clark, the present Premier. The proposition was probably not spelt out quite so bluntly. The formula used by Mr Wilson was more likely to have been to the effect that if Northern Ireland wanted troops to restore order this would involve a fresh examination of the constitutional relationship between the two countries. The underlying meaning, however, is said to have been clear.
> "The British Government's view is that it would be the height of folly to allow its troops (or police) to be under the political direction of another Government which, rightly or wrongly, is regarded as essentially Protestant in outlook and which would use the troops to deal with disorders which were religious in origin. Ministers believe that it would be equally unacceptable for troops to be used—no matter whose direction they came under—if they were there to maintain law and order for the existing Northern Ireland Government.

*i.e. for military intervention.

FS 1 . 310

> "The only solution acceptable to Whitehall, if troops were asked for, would presumably be for the Ulster constitution to be suspended and for an interim Government to be appointed. But merely to pose the problem in this way demonstrates how reluctant the British Government would be to assume political authority in Northern Ireland. Ministers fear the consequences of Westminster becoming once more responsible for governing Ulster. At the very least, every action of Whitehall would in such circumstances raise the passions of either Roman Catholics or Protestants or both. At worst, it is felt, there could be a recurrence of the troubles of the 'twenties.
> "Neither Government would want Westminster to reassume direct control of Northern Ireland, and each is hoping that the Royal Ulster Constabulary and the 'specials' will be able to contain the present disturbances".

20.4 Mr Porter was very concerned on reading this report. He went immediately to the Prime Minister who had already read it and who was equally concerned. On 8 August the Prime Minister and the Minister of Home Affairs went to London where they saw the Home Secretary. Asked what was the view expressed by the Home Secretary in relation to the use of troops in Northern Ireland to quell civil disturbances, Mr Porter replied

> "Without indicating what necessarily would in fact happen it was indicated that the extended use of troops would involve a consideration of Northern Ireland's constitutional position by the United Kingdom Government in Westminster".

20.5 During this period leading up to mid-August the Minister was also conscious of the fact that the right to call in military aid depended in the first instance upon using such forces as the NI Government had at its disposal. In discussion with the Army Chief of Staff it was made clear that the USC was regarded by the army as a reserve force which would normally be deployed before requesting military assistance. Brigadier Hudson told the Tribunal that it was his understanding that the army "would not be committed until the Westminster Government were pretty certain that all the resources which the Stormont Government had had been deployed".

20.6 In Northern Ireland the civil authority for the purpose of making a request for military aid was the Inspector-General or other specified officer of the RUC. In common with the Minister, Mr Peacocke also assumed that the calling out of the USC was a precondition to military intervention. Soon after his appointment on 1 February 1969 the Inspector-General had given a press conference at which he stated that troops would not be called in "until there was armed intervention followed by the loss of control by the police in certain areas". In his evidence to the Tribunal, however, Mr Peacocke appeared not to take such a rigid view and to concede that army assistance should be sought either where control had been lost by the police or where there was imminent danger of this happening. Thus when troops were deployed in Londonderry on 14 August control had not been lost although this "was a matter of minutes". The army view, as expressed to the Tribunal by Brigadier Hudson, was that the military would come to the aid of the civil power "when the circumstances are such that the civil power, whatever its [illegible]es, reckons that if they get any worse they are going to lose control. In other words, not after they have lost control but when they are about to . . ."

20.7 On 11 August an NI Cabinet meeting was held at which it was agreed that the Minister of Home Affairs was to feel free to take the initiative in calling for Army assistance if he thought this necessary. Mr Porter told the Tribunal that this last decision was taken not in anticipation of trouble occurring in mid-August but to simplify the procedure in the light of the difficulties which had been experienced on 3 August.

20.8 The Tribunal is satisfied that the NI Government and senior police officers were well aware in August 1969—

(1) that they must call out the USC before seeking the aid of the Army; and

(2) that there was the possibility of "constitutional implications" if and when they asked Westminster for military assistance in maintaining law and order.

FS 1 . 311

CHAPTER 21—THE WEST BELFAST RIOTS: PRINCIPAL FEATURES

21.1 Very severe rioting occurred in West Belfast on the night of 14/15 August. Because so many interpretations have been put upon these events, an examination of them is of critical importance to our inquiry. The principal features of the night's rioting were:—

(1) Between 7 and 9 pm an aggressive Catholic crowd assembled in Divis Street between Northumberland Street and Hastings Street. Elements of this crowd attacked Hastings Street RUC Station with missiles and petrol bombs.

(2) Between 10 and 11 30 pm this crowd spilled over into Dover Street and Percy Street and in each street fighting broke out with opposing Protestant crowds. During the early stages of the fighting there were no members of the RUC on the scene. A few special constables were, however, present in each street. At about 10 30 pm a shotgun was fired from the Protestant crowd in Percy Street.

(3) Contemporaneously with disturbances occurring in Dover Street, Percy Street and Divis Street, trouble broke out further west in Cupar Street and Conway Street. Opposing crowds clashed in Cupar Street and were separated by the police. Shots were fired at the police from the Catholic crowd; the police responded by firing in the air. In neighbouring Conway Street a similar pattern developed, but here the police returned fire for effect with hand guns. For the first time during the evening the police opened fire with a Browning gun mounted on a Shorland armoured car. Protestants began to set fire to homes in the Catholic section of Conway Street.

(4) At about 12 30 am shots were fired from the Catholic side across Divis Street at a group of policemen and civilians in the mouth of Dover Street. Mr Herbert Roy, a Protestant civilian, was killed and three policemen received gunshot injuries.

(5) After the death of Mr Roy and the shooting associated with it, HC Gray brought up three Shorland armoured cars armed with Browning machine guns. Shortly after 1 am one or more of these weapons were fired in Divis Street, killing 9 year old Patrick Rooney in his home in St Brendan's Block, Divis Flats.

(6) Almost immediately after the Shorland firing in Divis Street police marksmen on the roof of Hastings Street station, believing that gunfire was coming from the roof of the Whitehall block in Divis Street, fired in that direction, killing Mr Hugh McCabe, a soldier on leave.

(7) The rioting in Percy Street led to an incursion of Protestants into Divis Street where they set fire to homes on the north side of the street and threw petrol bombs at St Comgall's School. At about 2 am automatic weapons, operated probably by members of the IRA, were fired from St Comgall's School in Divis Street into Percy Street inflicting a number of casualties. This fire was returned from a Shorland in Percy Street.

(8) Disturbances in Conway Street continued throughout the night and by morning most of the homes in the Catholic occupied part of the street had been destroyed by fire.

SECTION 1—INTRODUCTION

21.2 On the morning of Thursday, 14 August, the damaged and destroyed property and the littered streets in Falls Road and Divis Street contributed to a general air of tension in the area. The police were anticipating trouble again in the evening which, as it happened to be the eve of the Feast of the Assumption, was also a traditional occasion for lighting bonfires in the streets. On previous occasions, when there had been disturbances, it had been police policy "to saturate" the area with large numbers of vehicles: it had been successful and, according to DI Cushley, had been well received by local residents. But this was not now possible because the police were dispersed to deal with trouble arising elsewhere in the Province.

21.3 Unable to saturate the areas with a sufficient force of police, the DI had to make do with patrolling by vehicle the border areas to prevent clashes between the two sections of the community. The Shankill side of the "border" had to be left to the USC, armed parties of whom were detailed to police the northern ends of the streets linking Shankill Road with Falls Road. Although the District Inspector for "B" district, Mr Lagan, returned to duty at 6 pm on 14 August, he did not take command. Overall command was in the hands of the Deputy Commissioner, Mr. Bradley, while DI Cushley was in charge of police operations on the ground.

SECTION 2—TROUBLE IN DIVIS STREET

The Beginning

21.4 The first activity in the area was the gathering of Catholic crowds around bonfires in Divis Street and Lower Falls Road where, shortly before 7 pm, there was some stoning of motor vehicles. Mr Managh estimated that from about 7 pm, a crowd of some 150 to 200 congregated in Divis Street.* At about 9 pm this witness, a professional journalist, saw the crowd breaking up paving stones and throwing petrol bombs at the houses in Divis Street to the east of Percy Street junction, but he did not see them catch fire. About an hour later (after 10 pm) another reporter, Mr Hastings of the London Evening Standard, described a crowd of some 300, mostly young people, at Northumberland Street/Divis Street who were lighting fires in the street and breaking up paving stones. Some had petrol bombs. Mr Hastings formed the impression that the people in this crowd were looking for a fight. A little later this crowd was swollen by another smaller crowd which came up Albert Street. The whole

*Evidence was given of a meeting at about 7.30 "in behind the (Divis) flats" where protests were made against RUC brutality in Derry. Afterwards the crowd marched up the Falls Road. Mr Shannon saw a crowd of about 100 people in Divis Street outside Divis Flats. They marched up to Northumberland Street, "seemed to have a meeting", and marched back again.

body then started to move down Divis Street. As the crowd passed the houses on the north side of the road between Percy Street and Dover Street several young children threw petrol bombs. The houses did not catch fire but the Arkle Bar which was situated at the Dover Street/Divis Street corner did take fire when one or two petrol bombs were thrown at it, again by young children.*

21.5 These crowd movements along Divis Street were observed not only by the police in Hastings Street but by watching Protestants in Percy Street and Dover Street. Mr J McQuade (MP (NI) for Woodvale) was in Dover Street shortly after 9 pm when he observed "a mass of people" milling around in Divis Street, singing "the usual rebel songs, and of course the odd Tricolour being carried". He said there were very few people around in Dover Street: but he did see six young men who were there "as a group"

"just taking stock . . . trying to see what was happening in Divis Street".

"They were watching", he added. No doubt, they reported what they saw. By the time the Linfield supporters† had returned from their club's away match at Newtownards, there must have been Protestants (as well as the Catholics observed by Mr Hastings) spoiling for a fight.

21.6 The situation was explosive. Catholics were alert to move up along their ends of Dover and Percy Street. Protestants were sensitive to any movement up these streets. If the police should not be present in sufficient strength on the borderline between the two communities, as in the event they were not, each side could well misinterpret the actions of the other. Thus it needed only a movement of Catholics into Dover or Percy Street or a thrust of Protestants down the same streets for there to develop an uncontrolled faction fight. Both these movements did in fact occur: and the result was an "invasion" of Divis Street by Protestants, which ultimately led to Catholic gunfire intended to repel invaders and to much heavier police gunfire intended to silence Catholic gunmen. The immediate price in human suffering and damage to property was tragic enough—a boy and two young men killed, an unknown but substantial number of persons injured, a considerable area of residential and other property devastated. But there was more to pay. The major casualty of the night was the complete loss of confidence by the Belfast Catholic community in the police force as then constituted and the determination thereafter by subversive elements such as the IRA to exploit the opportunities for urban guerilla warfare in Belfast.

The riot between Hastings Street and Divis Flats

21.7 The immediate consequence of the crowd movements in Divis Street was a number of stone and petrol bomb attacks on Hastings Street RUC Station and police officers and vehicles in that vicinity. HC Stinson described two attacks, one at 10 40 pm and another, more severe, at 11 10 pm. From his position on the roof of Hastings Street Station Constable Mahood had a grandstand view of these attacks. He saw at least three sorties; petrol bombs were thrown during the third.

*Mr Hastings testified that in the middle of the crowd moving down Divis Street was a yellow mechanical digger which turned off into Percy Street. Mr Managh and Mr McCormick (time 11 pm) saw this vehicle being driven from Albert Street into Divis Street and thence into Percy Street. This episode is referred to below in the context of other events in Percy Street.

†Linfield is a prominent Belfast Football Club with strong Protestant support.

21.8 HC Gray arrived in the area at about 10 45 pm. By this time police vehicles were deployed in a number of streets near the police station: HC Gray and his vehicle were, with others, in Pound Street. Their task was to defend the station. He gathered that there had been a light attack before his arrival. As the Catholic crowd advanced along Divis Street, the police vehicles were ordered to close in. Head Constable Gray advanced northwards up Durham Street but by the time he reached Divis Street the crowd had withdrawn along the street past the Durham Street junction towards the flats. His vehicle then came under a severe stone and petrol bomb attack from the flats' direction. HC Gray and his men dismounted and launched a baton charge along Divis Street to a point about 25 yards short of the maisonettes from where they were forced to retire under heavy stoning.

21.9 At least three more baton charges were carried out until at about 11 30 when HC Gray withdrew to Hastings Street. During the period of something under an hour when HC Gray was engaged on Divis Street he was aware from messages heard over the radio that fighting had broken out in Dover Street and Percy Street. At around midnight HC Gray and DI Cushley decided to make a concerted effort to clear Divis Street and relieve the situation at the mouth of Dover Street. Shorland, Humber and Commer armoured vehicles were lined up abreast in Divis Street and, followed by 40–50 men on foot, they advanced slowly along Divis Street in the direction of Dover Street. When the front of this convoy drew level with the northern end of the Whitehall block of maisonettes, a number of people appeared on the roof and showered the armoured vehicles with missiles, petrol bombs, concrete blocks and pieces of grating. So heavy was the attack that the roof of HC Gray's armoured Commer vehicle was punctured in four places. The convoy was unable to advance beyond the Whitehall block and turned back to Hastings Street Station.

21.10 Catholic witnesses described this advance of police vehicles along Divis Street in broadly similar terms. Mr. McGarrigan was one of those on the roof of the Whitehall block of maisonettes. He described how he and others, seeing the fighting at the mouth of Dover Street and fearing that the police might get into the flats, decided to form a human chain to transport stones to the roof of the flats. In addition to this material which was carried up on to the roof, it appears that builders' materials, such as bricks and scaffolding tubes which were being used in building works then in progress, were already on the roof. Mr Wyllie corroborated this evidence about the two sources of supply of material for use as missiles. The men on the roof of the flats held their fire until the vehicles drew level.

21.11 Then one man gave a signal and all the assembled missiles were hurled into Divis Street. The police were pinned down for about two or three minutes after which they retreated towards Hastings Street bringing with them two or three wounded policemen. We have no doubt that the police operation was intended only to clear Divis Street: but Mr McGarrigan thought otherwise at the time. He said that women and children in the flats were terrified that the RUC would do to them what they had done in Derry: the men were, therefore, determined to keep them from entering the flats. Mr Wyllie's motive appears to have been a desire to prevent the police from reaching and dispersing the Catholic crowd in Divis Street near the Dover Street junction who were at the time under strong pressure from Protestants: his appreciation of police intentions was nearer the truth than Mr McGarrigan's.

SECTION 3—DOVER STREET, UP TO DEATH OF HERBERT ROY

21.12 It is now necessary to move geographically and chronologically to Dover Street and Percy Street, where violence had broken out earlier in the evening. The two streets run north-south connecting Divis Street with Shankhill Road. At the Divis Street end they are only 100 yards apart. In 1969 they were both mixed streets, occupied by Catholics at their southern ends and Protestants at their northern ends. Between Beverley Street and Divis Street both Percy Street and Dover Street were almost exclusively Catholic. Beverley Street was mixed but mainly Catholic; Ardmoulin Avenue was Catholic. In Dover Street Catholic territory extended as far north as Cumberland Street, whereas the stretch of Percy Street between Cumberland Street and Beverley Street is mixed, with a preponderance of Protestant residents. Thus it can be seen that whilst many Protestant witnesses regarded Beverley Street as marking the religious border in this area, this assessment only applies to Percy Street; it does not describe Dover Street where the border was one block further north, at Cumberland Street.

21.13 A description of the outbreak of fighting in Dover Street was given in the evidence of Mrs McKnight, who described herself as having strong Republican views. In the early evening, before 7 pm, Mrs McKnight who was visiting No 116 Dover Street had noticed a tense atmosphere in Dover Street: small groups of people, both Catholic and Protestant, were standing at their doors. At about 7 45 this witness said that she saw the groups of Protestants to the north of Beverley Street increase in size. She could see members of the USC in Dover Street (she denied that there were any Catholic crowds at the Divis Street end but the Tribunal finds that there were). Not until about 8 or 8 10 did any members of the Catholic crowd which had formed in Divis Street enter Dover Street when some "10–20 youths" (undoubtedly an under-estimate) appeared and began to exchange "filthy language" with the opposing Protestant crowd. She and other residents tried unsuccessfully to move this group of youths on. They had come up Dover Street as far as Ardmoulin Avenue. She then saw the special constables line up across Dover Street midway between Beverley Street and Duffy Street and, with the Protestant crowd behind, launch a baton charge in the direction of Divis Street. There emerges from her evidence a picture substantially the same as that given by Mr McQuade MP (NI) and S/Sgt Harpur, and the Tribunal accepts that general picture.

21.14 S/Sgt Harpur with 10 men had been sent to Dover Street arriving at the Shankill Road end shortly after 8 30. Some time after 10 pm he saw a crowd on Divis Street passing back and forth across the mouth of Dover Street. One or two women at their doors were the only people in Dover Street when a loud banging was heard and corrugated iron barricades were moved into Dover Street from Divis Street. These appeared to be sheets of corrugated iron mounted on wooden frames which supported them in an upright position. They were erected in the carriage-way in Dover Street leaving the footpath clear. S/Sgt Harpur and his men then advanced down Dover Street, crossed Beverley Street and took up a position just below the junction. He made this move because he suspected that the barricade was going to be used as protection for the advance of a hostile crowd up Dover Street. It appears that when they reached this point stones were thrown at S/Sgt Harpur's party which had come on duty equipped with steel helmets, batons and revolvers but without riot shields. Once they came under attack they were given dustbin lids to use as shields by some of the residents in Dover Street.

21.15 S/Sgt Harpur then observed the barricade being slowly moved up Dover Street to a position just short of Ardmoulin Avenue. His men spread out across the street at the Beverley Street junction. Some time after 11 pm men came out from the Catholic crowd behind the barricade and stones and petrol bombs were thrown at the special constables, who were forced to retreat. When there was an attempt to move the barricade further up Dover Street Sgt/Harpur and his men drew their batons and "moved slowly forward, we did not charge". Again they were driven back by stones and petrol bombs to Beverley Street where they reformed. At this point S/Sgt Harpur "looked round and Dover Street was black; a crowd of Protestants had come into Dover Street". He was clear that this crowd had not been there when he and his men made their first advance.

21.16 In her account Mrs McKnight also described the rapid build up of Protestant crowds at around the time of the first baton charge but she gave evidence that the Protestant crowd was gathering behind the "B Specials" when they were first lining up. Mrs McKnight does not appear to have seen any petrol bombs thrown until over an hour after the first USC charges. According to her recollection the corrugated iron barricades were brought into Dover Street after this charge.

21.17 Notwithstanding differences of recollection and emphasis, it is not difficult to see what was happening. Some elements of the Catholic crowd in Divis Street were spilling out into Dover Street. Protestants were assembling to watch, and, if necessary, to fight. Whether the Catholics brought in the mobile barricade on their first entry, as S/Sgt Harpur says, or on a later entry, as Mrs McKnight says, it is not possible to determine—and does not much matter. Both sides were ready for a fight: the Catholics were determined that the Protestants would not reach Divis Street: and, save for a handful of USC, there were no police to prevent a faction fight.

21.18 After the first USC charge or advance about 6 special constables arrived in Dover Street to reinforce S/Sgt Harpur's party. By this time, according to S/Sgt Harpur, two buildings on the east side of Dover Street near the Divis

Street junction, the Arkle Bar and the Sarsfield (Bingo) Hall, had been set alight by petrol bombs from the Catholic crowd. With the number of his party now increased to 16, S/Sgt Harpur then decided to remove the corrugated iron barricades, which he did not regard as defensive since they were being used to protect the Catholic crowd which was advancing up Dover Street. There were one or two further advances by the USC party and they succeeded in capturing at least two portions of the barricade.

21.19 It seems clear that the special constables were supported in the fighting in Dover Street by Protestant civilians, although S/Sgt Harpur said he did not know whether they were or not. At about 11 pm a police armoured Humber commanded by HC Stewart drove down Dover Street towards Divis Street followed by three Shorland armoured cars. In the course of this journey the four vehicles penetrated the corrugated iron barricade—or what remained of it after the efforts of the USC to capture it. Members of the USC followed the armoured cars through the barricade and came under attack from the Catholic crowd. At this stage Mr Allen, who witnessed the incident, "saw red" and with about 50 others charged down to the Beverley Street junction where he engaged in hand-to-hand fighting with the Catholic crowd. Behind the barricade Mr Allen found crates of petrol bombs. Some members of his crowd threw petrol bombs into the Sarsfield Hall and he himself threw one in the direction of a fire escape at the side of the building.

21.20 As the Humber which was leading the three Shorlands was about to turn left from Dover Street into Divis Street petrol bombs were thrown at the vehicle which became enveloped in flames. The driver lost control and the vehicle crashed into a lamp standard on Divis Street. A group of Protestants which included Mr Allen rescued one of the occupants and took him back up Dover Street. The Humber managed to continue its journey along Divis Street as far as a point between Townsend Street and Hastings Street where the driver and remaining crew members were rescued by other police. HC Stewart was then taken to hospital.

21.21 It is clear from this account that the movement of police vehicles down Dover Street at about 11 pm provided the Protestants with the opportunity, which they took, of erupting into Divis Street before any RUC foot patrol had arrived in Dover Street.

21.22 Another civilian who participated in the Dover Street fighting on the Protestant side was Mr J McQuade MP (NI). When he saw a mob from Divis Street enter Dover Street throwing missiles, he and others retaliated with stones although he denied that he ever threw a bottle. Mrs McKnight alleged that Mr McQuade was marshalling Protestant civilians armed with sticks and hatchets behind the USC in Dover Street. Mr McQuade agreed that he gave directions and took part in the organisation of what he regarded as the defence of the area. In evidence he claimed not to have seen any USC in Dover Street at the time he was there. Mr McQuade saw the corrugated iron barricade being moved up Dover Street and says that it got no further than a point between Ardmoulin Avenue and Beverley Street where it was captured by the Protestants who removed it to Beverley Street.

21.23 At about 11 20 pm after the capture or destruction of portions of the corrugated iron barricade, a foot patrol of 8 RUC arrived in Dover Street. This party of police was under the command of Sgt Stanford. The sergeant gave evidence that he saw a crowd of 150 near the Shankill Road end of Dover Street and, further down, a crowd of about 75 behind corrugated iron sheets placed across the road. Sgt Stanford was a stranger to Dover Street and in the course of his evidence to the Tribunal displayed considerable uncertainty as to the exact location of the barricade—which the Tribunal finds was not at any time north of Beverley Street.

21.24 With the arrival of Sgt Stanford, S/Sgt Harpur and his party came under his command. Sgt Stanford observed that most of the stone throwing and all the petrol bombing was coming from the Catholic crowd and he therefore decided to mount a baton charge to force this crowd away from the barricade. He succeeded in forcing the crowd back towards Divis Street. Sgt Stanford noticed that the Protestant crowd had followed him down Dover Street; so he decided not to advance too close to Divis Street. He denied that any civilian in the Protestant crowd overtook him or his men during the baton charge. After the charge, petrol bombs were thrown into the Sarsfield Hall by the Catholic crowd; Sgt Stanford then launched a second charge to drive this crowd away from the hall. The Catholics were forced out of Dover Street into Divis Street where they split into 2 groups on either side of the Dover Street junction. Again the Protestant crowd followed the police charge.

21.25 It is convenient at this point to consider the evidence about the burning of the Sarsfield Hall which was situated in Dover Street opposite the mouth of Ardmoulin Avenue—a point at which the fiercest fighting between the two factions took place. Both Sgt Stanford and S/Sgt Harpur thought that Catholics were responsible. Other witnesses, including Mr Allen, described how petrol bombs were thrown at the Hall from the Protestant side. It is not possible to determine which side first set fire to the Hall: at different times during the evening petrol bombs from both sides landed on or near the building.

21.26 At about 12 05 am Sgt Stanford, who shortly before midnight had left Dover Street to investigate a report of trouble in Percy Street, returned to Dover Street to find that the Protestant crowd which was at Dover Street/Ardmoulin Avenue, was being forced back up Dover Street by a missile-throwing Catholic crowd. It is clear that in his absence there had been a faction fight of some severity near the junction of Dover Street and Divis Street. He decided to wait in Ardmoulin Avenue until the Catholic crowd got as far as the junction and then to baton charge them back to Divis Street. This he did but shortly before he commenced the charge, 4 shots, which to the sergeant (a pistol-shooting expert) sounded like ·45 revolver shots, rang out from the Divis Street direction.

21.27 By now fire in the Sarsfield Hall was well advanced and threatening neighbouring houses. At 12 14 am Sgt Stanford contacted police control and asked them to summon the fire brigade. A few minutes later fire appliances arrived and began to deal with the Sarsfield Hall while Sgt Stanford's party formed a cordon between the firemen and the Catholic crowd on Divis Street. Stones were thrown at them and Sgt Stanford was struck for the fourth time, suffering a laceration of the nose. He was taken to a house in Beverley Street and at 12 33 am he radioed control asking for an ambulance. While he waited in the house for the ambulance to arrive, he received a report of further shooting. Control radioed him that no ambulance could get through, but a local man took him by car to the Mater Hospital. On his way up Dover Street he passed a party of police coming down the street. Almost certainly this was Sgt McPhillips' party—despatched from Glenravel Station to reinforce him after his desperate calls for help between 11 35 and 11 52 pm.

21.28 On arrival it seemed to Sgt McPhillips (whose party included another Sgt), that chaos was "reigning supreme in Dover Street". He found a crowd of USC and Protestant civilians in the mouth of Dover Street confronting 2 crowds in Divis Street, one to either side of the Dover Street junction. Sgt McPhillips thought that there were about 3 or 4 members of the RUC on the scene. He instructed the special constables to attempt to move the Protestants back up Dover Street, but in this they met with little success. In consultation with his fellow sergeant, Sgt McPhillips decided that he and 6 constables would baton charge the Catholics in Divis Street to the east of the Dover Street junction while the other sergeant would attempt to contain both the other Catholic crowd to the west and the Protestants in the mouth of Dover Street. Sgt McPhillips' charge pushed the Catholic crowd into the forecourt of Divis Flats. At about the same time 3 armoured cars drove down Divis Street from the direction of Falls Road; one was set alight by a petrol bomb but managed to drive on towards Hastings Street station. At this stage Sgt McPhillips, his fellow sergeant and their party of police officers had returned to the mouth of Dover Street where the Protestants were. In Divis Street around the mouth of Gilford Street was a Catholic crowd: another group of Catholics was in the forecourt of Divis Flats.

21.29 As the police were attempting to move the Protestants back up Dover Street, Sgt McPhillips heard a number of shots from the direction of Gilford Street and a man, Mr Herbert Roy, was shot in the chest. A policeman told the Tribunal that his shield was penetrated by a bullet and he himself injured in the same shooting incident as that in which Mr Roy was killed. S/Sgt Harpur was also at the mouth of Dover Street and he too gave evidence that three or four shots were fired from Gilford Street injuring Mr Roy who, at the time, was at the corner of Dover and Divis Streets peering round into Divis Street.

21.30 Mr H Johnston and Mr J McQuade MP (NI), who were at the mouth of Dover Street, thought the shot which killed Mr Roy had come from high up in Divis Tower, but the Tribunal is satisfied that his death was caused by a shot fired from Gilford Street. Post-mortem examination revealed that death was caused by a ·38 bullet (probably fired from a revolver) of a type different from that supplied to the RUC. The bullet entered the right side of the chest and the nature of the wound indicated that its flight was more or less horizontal.

21.31 Hearing the shots Sgt McPhillips drew his revolver and moved to the corner of Dover Street and Divis Street from where he fired three shots at a man in the mouth of Gilford Street who was firing in the general direction of Dover Street. There was more shooting from Gilford Street and St Comgall's School and two policemen were injured. A number of policemen returned this fire. Seeing an RUC sergeant shooting into the air, Sgt Harpur also drew his gun, firing three shots into the air and two shots at flashes which he saw in the Gilford Street direction.

21.32 A question of importance arises at this stage. Who began the shooting at the Dover Street/Divis Street junction? Notwithstanding the evidence of Mr Linton who thought the first shooting came from the Protestants, we find as a fact that it came from the Catholics. The first known casualties from gunfire were Mr Roy, a Protestant, and 3 police constables:* at this early stage there is no evidence of Catholic casualties. No Protestants in Dover Street were seen with guns. Sgt Stanford and Sgt McPhillips both thought that the first shots they heard came from Catholics; Sgt Stanford saw no firing from Dover Street, while Sgt McPhillips said the only firing from Dover Street was police (and USC) return of fire.

21.33 After the first shooting Sgt McPhillips sent a radio message to police control requesting an ambulance and police assistance. There was then a lull in the shooting from the Gilford Street direction. Sgt McPhillips crossed Divis Street with three men in order to see who had been firing. They moved from a position outside No 128 Divis Street to the corner of Gilford Street and at this time there was further shooting from down the street which Sgt McPhillips returned. Looking round the corner, Sgt McPhillips saw two men running towards St Comgall's block of flats.

21.34 The Catholics fired into the mouth of Dover Street because they saw Protestants and uniformed men erupting into their heartland—Divis Street. They believed that Protestants and police were co-operating to attack them. The Tribunal has no doubt that the Protestants in Dover Street saw themselves as helping the police to quell a Catholic insurrection. But the police did not seek their help, although they were far too few in numbers to prevent it being given. The police were, the Tribunal finds, genuinely trying to keep the factions apart: but they also had to defend themselves from the crowd which was attacking them.

SECTION 4—PERCY STREET UP TO ABOUT 1 AM

21.35 Fighting was taking place in Percy Street contemporaneously with that already described in Dover Street.

*Constables Stanley, Gibson and Smyth.

21.36 The evidence of the Percy Street riots is as confused as that of Dover Street. But the main features are clear enough. In each street the riots were a clash between Catholic mobs who were moving up and down Divis Street and surging into the Catholic occupied part of the two streets and Protestant mobs who were determined to keep them out of the two streets and to drive them back, and themselves to invade, Divis Street if they got the chance—as they did. The riot in Percy Street developed in the absence of the RUC but in the presence of a small force of USC who certainly lacked the strength to stop it. In the words of one witness (Mr Hutton) the B Specials lost control: and they did so in the early stages of the riot. After they lost control, some actively participated in the Protestant charges that ultimately drove the Catholics back into Divis Street and brought the Protestants themselves in force into that street.

21.37 Evidence of the commencement of disturbances in Percy Street was given by two employees of Isaac Andrews & Sons Ltd who owned the mill on the western side of Percy Street. Mr Pinder, the mill manager, and Mr. Dunbar, the Company's purchasing manager, had volunteered to spend the night fire watching at the mill.

21.38 Mr Pinder observed the build-up of crowds on Divis Street from about 9 30 pm onwards and at around 10 pm he saw a crowd at Northumberland Street singing and carrying a tricolour. Before they moved off in the direction of Hastings Street he heard someone in the crowd say "Shall we do the mill or shall we do the police barracks". Between 11 00 and 12 00, Mr. Pinder saw the crowd return and charge up Percy Street shouting and throwing stones at an opposing Protestant crowd which had appeared at the Beverley Street junction. The Protestant crowd which included one or two USC men chased the Catholics towards Divis Street. At about 1 am a digger (which, if Mr Hastings' recollection is correct, had been hi-jacked an hour or so earlier) was driven into Percy Street from Divis Street where it struck a telegraph pole a few yards up Percy Street on the left hand side. The Protestant crowd at Beverley Street then charged the vehicle throwing petrol bombs, and retired to Beverley Street.

21.39 The evidence of Mr Dunbar was in broad agreement with that of Mr Pinder. He described crowds gathering in Divis Street from 7 00 to 8 00 onwards. Between 10 30 and 11 00, a crowd marched along Divis Street past the end of Percy Street carrying the tricolour and singing the Soldier's Song. Later a crowd reappeared and entered Percy Street, some coming along Armoulin Avenue from Dover Street and others turning in from Divis Street. Mr. Dunbar described them as a fairly aggressive mob armed with stones and sticks. This Catholic crowd was met by a Protestant crowd which came out of Beverley Street into Percy Street. Battle was joined and the fighting moved to and fro in the section of Percy Street between Beverley Street and Divis Street. At first the only missiles thrown were stones, but later petrol bombs were used, first by the Catholic crowd and then by both crowds. The Catholic crowd broke into a builder's yard in Percy Street between Andrews' premises and the rear of the houses fronting on to Divis Street. Sheets of corrugated iron on wooden frames were removed and used as a barricade from behind which petrol bombs were thrown.

21.40 During this battle a civilian appeared in the front of the Protestant crowd carrying a gun (probably it was a shotgun, though Mr Dunbar, who was no expert, could not be certain) from which he fired two or three shots. No one appeared to be injured but as a result of the shooting the Catholic crowd retreated out of Percy Street on to Divis Street allowing the Protestant crowd to capture their corrugated iron barricades. USC were present in Percy Street but did not appear to take any part in the fighting; nor did they attempt to prevent it.

21.41 While other evidence given to the Tribunal differs in detail from that of Mr Pinder and Mr Dunbar, we believe that they give as fair a picture as any of the start of the trouble in Percy Street. The evidence of other witnesses, many of whom gave detailed accounts of events in Percy Street, is considered only where it refers to specific aspects of the riot which the Tribunal judges to be significant.

21.42 A number of witnesses described the discharge of the shotgun by a Protestant in Percy Street to which Mr Dunbar referred in his evidence. Mr Silvestri, a Catholic who was visiting No 122 Percy Street, heard three shotgun blasts from the Beverley Street direction. He thought that three or four youngsters in the Catholic crowd appeared to be struck by pellets. Mr Thompson, a Sub-District Commandant of the USC who had been on duty in Shankill Road until about 10 30 when he came to Percy Street, heard three loud bangs and later found two or three spent shotgun cartridges in the gutter on the east side of Percy Street about 10 yards south of the Beverley Street junction.

21.43 The evidence clearly establishes the use of a Protestant shotgun in Percy Street. The firing from this gun may have been the first shooting of the riot. While it had considerable effect locally (because it led to the Catholic retreat from Percy Street) it would be wrong to attribute to it the importance that has to be given to the heavy firing which took place in Conway Street and Cupar Street at about the same time. The evidence for the presence or use of any other firearm is tenuous. Mr Johnston, a member of Mr McKeague's Shankill Defence Association, testified that before any fighting broke out he saw a man in the Protestant crowd with what he thought was a ·45 revolver. There was no evidence that this weapon was fired.

21.44 The only indication of the use of guns on the Catholic side came from Mr Hutton, an active Protestant participant in the riot. He said that when he was standing at Beverley Street a man beside him was shot in the shoulder by what he, Mr Hutton, thought was a shotgun. He also saw flashes and heard the sound of rifle fire coming from the roof of Andrews Mill. It is possible that by this stage shotguns were being carried by some persons on each side—though direct evidence is slight. The evidence of rifle fire from the roof of Andrews Mill is also too slight for us to make a positive finding: we think there was none.

21.45 Mr Dunbar thought that the members of the USC in Percy Street did not play any part in the fighting there. Support for this observation came from the evidence of SDC Thompson who was one of the two USC officers in Percy Street. Up until about 10 30 SDC Thompson had been on duty in Shankill Road. Shortly after this time fighting broke out in Percy Street between the two crowds near the Ardmoulin Avenue junction. SDC Thompson's evidence was that he did not go more than a few yards south of Beverley Street. With only his fellow officer and 5 Special Constables with him, SDC Thompson felt powerless to intervene in the fighting. At 11 50 pm he made a 999 call for help to the police.

21.46 Evidence of active USC participation in Percy Street was given by Mr Hutton who had arrived at about 9 pm, before SDC Thompson. He noticed that there were about 20 Special Constables near the Westmoreland Street junction. Shortly afterwards all but 5 of them left Percy Street and a man who appeared to be in charge of them asked Mr Hutton if he could "get some reliable men" to help contain the crowds who were coming up from Divis Street.* Mr Hutton recruited 10–15 men. A Catholic crowd of some hundreds carrying a tricolour emerged from Ardmoulin Avenue. The Special Constables advanced as far as Cumberland Street, and on the order from the man in command the Special Constables and civilian volunteers charged. Mr Hutton took part in this charge; he was equipped with a motor-cycle helmet, a bin lid and broom handle. Without necessarily accepting all Mr Hutton's evidence in detail, the Tribunal finds that, at a fairly early stage in the Percy Street rioting, some members of the USC and some Protestant civilians co-operated in trying to drive the Catholic crowd back to Divis Street.

21.47 Mr John McKeague played an active role in the fighting in Percy Street. Wearing a crash helmet and carrying a stick he arrived there with two fellow members of the Shankill Defence Association. At the Divis Street end of Percy Street he saw a crowd moving corrugated iron barricades up in the direction of Shankill Road. Stones and petrol bombs were thrown at the Protestants from behind these barriers. A bulldozer was also being used by the Falls Road crowd. The flanks of the advancing Catholic crowd were attacked by the Protestants at Beverley Street who succeeded in capturing the movable barricades. The bulldozer was set on fire by the Protestants who emerged from Percy Street on to Divis Street where Mr McKeague says they planted a Union Jack.

21.48 The only RUC officer who appears to have been in Percy Street before about 1 am was Sgt Stanford who at around midnight left Dover Street for Percy Street to investigate a report that a bulldozer had been brought in by the Catholic crowd. Once in Percy Street he found a crowd of 100–120 Protestants to the north of Ardmoulin Avenue and a Catholic crowd of 100, perhaps less, between Ardmoulin Avenue and Divis Street. In front of the Catholic crowd a man driving a mechanical digger (yellow, tracked) was trying to knock down a telegraph pole on the opposite side of Divis Street from Ardmoulin Avenue. Sgt Stanford and his men baton charged the crowd around the bulldozer and the man driving it jumped off. The Divis Street crowd then threw a petrol bomb into the cab of the vehicle. The police were then forced by the Catholic crowd to retreat to Ardmoulin Avenue from where Sgt Stanford saw a petrol bomb thrown at the bulldozer by a member of the Protestant crowd.

*SDC Thompson denied that either he or his fellow officer had asked Mr Hutton to recruit "reliable men".

The vehicle caught fire but despite this it was again driven a few yards by a member of the Catholic crowd. Sgt Stanford sent a radio message to police control which is probably that recorded in the log at five minutes past midnight: "In the absence of assistance will have to withdraw". Police control asked him to wait for a reply and shortly afterwards, having received the order to withdraw, he returned along Ardmoulin Avenue to Dover Street. Sgt Stanford gave evidence that on this brief excursion into Percy Street he saw SDC Thompson—although Mr Thompson was quite unaware of the police charge from Ardmoulin Avenue described by the Sergeant.

21.49 The evidence of Sgt Stanford, SDC Thompson, Mr Dunbar and Mr Pinder indicates that the bulldozer or excavator incident took place at around midnight after there had been considerable faction fighting in Percy Street. It would appear from the evidence of the two journalists, Mr Hastings and Mr Managh, that the bulldozer had been hi-jacked earlier in the evening when crowds were gathering in Divis Street and before trouble had broken out in Percy Street. Their timing of its entry into Percy Street is earlier than that of other witnesses, but is less likely to be correct.

SECTION 5—DOVER STREET AND DIVIS STREET:

DEATHS OF PATRICK ROONEY AND HUGH McCABE

21.50 The outbreak of shooting at the Dover Street/Divis Street junction, which resulted in the death of Mr Herbert Roy and injury to a number of police officers, has already been described. It was witnessed from a distance by HC Gray who was outside Hastings Street RUC station. He saw a crowd rush out of Dover Street into Divis Street, move back towards the mouth of Divis Street and then heard five or six shots from that direction. A few seconds later HC Gray heard more shots. These shots occurred a few minutes after 12 33 am, the time when Sgt Stanford sent his radio message (overheard by the Head Constable) that he had retired, injured, to 29 Beverley Street. HC Gray reported the shooting to police control and was immediately directed to take his Commer vehicle and crew to Dover Street where he arrived shortly before 1 am. The scene that he saw was one of confusion and uproar. Women were screaming; a policeman was brought to his vehicle with a bullet wound in his thigh; a civilian, Herbert Roy, lay dying on the footpath. Sarsfield Hall was on fire; the fire brigade was endeavouring to put it out. (In fact not one, but three policemen had sustained gunshot wounds.)

21.51 Head Constable Gray sent a radio request for Shorland armoured vehicles, while he himself with a Sergeant and two constables, one of whom was armed with a Sterling SMG, moved down Dover Street to its junction with Divis Street. Here the Sterling gunner fired a burst from his weapon, after which the Head Constable became aware that his men were coming under fire from the corner of Ardmoulin Street; he saw flashes and heard shots which sounded heavier than those from an "ordinary revolver". It may have been the shooting from HC Gray's Sterling gunner which Sergeant McPhillips heard ("light-automatic", "possibly Sterling") coming from the direction of Divis Street after he crossed it in pursuit of the gunman who had been firing from Gilford Street. (If this is so, it will be noted, not for the only time, that what one police officer took to be hostile gunfire was in fact that of a fellow officer.) It may also have been the incident which was described by Mr McCann, who saw a uniformed man firing along Divis Street from outside the Arkle bar at the mouth of Dover Street. This fire was apparently returned from the mouth of Derby Street by a civilian with a machine gun. HC Gray now became aware that there were police on the far side of Divis Street; he gave them covering fire from the Sterling which, with the added protection of an armoured vehicle which had arrived on the scene, enabled Sgt McPhillips and his three men to return to the safety of Dover Street.

21.52 Mr Hastings also witnessed the scenes in Dover Street at about this time. At the mouth of Dover Street he saw a number of policemen firing Sterling guns and revolvers. He could not be sure at what targets they were firing but they seemed to be shooting in the general direction of Divis Flats.* With the police were a number of youths carrying dustbin lids. When asked by Mr Hastings what these youths were doing mingling with the police a senior police officer (probably the HC) replied that they were defending their homes. At about 1 am three Shorland armoured vehicles with ·30 Browning machine guns mounted on them, reached Dover Street in response to HC Gray's request. By now HC Gray assessed his situation as critical, even warlike. He thought that a determined attempt was still being made to shoot the police.

21.53 In the Tribunal's opinion this was a fair assessment: and in judging subsequent police action it must be constantly borne in mind. It is significant that HC Gray did believe that there was shooting not only from the St Comgall's school direction but also from the flats—as at this stage Mr Hastings also thought was possible. Other police also believed it: for instance, as the HC's Sterling gunner withdrew with Sgt McPhillips' party from Divis Street into Dover Street, he fired a burst towards the flats. The HC commented that he had heard a burst from the flats before his gunner fired this burst.†

21.54 With the arrival of the Shorlands HC Gray withdrew all his men into Dover Street. The firing had scattered the civilians: there were now very few Protestants about, and no Catholics nearer than St Comgall's school on one side and the precincts of the flats on the other. It is clear that the Protestant crowd which before HC Gray's arrival had broken out of Dover Street into Divis Street had been driven back by Catholic gun-fire.

21.55 The HC now made his plan: it was to move the Shorlands into Divis Street with the object of dispersing the mobs near Percy Street and putting a stop to Catholic gunfire. He described to the sergeant in the leading Shorland the situation as he saw it:

> "that we were being fired at from the streets on the left and St Comgall's school . . . that the police station was being fired on from the flats . . . that a civilian and two police had been shot".

*Mr Hastings thought he might have seen one or two shots from the flats, but he could not say with certainty.

†The Tribunal's finding as to the extent of firing from the flats (it was limited to some shots from the roof of the Whitehall block) is stated in 21.166. But we accept that HC Gray believed there was firing from the flats.

He himself had observed someone shooting at the police from Ardmoulin Street and the school: and he believed he had heard firing from the flats. The information about the police station he had derived from overhearing a radio message at 1 2 am:—

"Hastings Street Station under fire from low storey flats opposite station".

He then instructed the Sergeant to take his vehicles up Divis Street, to fire in the air to disperse the crowd and, if fired on, to fire for effect. The Shorlands turned right into Divis Street from Dover Street in the direction of Northumberland Street. Almost immediately HC Gray heard shooting from the school direction followed by short bursts of Browning fire from the Shorlands. The three vehicles then came back along Divis Street towards the flats and HC Gray heard a mixture of light shooting and heavy Browning fire, as they went down towards Hastings Street.

21.56 HC Gray was at this stage joined by DI Cushley who had come to Dover Street after receiving reports of shooting and himself hearing the sound of shots. When he arrived, a fire appliance was still fighting the fire at the Sarsfield Hall; but the firemen were complaining that they were being shot at from Divis Towers, and soon afterwards withdrew. DI Cushley also heard the Browning fire. He ascertained, and approved of, the orders HC Gray had given to the Shorland crew.

21.57 The Shorlands, having reached Hastings Street turned and came up past the flats: HC Gray heard the same sort of mixed firing as before. At this moment in consultation with DI Cushley he ordered their commanders to cease firing and return to Dover Street. On their return he placed two vehicles in the mouth of Dover Street, one facing up and the other down Divis Street. The Shorlands operation appeared to him to have been a success, and at 1 11 am hours he radioed that firing had ceased in Dover Street. He now gave orders to the occupants of all three vehicles, instructing them "that there was to be no further firing unless absolutely necessary". DI Cushley said that he too gave orders that if gunmen were in crowds the Brownings could fire over their heads to disperse the crowd; that they could engage identifiable targets and that bursts were to be kept short.

21.58 The evidence adduced puts beyond doubt that during the period that the three vehicles were in Divis Street a considerable number of rounds of Browning ammunition were discharged in the direction of the flats on the south side of Divis Street. The episode is of critical importance and we return to it later.* It is sufficient to say at this stage of the narrative that the Tribunal finds that this firing, from Browning machine guns mounted on Shorland armoured cars, fatally injured Patrick Rooney, a boy of 9, in his home at No 5 St Brendan's Path, in Divis Street flats.

21.59 The injury to the boy was reported to HC Gray by Mr Hastings and an ambulance was summoned to Dover Street by the Head Constable at 1 19 am. Having seen the boy into the ambulance Mr Hastings left Dover Street and returned in the company of a Mr Bryan who was carrying a white flag and requesting help for the injured in the flats. Mr Gray offered to send one of his constables, Constable Officer, who had experience of First Aid, over to the flats to attend the injured. The offer was accepted and Mr Hastings, Constable Officer and Mr Bryan crossed Divis Street and entered the flats. Before leaving Dover Street Constable Officer took the precaution of removing his tunic and neck-tie so that he would not be readily recognised as a police officer. Within the flats Constable Officer treated about six people for what he assumed were gunshot wounds, in the Gilford, St Brendan's and Whitehall blocks. In the end flat on the top floor of the Whitehall block he saw a priest giving the last rites to a man whom on recollection he took to be Hugh McCabe.

21.60 Eventually ambulance men arrived and some of the injured were removed to hospital. During the period when they were inside the flats neither Mr Bryan, Mr Hastings nor Constable Officer saw any firearms or heard any being used by the occupants of the flats. Mr Hastings did however see a large number of crates of petrol bombs and Constable Officer also saw men carrying liquid-filled bottles which he assumed were petrol bombs.

21.61 At one of their meetings HC Gray and Mr Bryan discussed the possibility of a "truce". After this Mr Bryan summoned a Mr B from the flats to act as spokesman. Accounts of the ensuing negotiations given by the three witnesses differ. Two aspects are important. HC Gray said that Mr B told him there were people in the flats who were not wanted there but who were afraid to leave as the police were waiting in Pound Street. On being told that these persons were free to escape by other routes Mr B went back to the flats, returning to HC Gray about 20 minutes later with the news that all people not connected with the flats had left so that there would be no further trouble. The second important aspect of these negotiations was Mr Bryan's evidence, that he and others, including Mr B, decided on one of their visits to Dover Street to give the police the impression that there were firearms in the flats. He stated that this was done, even though they were persuaded that there were no weapons, in order to deter the police from taking further measures against the people in the flats.

21.62 The other person killed by gunfire in Divis Flats was a soldier on leave, Trooper Hugh McCabe. He was shot at about 1 am while he was on the roof of the staircase built on to the north (Divis Street) end of the Whitehall block. The detailed circumstances of Mr McCabe's death are considered in a subsequent section.* It is sufficient here to record that the Tribunal finds that he was shot by a police marksman from the roof of Hastings Street station.

SECTION 6—CONWAY STREET AND CUPAR STREET

Introduction

21.63 Although the most violent disturbances in the Divis Street/Lower Falls area on the night of 14/15 August took place in Divis Street, Percy Street and Dover Street, there was also serious rioting in Cupar Street,

*Section 10.

Conway Street and a number of smaller neighbouring streets. While [illegible] were no deaths and fewer injuries in this area, it appears that firearms were [illegible] both by and at the police before they were brought into use in Dover [illegible] or Percy Street. The first shooting from an RUC Shorland armoured car [illegible] place at Conway Street/Falls Road. Property damage was severe too: [illegible] houses were destroyed in Conway Street than in any other street in the city.

21.64 Conway Street and Cupar Street run northwards from the [illegible] Road some 500 yards to the west of the Percy Street/Divis Street junction. They are separated by Norfolk Street, which runs parallel to them, and [illegible] nected by David Street. The events with which the Tribunal was concerned [illegible] place in the part of Cupar Street to the south of Argyle Street and in the part [illegible] Conway Street south of Ashmore Street. These are the exclusively Catholic occupied sections of the two streets. Norfolk Street and David Street (in which there were only three houses) are also Catholic streets.

21.65 Early in the evening of 14 August there had been rumours among Catholic residents of Conway Street that the Protestants planned to attack [illegible] that night. Some residents boarded up their windows with hardboard, [illegible] even evacuated their homes. Mr Sloan, a Protestant, formed the impression that by about 6 pm all the houses in Conway Street south of Ashmore Street had been evacuated, in preparation for a riot.

21.66 At about 10 pm HC Rooney left Springfield Road RUC station (where he had been station sergeant for the previous eight years) with 28 men in two Commer armoured vehicles and after assisting in the dispersal of a crowd attacking Hastings Street station he commenced a border patrol of streets connecting Falls Road with Shankill Road. He found small groups of people on the streets, particularly at Ashmore Street/Conway Street and Percy Street.

21.67 At about 10 30 pm in response to a radio message HC Owens and two land rovers met HC Rooney and his men at this junction. About 200 civilians had assembled there. HC Owens gave evidence that they were restless but not riotous; some of them wore motor-cycle crash helmets and carried Union Jacks, sticks and bottles. They appeared to him to be hostile towards the police on the Falls Road. Before HC Rooney left he instructed HC Owens to relieve him and prevent this Protestant crowd from advancing any nearer the Falls Road.

Cupar Street

21.68 HC Rooney took his two Commer vehicles to Cupar Street in response to a radio message that there was trouble there. He arrived at about 11 30 pm. At the David Street junction (which marks the religious divide in Cupar Street) he found two crowds of about the same size, totalling 400 people, throwing stones and petrol bombs at each other. HC Rooney said his first action was to drive his vehicles between the crowds and baton charge the Catholic crowd back down Cupar Street in the direction of Falls Road. His reason for this was that the Catholic rather than the Protestant crowd was that they, and not the Protestants, were throwing missiles at his men.

21.69 One member of HC Rooney's party, Constable Elliott, gave evidence that after the police had dismounted from the two vehicles they pushed the Protestant crowd back before baton charging the Catholics. Although the [illegible] Constable denied it, we think it likely that the police did push back the Protestants before dealing with the Catholic crowd. Constable Elliott also [illegible]ed that there were houses on fire in Cupar Street when the police arrived. [illegible] this was denied by HC Rooney. But we prefer the evidence of Constable [illegible]ott on both these points; coupled with that of Mr Cormican (see below) it [illegible]sts that the Protestant crowd was the more aggressive of the two.

21.70 During the first baton charge against the Catholics the Protestant [illegible]d followed HC Rooney's men down towards the Falls Road; this crowd [illegible] then ushered back up Cupar Street to the Argyle Street junction. Although [illegible] members of HC Rooney's party were detailed to keep the Protestants [illegible], they do not appear to have been successful.

21.71 As the Catholic crowd again came up Cupar Street from Falls Road [illegible]ing missiles, a second baton charge was mounted and again the Protestants [illegible]ed. In neither of these two charges did HC Rooney make contact with [illegible]Catholic crowd. During this period the Catholic crowd was throwing missiles [illegible] police, while the Protestants were throwing missiles over their heads [illegible]ds the Catholics.* It will be noted that during this phase—and indeed at [illegible]er times in this area on the night of 14/15—the Catholic crowd never [illegible]eir own territory, which was, however, "invaded" by Protestants.

21.72 While leading one of these baton charges HC Rooney heard three [illegible], probably revolver, coming from the Catholic crowd in front of him. [illegible]able Elliott remembered seeing a man come out from the Catholic crowd, [illegible]down on one knee and fire on the police. HC Rooney drew his own revolver [illegible]ired one shot in the air. He ordered his men to take cover and moved [illegible]rotestant civilians into Argyle Street out of the range of the gunfire. A [illegible] was then pushed up Cupar Street and set alight by the Catholics. Soon [illegible]wards HC Rooney noticed that two houses at the end of Norfolk Street on [illegible]side of David Street junction were on fire. A public house, Finnegans', at [illegible] Street/Cupar Street in front of which the Protestant crowd was standing [illegible]also set on fire, he assumed by someone in the crowd. HC Rooney tried to [illegible] with the Protestants and get them to go home but they remained, saying [illegible]y were there to help the police.

21.73 The fire brigade was summoned and, after HC Rooney had shouted [illegible]Catholic crowd behind a barricade at Norfolk Street/David Street to go [illegible] began to deal with the two fires at the end of Norfolk Street. The records [illegible] Belfast Fire Brigade indicate that three calls to Norfolk Street were [illegible]d at 11 42 pm.

21.74 After the fire brigade had left more fires broke out in Norfolk Street [illegible] whole street eventually caught fire. HC Rooney saw a fire appliance in

* There were 3 baton charges led by HC Rooney against the Catholic crowd in Cupar [illegible]

FS 1. 320

Cupar Street but the officer in charge would not go into Norfolk Street because he believed there there was shooting there. Shortly after the fire brigade had left Norfolk Street a man from the Protestant crowd ran down Cupar Street towards the burning lorry. There was the sound of automatic fire from the Falls Road end of Cupar Street and the man fell to the ground. When rescued by two policemen under covering fire from a Sterling and a revolver he was found to be uninjured but drunk.

21.75 Another account of events in Cupar Street in the early part of the night 14/15 was given by Mr Cormican, a Catholic. At about 11 pm he saw a crowd of 150-200 people at the junction of Falls Road and Cupar Street; some of them were throwing missiles at an opposing crowd near David Street who were returning them. A small number of petrol bombs was thrown by either side and at 11 15 pm (timed precisely by Mr Cormican) a petrol bomb was thrown into the upstairs window of a house in the middle of the block on the east side of Cupar Street. The house caught fire and more petrol bombs were thrown at other houses in the block from which the residents fled in their nightwear.

21.76 At around 11 30 pm Mr Cormican was aware of a bullet passing down Cupar Street, fired from the Argyle Street end. More single shots and bursts of automatic fire followed. His recollection was that he counted [illegible] fire or hand over their guns. At 20 minute intervals there were [illegible] Falls Road end and the police who were in Argyle Street fired into the air. From their position they were unable to see along the length of Cupar Street.

21.78 Who started the shooting? While we accept Mr Cormican as a witness who told the truth to the best of his recollection, we find, despite his suggestion to the contrary, that the first shooting in Cupar Street came from the Catholic crowd and that the police did not use their guns until they themselves were fired on. There is no evidence of any firearm in the hands of a Protestant civilian.

21.79 According to Tribunal records (Exhibit 55) two Protestant civilians were injured by gunshots in Cupar Street and one in Argyle Street. No police officer sustained a gunshot wound and no evidence is available to establish whether Catholic gunshot casualties occurred. According to HC Rooney, by about 1 am the situation in Cupar Street had quietened down although there were still two crowds, one Catholic and one Protestant, watching one another. At about this time HC Rooney moved into Conway Street.

Conway Street

21.80 As has been stated, HC Owens and his party of 14 men had taken over from HC Rooney at Conway Street/Ashmore Street/First Street at about 10 30 pm. The crowd there was hostile to the Catholics of the Falls Road area: they were talking of the events of the previous night—the wrecking of Messrs Isaac Agnew's car showrooms on the corner of Conway Street and the throwing of a hand grenade at the police in Leeson Street. The crowd grew in size to about 300 and HC Owens became aware that an opposing crowd was gathering nearer to the Falls Road end of Conway Street. Mr Donnelly, a Catholic resident of Conway Street, described both crowds as being in "a very ugly mood". HC Ownes radioed for reinforcements.

21.81 A section of the Protestant crowd (about 40-60) surged forward down Conway Street. Police in HC Owens' party succeeded in stopping them from advancing beyond David Street; some individuals turned right into David Street. The Head Constable went into David Street from where he was able to see petrol bombs being thrown at policemen on foot and a police armoured vehicle at the David Street/Cupar Street junction. HC Owens sent the following radio messages to police control at 11 24 "Both parties now fighting in Cupar Street, police assistance required", and "Fighting in Cupar Street". HC Owens was, however, unable to lend any assistance in Cupar Street; [illegible] when he tried to cross the junction of David Street with Norfolk Street, his

Mr Donnelly was similar to that of HC Owens. At first Conway Street was quiet since the Protestant crowd at Ashmore Street and the Catholic crowd at the Falls Road end were well separated. In response to a police request for assistance in dispersing the Catholic crowd, Mr Donnelly spoke to a Councillor Lavelle who succeeded in temporarily clearing them from the street. Fierce fighting then broke out in Cupar Street, David Street and Norfolk Street. A house at the David Street end of Norfolk Street was set on fire. The Catholic crowd which had reformed at the Falls Road end of Conway Street began to move up towards David Street. The Protestants gradually moved towards them. Missiles were exchanged. Mr Donnelly then saw police in David Street mount a baton charge against the Catholic crowd, forcing them back to the Falls Road.

21.83 This baton charge was probably that which HC Owens with 5 or 6 men (the rest of his party remained at Ashmore Street/Conway Street) launched against the Catholic crowd which, he said, had begun to throw missiles at his party in David Street. Mr Donnelly testified that the police were followed in their charge by Protestant civilians. We think this likely since the attention of the Head Constable and his men must have been monopolised by the Catholic crowd which was attacking them. During the charge HC Owens heard three single shots (possibly ·45 revolver) coming from the Catholic crowd. The police party retreated to David Street where a man was lying on the ground, apparently having been shot.

21.84 HC Owens heard other shots and he and his men fired a volley of shots in the air. Only revolvers were used at this time. The shooting from the Falls Road direction continued and HC Owens authorised his party to fire for effect. This time at least two short bursts were fired from a Sterling. Most of the Catholic crowd drew back down Conway Street to the Falls Road but some remained in shop doorways. There was further shooting, but none by the police.

21.85 Shortly afterwards HC Owens discovered that a second civilian appeared to have been shot at the Conway Street/Ashmore Street junction and at 25 minutes past midnight he sent the following radio message: "Conway Street/Shankill Road 2 persons shot". Although HC Owens was not aware of it at the time, one of his police constables, Constable Harris, had also received a gunshot injury. Tribunal records indicate that one Catholic and one Protestant civilian were shot in Conway Street.*

21.86 As a result of the shooting, at 7 minutes past midnight HC Owens sent a radio request for "heavy vehicles"; the call was answered by the arrival a few minutes later of three Shorland vehicles from the Shankill Road direction. He told the commander of the leading vehicle that they had been under fire from further down Conway Street. The vehicles moved off down Conway Street, two abreast with the third behind. At the end of Conway Street they turned right into Falls Road. As it turned one vehicle (probably the last) was illuminated by petrol bombs thrown at it and a burst of Browning gunfire was discharged from it.

21.87 The vehicle which opened fire on this occasion was the one commanded by Mr U.† He believed that he made two journeys down Conway Street into the Falls Road, while the HC spoke of only one. Be that as it may, the Tribunal is satisfied that there was a shooting incident which involved his vehicle as it turned from Conway Street into the Falls Road. His gunner Mr Y heard shots from the rear and saw a man firing "what appeared to be a service Colt ·45 automatic" at the vehicle. He shouted to Mr U who ordered him to fire a burst over the head of the gunman. Mr Y then fired the burst from the Browning machine gun. Mr Y thought the shots might have struck the gable end of No 29 Falls Road which is on the corner of Norfolk Street. The two vehicles travelled up the Falls Road to about the junction with Grosvenor Road where they turned and drove back down the Falls Road towards the city.

*Also 2 Catholics in Balaclava Street and one in Raglan Street.

†Evidence taken from witnesses in these Shorlands was given anonymously and in secret. A transcript of this evidence with letters substituted for the witnesses' names was later published (Appendix I).

21.88 It is not possible for the Tribunal to determine whether Mr U's vehicle was in fact fired on in Conway Street. (Mr Donnelly who saw an armoured vehicle open fire at about midnight said he heard no other shooting.) But the Tribunal accepts that Mr Y believed that his vehicle was being fired on and that he responded by firing in the air.

21.89 We find as a fact that the Shorlands answered the Head Constable's call for heavy vehicles and that from one of them, Mr U's vehicle, there was machine gun fire into the air in the general direction of the Falls Road. This firing, which occurred shortly after 12 40 am, was the first Browning fire of the night and was heard, and its tracer seen, in many parts of the city.

SECTION 7—PERCY STREET AFTER 1 am

21.90 It is now convenient to return to Percy Street which became the centre of activity from about 1 am onwards.

21.91 After the shooting in Dover Street, Mr Linton (a soldier of the Royal Irish Rangers at home on leave) ran along Divis Street to the mouth of Percy Street. In Percy Street he saw a large Protestant crowd and a smaller Catholic crowd near the Divis Street junction. He saw two men from the Catholic side fire revolvers up Percy Street: but not before shooting had begun from the Protestant side. On one occasion 50 or 60 members of the Protestant crowd from Percy Street came on to Divis Street and set fire to a newspaper shop on the western corner of the Percy Street/Divis Street junction. Mr Pinder (Andrews Mill) also testified that property on Divis Street to the west of Percy Street was set on fire at about this time. Mr Pinder's fellow employee, Mr Dunbar, gave evidence that property on either side of the junction with Divis Street went on fire shortly after the Protestants in Percy Street had broken through to Divis Street.

21.92 Although the evidence is not clear, it may have been at about this time that a block of six shops with residential accommodation above them on the north side of Divis Street between Dover Street and Percy Street was set on fire. Protestants who had got out on to Divis Street from Percy Street were probably responsible for this: HC Gray saw some of them throwing petrol bombs at "the bank and a few yards on the Dover Street side of Percy Street". Mr Silvestri lived in one of these houses (No 141). He heard boarding being ripped from the front of the houses and although he succeeded in putting out one fire which had started in his premises, another fire spread from neighbouring buildings and Mr Silvestri's house was destroyed. Because of the amount of shooting the members of the fire service were unable to deal with these fires and with the fire at the Arkle Bar, a fact which must have contributed to the severity of the fire damage in the area.

21.93 One of the houses (No 161) in Divis Street to the west of Percy Street which were destroyed by fire on the night of 14/15 August was then occupied by a Mr Shannon. He said that after three armoured vehicles had come down

Percy Street about 200 Protestants emerged from Percy Street on to Divis Street. Some of them jumped on to the railings surrounding St Comgall's School and threw petrol bombs at the building, which was not, however, set on fire. (Mr Pinder also saw members of the Protestant crowd climb on to the railings in front of the school.) Petrol bombs were then thrown at the houses on the north side of Divis Street to either side of Percy Street. The windows of No 161 were broken by a flagpole carrying a Union Jack and petrol bombs were flying into the house. Mr Shannon and his family were then forced to make their escape from the rear of the house over the roof of Andrews Mill to safety.

21.94 Many witnesses observed the throwing of petrol bombs into St Comgall's School. Mr Linton said that this was done by a crowd of 40–50, some of whom were wearing police uniform. According to Mr Silvestri about a dozen members of this crowd were brandishing guns. Mr McKeague gave evidence that a large number of Protestants took over the section of Divis Street between the mouth of Percy Street and Gilford Street. Some USC tried to get the Protestants back into Percy Street but it was an impossible task for them. Some Protestants remained on Divis Street for a considerable period of time.

21.95 Police accounts of these events were given by DI Cushley and HC Gray. From their position at Dover Street/Divis Street these two officers observed the flare-up of fighting at the Percy Street/Divis Street junction. As there was no police officer above the rank of sergeant at that location, DI Cushley took a party of men via Ardmoulin Avenue to Percy Street. There he witnessed a "knot of incensed Protestants" breaking through an irregular police cordon and throwing petrol bombs at both St Comgall's school and the newspaper shop on the corner of Percy Street. These events took place at about 1 30 am (the police log records the following message from DI Cushley at 1 33: "fighting in Percy Street—crowd out of control"). HC Gray overheard this transmission and seeing for himself that the Protestant crowd were throwing petrol bombs, ordered one of the Shorland armoured vehicles at Divis Street/Dover Street to fire a burst over the heads of the crowd. This forced the crowd to run back up Percy Street allowing the police "to regain some sort of control".

21.96 After the initial petrol bomb attack on St Comgall's School, Mr Linton and others entered the building to extinguish a fire which had started. Their fear was that, if the school was destroyed, St Peter's Church would then be vulnerable to attack*. After they had been in the school for a short time about 3 or 4 men entered the school carrying two weapons which Mr Linton took to be Thompson sub-machine guns and one or more revolvers. It is not to be doubted that these men were members of the IRA. They opened up with the two sub-machine guns against the Protestant crowd in Divis Street outside

*Mr McCann spoke of a rumour that the Protestants were going to burn this church. This was also given by Mr P Kennedy MP as the reason for building a barricade in Derby Street.

the school and Mr Linton saw at least two people shot. Hospital records suggest that up to 8 Protestants may have received bullet wounds at around this time.

21.97 At 2 06 am DI Cushley reported by radio that there had been further casualties in Percy Street and, one minute later, that there was heavy firing from St Comgall's School. He believed that the weapon being used was a Bren gun. HC Gray sent the Shorland commanded by Mr U to Percy Street and "several sustained bursts" from its Browning gun were directed at flashes which both Mr U and his gunner, Mr Y, saw coming from St Comgall's School. During the shooting exchanges at the mouth of Percy Street, a number of Protestant casualties, and a Constable Linton were brought to HC Gray's position in Dover Street.

21.98 Most witnesses are agreed that there was automatic fire (HC Gray described it as "heavy machine-gun" fire) from St Comgall's School at about 2 am and the entries in the police log support this. Mr Shannon, whose home was directly opposite the school, did not see or hear any shooting from the building; this is consistent with the timing given by other witnesses since Mr Shannon appears to have left his home at about 2 am. However, there was also direct evidence from the commanders of two Shorland vehicles, Mr X and Mr V, of shooting before 2 am. Mr X testified that when his vehicle first emerged from Dover Street into Divis Street at about 1 am after HC Gray's initial briefing "we were fired upon by an automatic weapon from St Comgall's School . . . I then ordered my gunner to fire for effect at the school. He fired three short bursts". Mr V's evidence was that a little later when his vehicle was returning along Divis Street towards Dover Street he saw flashes coming from the front of the school. He gave the order to reply and his gunner fired two bursts. Although we accept that there was some shooting from the direction of the school at about 1 am we think that the first automatic fire did not take place until about an hour later.

21.99 Examination by ballistics experts showed considerable bullet damage to the front of the school, much of which suggested high velocity fire originating from Percy Street. Neighbouring buildings also showed signs of bullet damage. Fragments found in the school appeared to have been the remains of ·30 Browning machine gun bullets and ·455 revolver bullets. Some of the damage was the result of directed shots: there were eleven sites of damage in the brickwork around the circular window above the girls' entrance and one bullet (possibly ·30 Browning) had passed through one of the glass panes in this window and damaged a number of folding wooden chairs stacked in the room within. On 25 of these chairs there were traces of dried human blood; this suggests that some of the Browning fire directed at the school found its target.

21.100 After the Shorland shooting at St Comgall's School, Mr Dunbar and Mr Pinder saw an armoured vehicle in Percy Street discharge some shots at the roof of Andrews Mill. The commanders of two of the Shorlands, Mr X and Mr V, gave evidence of shooting towards Andrews Mill at 3 am (Mr V) and after daybreak (Mr X), but both witnesses said they were in Divis Street and not in Percy Street at the time. However, a ballistics expert, Mr Price reported seeing numerous bullet holes in a concentrated area on an exterior wall of a building facing Percy Street. He thought this damage indicated automatic fire from Percy Street.

21.101 Mr Hastings, who was in Percy Street and Beverley Street in the early hours of the morning, described both regular and special constables firing towards Andrews Mill from Beverley Street. All this police shooting appears to have been prompted by the belief that there was a sniper operating from the roof: Mr V and S/Sgt Harpur testified to seeing muzzle flashes coming from there. However, neither Mr Pinder nor Mr Dunbar who were on or about the mill premises for most of the night saw any sign of an unauthorised person. The only targets for police fire which Mr Hastings could see were figures on the roof whom the police eventually decided were night watchmen. HC Gray gave evidence that he ordered both RUC and USC officers who had been firing in the direction of Andrews Mill to cease firing. His Sterling gunner was instructed to keep an eye on the rooftops and fire single shots if necessary.

21.102 At some time between 3 and 4 am cartridges of CS gas were discharged on to the mill roof to dislodge the supposed sniper. This was the only occasion on which CS gas was used in Belfast by the RUC during the August disturbances*.

21.103 It is not possible for the Tribunal to make a firm finding whether or not there was a sniper operating from the roof of Andrews Mill on the night of 14/15. On the evidence we think it unlikely that there was and that any figures seen on the roof were night watchmen or night-shift employees, in either case innocent of any shooting. There was some evidence (from Mr Pinder and Mr Shannon) of firing from another mill—the New Northern at Northumberland Street/Divis Street. Some witnesses even claimed to have seen uniformed gunmen on the roof of this building. Mr McCormick, for instance, testified that at about 2 am he saw four men armed with rifles with which they fired about 30–40 shots. As with Andrews Mill, it is not possible to make any finding. Dispersed and sporadic gunfire was part of the general scene that night; and observers would naturally attribute it to different sources, depending not only on their physical location but on what, consciously or subconsciously, they were expecting to see.

21.104 The last shooting in the Divis Street/Dover Street area was at about 3 30 am when a Shorland, probably the vehicle commanded by Mr X, at the mouth of Dover Street fired a burst in reply to a burst of automatic fire which came from the direction of St Comgall's School.

*CS gas was used by the army in the Clonard area on the night of 15/16 August. Permission to use CS gas on the night of 14/15 August was sought by the Commissioner, Mr Wolseley. According to the Deputy Commissioner it was granted between 1 and 2 am. The then Minister of Home Affairs, Mr Porter, gave evidence that he consented to the use of CS in the Cupar Street/Conway Street area. Mr Porter understood that it was not used there. He appears to have been unaware of the use of CS in Percy Street.

SECTION 8—THE BURNING OF CONWAY STREET

21.105 After the first shooting from the Catholic crowd in Conway Street the Protestants at Ashmore Street, to use the words of HC Owens, "ran completely amok". Shuttering from the windows of some of the houses in Conway Street was pulled down and petrol bombs were thrown into them. HC Owens said he did not have the manpower to prevent this or make any arrests. HC Rooney, who had moved into Conway Street, saw a fire appliance which was tending a fire at one of a group of houses between Ashmore Street and David Street which were ablaze. When the appliance left the fire was still burning. There was a Protestant crowd in this area dancing around the burning houses. HC Rooney was unable to persuade them to disperse. According to HC Rooney between 2 am and 7 am there were no crowd clashes in Conway Street where he spent most of the rest of the night.

21.106 Mr Sloan gave a graphic account of the effect the shooting from the Falls Road end of Conway Street, and the injury to the policeman, had on the Protestant crowd. He said that they were in a frenzy because they believed the police were not interested in defending them and that they wanted the police either to hand over their guns or to return the fire directly at the Catholic crowd. Mr Sloan claimed to have seen a police officer firing a sub-machine gun into the air. He saw about ten people from the back of the Protestant crowd throw petrol bombs into houses in Conway Street near the Ashmore Street junction and set them on fire.

21.107 The houses which HC Owens saw set on fire were three of those in the block between Ashmore Street and David Street. The fire brigade was summoned at about 2 am and two appliances arrived. As firemen were dealing with the blazing house there was a burst of machine gun fire up Conway Street from the Falls Road direction. At first the firemen sheltered behind a wall, but later they withdrew. Although HC Owens claimed only to have seen three houses on fire in the block to the north of David Street when the fire brigade arrived, the entry in the fire records of the Belfast Fire Brigade states "Approximately 25 houses well alight 3 jets forced to withdraw due to gunfire". HC Owens' evidence was that it was only after the fire brigade had left that the fire spread from house to house as far as David Street.

21.108 At around 3 am one of HC Owens' constables noticed flames in an upstairs room of Kilfeathers public house on the corner of Ashmore Street and Conway Street. The police extinguished the fire and the building was intact when HC Owens left the area at about 4 am. As he had to conduct a prosecution at Petty Sessions later in the morning he handed over charge to one of his sergeants. He was not aware that he was relieved by anyone at this time although he acknowledged the possibility that another Head Constable, HC Johnston, could have disembarked from the armoured vehicle which was sent to take him back to Hastings Street. HC Johnston gave evidence that the police party which he and his 14 men relieved on arriving at Conway Street at 4 30 am did in fact return to Hastings Street in the Commer armoured vehicle which had brought his party. At Ashmore Street/Conway Street/First Street HC Johnston found a crowd of about 200 Protestants. About 10 houses in the block between Ashmore Street and David Street had been damaged by fire. Houses in the block opposite had also been burned. There was a fire engine in Conway Street to the north of Ashmore Street. Kilfeathers public house had been looted and some members of the Protestant crowd were the worse for drink. At 6 am HC Johnston was ordered to Musgrave Street station. He had no clear recollection of being relieved by other police but assumed that the vehicle in which he left Conway Street must have brought a relief party. He thought the relief party comprised four or five constables and a sergeant.

21.109 Two police officers who gave evidence to the Tribunal, Sgt Palmer and Const Elliott, may have been in this party although neither recollected seeing HC Johnston. They arrived in Conway Street in a Commer armoured vehicle at about 6 am. Both thought that their party was commanded by HC Rooney although Sgt Palmer was not quite certain whether he travelled with them in the vehicle or joined them after their arrival in Conway Street. Another armoured vehicle, probably a Shorland, was already stationed in Conway Street.

21.110 Sgt Palmer said that when he arrived a number of houses in the blocks between David Street and Falls Road were on fire. The block on the east side of Conway Street had been on fire but the fire had died down. Most of the block between Ashmore Street and David Street had been burned or were still burning. Const Elliott described seeing fires spreading from one house to another. Sgt Palmer and Const Elliott left Conway Street at about 9 am. Their evidence was that during the three-hour period that they were on duty no buildings were set on fire by individuals and although there were small crowds at the Ashmore Street and Falls Road end of Conway Street there were no clashes or disturbances of any kind.

21.111 It is almost impossible to reconcile this evidence with that of either HC Rooney or HC Johnston. HC Rooney's evidence was that all was quiet in Conway Street when he left at 7 am. Shortly afterwards at about 7 45 am he returned with 24 men to Conway Street where he found a man lying injured and saw Catholics evacuating their homes at the Falls Road end of Conway Street. It is conceivable that Sgt Palmer and Constable Elliott were in this party although it will be remembered that they both gave a time of arrival about 1 hour 45 minutes earlier than HC Rooney suggested.

21.112 Conflicting recollections about times are perhaps to be expected but when Const Elliott and Sgt Palmer's account is compared with that of HC Johnston further discrepancies appear.

21.113 At about 7 am in response to a radio call for assistance at Conway Street HC Johnston returned there, this time with two Commer armoured vehicles and about 25 men. At the junction of Conway Street and David Street he found two crowds engaged in hand to hand conflict. Houses between David Street and Ashmore Street were burning and some houses between David Street and Falls Road were also alight. One house on the opposite side of David Street and houses in Norfolk Street were also burning. A fire appliance arrived but most of the fires were out of control. HC Johnston was told (by Protestants) that a Catholic crowd had advanced up Conway Street and that the Protestants had counter attacked. But Catholic people on the streets told him that residents had merely been attempting to remove furniture from their houses: they had no aggressive intent. At one stage HC Johnston summoned an armoured car to deal with a suspected sniper but it was a false alarm and after the vehicle had entered Conway Street from the Shankill Road end it returned in the direction from which it had come. This was probably Mr X's vehicle. He gave evidence that at daybreak his Shorland was sent to Conway Street/Ashmore Street as it had been reported that there was a sniper on the roof of Lawther & Harvey's premises in Cupar Street. He thought his vehicle was the only one sent there on that occasion; the Browning gun was not discharged.

21.114 In some of the burned out houses HC Johnston noticed that the gas meter was missing and a flame was burning from the end of the pipe. Some time after 11 am HC Johnston and his party left the area.

21.115 A number of Catholic witnesses, including two Northern Ireland MPs, Mr P Devlin and Mr P Kennedy, gave evidence that at about 7 am Protestants in Conway Street continued to break windows in and set fire to Catholic houses while police in vehicles either took no action or chased away Catholics who were trying to prevent the destruction of their homes. Mr Donnelly, for example, said that after an armoured vehicle (possibly a Shorland) had forced the Catholic crowd out of the street it fired two or three shots. It stopped about mid-way between David Street and Falls Road. The Protestant crowd followed it and set fire to three or four more houses.

21.116 One police armoured vehicle which was present in Conway Street during this period was the Shorland which had opened fire in the same street earlier in the night: the vehicle commanded by Mr U of which Mr Y was gunner. Mr U saw firemen helping people to remove their belongings. A crowd from Divis Street seemed to be throwing stones at these people. The Shorland was driven down Conway Street to deter the stone-throwers who ran away. The Browning gun was not fired.

21.117 While we reject any suggestion that police or police vehicles in Conway Street were deliberately used against Catholics while a blind eye was turned on Protestant arsonists, Mr U's evidence confirms the assertion that an armoured vehicle was driven against the Catholic crowd. It is possible that in the confused circumstances of that morning the people whom Mr U saw being stoned and whom he took to be residents rescuing their own property were in fact looters whom the Catholic stone-throwers were trying to chase away. On the face of it this seems more plausible than the witnesses's own interpretation of a Catholic crowd attacking Catholic residents. This episode illustrates how on that night both police and Catholics were ready to put the worst construction on each others' motives and actions.

Conclusions on the burning of Conway Street

21.118 Although the rioting in the Conway Street/Cupar Street area produced relatively few injuries and, despite the extensive use of firearms, no fatalities, it took its toll in the destruction by fire in Conway Street alone of some 48 houses, which is over two-thirds of the dwellings in the Catholic section of the street. Every house in the block between David Street and Ashmore Street and in the block on the opposite side of the street was destroyed. Nearly all the remaining houses were damaged to a greater or lesser extent: 16 requiring major repairs and 1 minor repairs. Many houses in Norfolk Street and particularly Cupar Street (between Argyle Street and Falls Road) sustained damage which necessitated either major or minor repairs.

21.119 Protestants were responsible for nearly all this destruction, including all the houses burned down in Conway Street. Although these burnings were precipitated by shooting from the Catholic crowd they can be seen as a violent reaction by Protestants against Catholics for the disturbances which took place in the Falls Road area on that and the previous night. It is not possible to reconstruct with any reliability the comings and goings of the various police parties which performed duty in Conway Street during the night and morning. But the fact remains that police were present throughout this period when the burning of houses took place and did not succeed in preventing it.

21.120 Catholics interpreted events in Conway Street and the neighbouring streets as collusion between police and Protestants. They saw the police as attacking those who were trying to defend their homes from invading Protestants who were allowed to burn and loot property with impunity behind police lines. The Tribunal however rejects this interpretation. No doubt the police concentrated their attention on the Catholic crowd because they saw them not only as a threat to themselves but to the whole system of law and order in the city. Nevertheless, the police on duty in these streets were seriously at fault in that, though there in some strength, they failed to control the Protestant mob or to prevent the arson and the looting.

SECTION 9—DETAILED CONSIDERATION OF THE DEATH OF PATRICK ROONEY

21.121 We find, as we have already stated, that the boy Patrick Rooney was killed in his father's flat, No 5 St Brendan's Path, by Browning machine gun fire from a Shorland police vehicle. In this section we give our reasons for this finding and for our conclusion that the firing which killed him was not justified.

21.122 We have already described the arrival in Dover Street at about 1 am on 15 August of three Shorland armoured cars in response to HC Gray's request. Their commanders, each of whom gave evidence, were identified as Mr U, Mr X and Mr V. Mr U's gunner, Mr Y, also gave evidence. Although HC Gray did not know it at the time, one of the Browning guns mounted on the Shorlands (that of Mr U) had already been fired in Conway Street. After reporting the situation as he saw it in Divis Street, HC Gray ordered Mr X to take the vehicles up Divis Street, to fire in the air and if fired upon to fire for effect. Mr X passed these instructions on to Mr V and Mr U.

21.123 The three vehicles then drove to the mouth of Dover Street and turned right into Divis Street, ie away from the city centre. As the leading Shorland, that of Mr X, passed St Comgall's School, he was, according to his own evidence, fired on by an automatic weapon from the school. He ordered his gunner to return the fire for effect, and three short bursts were fired at the school. This exchange of fire was heard, but not seen, by HC Gray, who had remained in Dover Street. Neither of the other two vehicles fired although Mr Y said that he was fired at, either by an automatic or by a revolver being fired quickly as his vehicle was passing the mouth of Ardmoulin Street. The Tribunal has no reason to doubt that an exchange of shooting took place but we do not think that the police were subjected to automatic fire at this time.

21.124 The three Shorlands continued their journey up Divis Street as far as the Northumberland Street junction where they demolished a barricade, turned round and began to retrace their path along Divis Street back towards the city centre. For Mr X and Mr U the journey as far as Dover Street was uneventful: their vehicles did not fire nor did they hear shooting from the other two. But Mr V told the Tribunal that as he passed St Comgall's School on this second occasion, he saw flashes from the front of the school: he gave the order to fire and his gunner fired two bursts at the school.

21.125 It is not possible for the Tribunal to say whether this shooting took place as Mr V described it. We do not doubt that his gunner did return fire towards St Comgall's School; but he may have done so on the first occasion that he drove past it.

21.126 Having passed the mouth of Dover Street the three Shorlands continued along Divis Street towards Hastings Street where they turned before returning to Dover Street. If, as we find, fire from a Shorland killed Patrick Rooney, it must have occurred while the Shorlands were on this part of their patrol, ie when they were in Divis Street, between Dover Street and Hastings Street. But the only Shorland witnesses who admitted to firing during this part of their patrol were Mr U and his gunner, Mr Y, and they denied that the firing was into the flats. Mr X and Mr V denied that their vehicles fired at all at this stage.

The evidence of Mr Y

21.127 When his vehicle had passed the mouth of Dover Street and was heading for Hastings Street, Mr Y heard shots and saw a person to his right throw an object at the vehicle in front. He thought this was a grenade, and as his vehicle passed over it, there was an explosion, shaking the vehicle violently. By revolving his turret Mr Y had kept this man in his sights: the Browning gun was now facing slightly to his left as he looked towards the rear of the vehicle. Mr U ordered him to fire and he fired two short bursts at the man. The vehicle was positioned about opposite 91 Divis Street and at the time he fired the man was about at the north east corner of Divis Tower. Mr Y would therefore have expected his shots to have either struck this corner of the building or No 104 Divis Street. There were however no signs of bullet damage to No 104.

21.128 The vehicle drove on as far as Hastings Street where, still following the other two Shorlands, it turned and proceeded along Divis Street, away from the city. As his vehicle passed Divis Flats he heard heavy bursts of machine gun fire as well as single shots. He did not think that any of this shooting could have come from the Browning guns on the other Shorland vehicles. As he passed a fence between Divis Tower and No 104 Divis Street he thought he saw a dark object pointing at his vehicle. All three vehicles then returned to Dover Street.

The evidence of Mr U

21.129 Witness U's account of what appears to be the same incident is, however, quite different. Contrary to the evidence of all the other witnesses, he described all three vehicles turning left out of Dover Street into Divis Street. His vehicle did not fire on the journey towards Hastings Street. Here it turned and retraced its path away from the city. As it passed Divis Flats petrol bombs were thrown at all three Shorlands. A man standing outside the flats on the city side then threw into the road a silvery-coloured object which exploded as Mr U's vehicle passed over it. Immediately afterwards he saw another man outside Divis Tower firing a machine gun at his vehicle. Mr U ordered his gunner to shoot the man who had thrown the bomb and who was running up Divis Street. His gunner fired one burst at this man. (Since Mr U could not see the position of the barrel of the gun he could not see the direction of fire: he could not remember seeing any tracer.) Mr U's Shorland then followed the other two into Dover Street. It will be noted that the chief difference between the evidence of Mr Y and Mr U is that the latter describes the incident as taking place when their vehicle was travelling away from the city, whereas Mr Y recollects it as taking place on the trip towards the city. But both witnesses denied firing into the flats.

The death of Patrick Rooney

21.130 While the vehicles were out of his view in the stretch of Divis Street between the mouth of Dover Street and Hastings Street, HC Gray heard the sound of light weapons as well as the heavy fire of the Brownings. He ordered the vehicles to cease fire and return to Dover Street where he was joined by DI Cushley. This he reported to police control. He then told the crew of all three vehicles "that there was to be no further firing unless absolutely necessary", and at 1 11 am he radioed to police control that firing had ceased in Dover Street.

21.131 Shortly after the return of the Shorlands to Dover Street, HC Gray was approached by Mr Max Hastings who told him that a young boy (as we now know, Patrick Rooney) in Divis Flats had been shot. A few minutes earlier when he was outside St Brendan's block, Mr Hastings had been told of this and had been taken into a flat at about the middle of the block (in fact No 5 St Brendan's Path) where he saw the boy lying on a bed with what was obviously a severe head injury. HC Gray and Mr Hastings arranged that the latter would have the boy brought out to an ambulance which would be called to Dover Street. The Head Constable's request for an ambulance was sent at 1 19 am. Mr Hastings went back to the flats and returned accompanied by a man carrying Patrick Rooney.

21.132 The boy was admitted to hospital in an unconscious condition and died just after 2 am. Death was due to a gunshot wound of the head. The character of the injuries and the bullet fragment found in the brain (which fragment was not identifiable) were consistent with wounding by a fragment of a high velocity bullet.

21.133 Thus, only the occupants of vehicle U/Y admit to having discharged a Browning gun in the section of Divis Street between the Dover Street and Townsend Street junctions, that is, the general vicinity of Divis Street flats. But both witnesses denied firing into the flats; their evidence does not explain how Patrick Rooney came to be shot in his home or how the bullet damage to the flats and adjacent buildings was caused. The bullet damage is described below.

The ballistics evidence

21.134 At the request of the Tribunal two ballistics experts, Dr Martin of the Department of Industrial and Forensic Science, Belfast and Mr Price of the Forensic Science Laboratory, Nottingham, inspected the marks and damage inflicted upon the flats complex by the gunfire of this night. They found several areas of the complex had been subjected to high velocity gunfire,* ie the fire of rifles or Browning MGs or both.

21.135 The main areas of high velocity bullet damage were: Boundary wall of electricity transformer station, Divis Street (between Divis Tower and Whitehall block).—Three deep bullet holes in this brick wall were indicative of high velocity fire, probably from a position across and slightly up Divis Street. Divis Tower.—Bullets penetrated flats 1B, 3D, 4C, 6D, 7D, 8D and 9D, as well as the entrance hall of Divis Tower. Much of this damage suggested high velocity fire. Bullets discovered show that at least three weapons caused this damage. These were probably a ·30 Browning machine gun (flats 1B and 3D), a Lee Enfield ·303 rifle and a 7·62 self-loading rifle. The firing position of the two rifles was probably some distance down Divis Street towards the City Centre; that of the Browning was probably from a point in Divis Street nearer the Tower in the vicinity of the entrance to Bath Place. St Brendan's block (and wall round plant area in front courtyard as well as brick wall at side of Divis Tower)—There was bullet damage to six flats in this block. In No 5 St Brendan's Path, where Patrick Rooney was shot, the tracks of four bullets could be traced and unidentifiable bullet fragments were found. Two bullets entered the flat next door, No 6 St Brendan's Path. Both ballistics experts agreed that the penetration and fragmentation of the bullets which entered these two ground floor flats indicated high velocity shooting. Dr Martin thought the pattern of this damage suggested automatic fire but Mr Price was less sure of this.* Sightings made by Dr Martin on the bullet damage to Nos 5 and 6 St Brendan's Path indicated that the weapon was probably 7–8 ft above ground level. This suggested to Dr Martin that it was probably mounted on a vehicle.† Six typical bullet holes consistent with high-velocity damage (Martin) were found in a low brick wall surrounding the garden area between St Brendan's block and Divis Tower. The 7 ft high projecting wall at the entrance to Divis Tower contained a series of 13 holes which suggested high-velocity automatic fire possibly in three bursts (Price). Dr Martin concluded that the damage to St Brendan's, the low wall and the high wall, was all consistent with the firing of high velocity ammunition from a weapon located in Divis Street in the area of the entrance to Boundary Street.

21.136 Whitehall block (east face, Divis Street end).—The two ballistics experts could not agree whether or not the five bullet holes found indicated high velocity fire. In the absence of evidence of any other type of fire at this building the Tribunal finds it was high velocity.

21.137 Our conclusions on this evidence can be shortly stated:—

(1) The flats were subjected to a considerable volume of high velocity gunfire;

(2) this gunfire must have come from Browning machine guns, Lee Enfield or self-loading rifles, situated at various points on or near Divis Street;

(3) some of the gunfire, particularly that directed towards St Brendan's where Patrick Rooney was killed, originated from vehicles in Divis Street.

Evidence of eyewitnesses

21.138 A considerable volume of evidence was given by civilians who claimed to have witnessed Shorland shooting into the flats. We deal with this evidence in detail in another context. It displayed, as one would expect, differences of recollection and a number of inconsistencies: nevertheless, it supports the inference which arises from the expert evidence that high velocity fire was directed from vehicles in Divis Street into the central area of the flats. Further, the same evidence, if accepted, establishes that there was no firing from the central part of the flats, which is where the Rooney flat was situate: in particular the evidence of Mr B and Mr Max Hastings was categorical that they neither saw nor heard any firing from this area.

*His doubts were based on the fact that while he agreed that the external damage to Nos 5 and 6 considered together suggested automatic fire, the variation between the angles and flights of individual bullet tracks was inconsistent with this and was indicative of single shot fire.

†Mr Price examined a Shorland armoured car (which did not have a Browning gun mounted) and estimated that a mounted Browning gun would be about 6½ feet above ground level.

Conclusion

21.139 Having considered all the evidence relating to the use of guns in Divis Street we have no doubt that at least one of the Shorlands opened fire on the flats, hitting St Brendan's block and the city face of the Tower block, and killing Patrick Rooney.

21.140 We reach this finding notwithstanding the evidence of the Shorland crew members who would have the Tribunal believe that the only Shorland firing was directed not into St Brendan's but up Divis Street towards a man on the footway near the Tower who had thrown a grenade. Thus the Shorland crew members offer no explanation for the high-velocity bullet damage done to the central (ie St Brendan's) area of the flats. If they are to be believed, this was not caused by Shorland fire: but we find that it was. The ballistic evidence, and the testimony of civilian witnesses, put the fact of Shorland shooting into the central area of the flats beyond doubt. We believe that, appalled at the human consequences of their shooting and frightened by the spectre of revenge, the Shorland crew members have not made to the Tribunal a full disclosure of what they know occurred.

Was the firing justified?

21.141 Since their case is a denial of such shooting, it is hardly surprising that the Shorland crew members did not develop in evidence any real explanation for it. Shooting at the man who had thrown the grenade explains nothing: for he was in the street. There are allegations in their evidence of automatic firing from the flats: but, since their case is that they did not return the fire, the allegation is suspect and, even if true, did not apparently call for a return of fire.

21.142 Thus the Shorland crew members have not indicated in their evidence any justification for shooting into the flats (which of course they deny having done). There is no other evidence which suggests any justification for such firing. It is possible, though very unlikely, that Mr U and Mr Y heard some shots fired from the roof of the Whitehall block where Mr McCabe was killed. But, if they did, firing from that roof at the eastern end of the flats complex could not justify machine gun fire into the central area of the flats or at the Tower, from which we are satisfied that there was no firing.

21.143 Accordingly, we are unable to justify the shooting from the Browning machine gun which we find was directed towards the flats and was responsible for the death of Patrick Rooney.

SECTION 10—DETAILED CONSIDERATION OF THE DEATH OF HUGH McCABE

21.144 Shortly after the firing from the Shorland vehicles in the direction of the flats, Mr McGarrigan who was on the roof of the Whitehall block became aware that there was firing from elsewhere. Mr Wyllie who was also on the roof was shot in the neck, and Mr McGarrigan was certain that at the time this happened the Shorlands were stationary in Dover Street. He thought the shot which struck Wyllie must have come from Hastings Street or the Technical College, a tall building in Millfield. He then found Mr Hugh McCabe, who had been shot, lying on the roof of the staircase built on to the northern end of the Whitehall block. Mr McCabe was carried down, still alive, to one of the flats, where he died.

21.145 Mr McCabe was a soldier on leave. The Tribunal does not doubt that before his death he had been assisting Messrs Wyllie, McGarrigan and others in assaulting with missiles the police in the street below. Post-mortem examination showed that death was caused by a bullet, possibly from a high-velocity rifle, which entered the right cheek and traversed the neck and left lung before leaving the back of the chest.

21.146 Evidence of shooting from the roof of Hastings Street station at targets on the Divis Street end of the roof of the Whitehall block was given by Constable Mahood who was on duty with two other officers. These two constables, one armed with a 7·62mm self-loading rifle (SLR) the other with a ·303 rifle, had joined Constable Mahood on the station roof at about 9 pm.

21.147 During the earlier part of the evening Constable Mahood observed the crowd attacking Hastings Street station and the advance of police vehicles along Divis Street. At about the time when he heard gunfire he saw what he believed to be muzzle flashes from an automatic weapon at the top of the Divis Street end of the Whitehall flats. He had seen petrol bombs thrown from the roof of the staircase which was at a slightly lower level than the roof of the flats themselves but the shooting appeared to come from the latter position. Constable Mahood also gave evidence that he heard bullets whistling down the street. One of the constables with him on the roof notified police control by radio that he had seen flashes and that at the next flashes he would return the fire.* There were further flashes, after which the two constables opened fire with their rifles probably not long after 1 am. Constable Mahood estimated that about 18 single shot rounds were fired over a period of 5 minutes.† Constable Mahood was not armed and did not fire himself.

21.148 The post-mortem findings are consistent with Hugh McCabe having been shot by rifle fire from the roof of the Hastings Street station. The other gunshot injuries sustained on the roof of the flats and stairs can also be attributed to this police shooting, although Mr Wyllie thought that he was shot from Messrs Campbell's premises on the opposite side of Divis Street from Whitehall. It also seems likely, and Constable Mahood accepted this possibility in cross-examination, that bullets which entered the east face of Divis Tower at flats 6D, 7D and 8D and were identified as probably having been fired from a 7·62 SLR (6D) and a ·303 British Military rifle (7D, possibly 8D) were fired by the two marksmen at Hastings Street. While the bullet damage to the east face of Whitehall at the Divis Street end was not unequivocally established as high velocity, the shooting from Hastings Street station seems the likeliest explanation for it.

*His message may be the one recorded in Ex 43 01 02 15 August "Hastings Street station under fire from low storey flats opposite station" or 00 53 "Firing coming from low level flats—Falls Road".

†In fact the statements of the two marksmen give 12 rounds from SLR and 9 from ·303 — 21 in all.

21.149 We, therefore, conclude that Mr McCabe was shot by one of the police marksmen on the roof of the Hastings Street station. The possibility that he was shot by some unidentified civilian gunman remains: but there is no evidence to support this possibility, and we reject it. There is one other possibility—that he was shot by police fire from the Millfield Technical College where armed police observers were stationed; but we accept unreservedly the evidence of Constable McKittrick that there was no firing from the College, and that in any event his party had no rifles.

Was there any shooting from the flats?

21·150 We have already stated our finding that there was no shooting from the central area of the Divis flats. There is however some evidence of firing from the roof of the Whitehall block. We consider now the state of the evidence as to firing from the flats.

21·151 If there was any firing from the Whitehall roof it ceased when Mr McCabe and Mr Wyllie were shot. We have already referred to the testimony of Constable Mahood who claimed to have heard gunfire and seen muzzle flashes coming from Whitehall roof. Constable Mahood was not sure of the time at which he witnessed this although entries in the police log suggest it may have been around 1 am.

21.152 Another police witness gave similar evidence of shooting from the roof of Whitehall which he observed from Hastings Street roof between 12 00 and 12 30 am. At around midnight Head Constable Johnston who was inside Hastings Street RUC station heard two or three bursts of sub-machine gunfire. He went out of the building into Divis Street where he thought he could hear firing coming from the flats. He returned to the building and climbed up to a trap door in the roof from which position he could see along Divis Street to the flats. There were two other police officers already on the roof. During a period of about 10 minutes he saw the flashes and heard the reports of about 3 or 4 bursts of automatic fire coming from the Divis Street end of the roof of Whitehall, although he admitted that visibility was indistinct. Head Constable Johnston thought the weapon sounded like a Thompson sub-machine gun and he had the impression that bullets were landing in Divis Street 25–50 yards short of Hastings Street station. Head Constable Johnston also saw petrol bombs being thrown from the roof to his left of the source of the gunfire, ie further away from the Divis Street end of the Whitehall block.

21.153 A third police officer who testified to shooting from the flats was the Deputy Commissioner, Mr Bradley, who like Head Constable Johnston ran out of Hastings Street station on hearing heavy machine gun fire just before 1 am. He went into Hastings Street itself, where he saw flashes and heard short bursts of fire, which sounded like a Bren or Thompson sub-machine gun, coming from the northern end of the Whitehall roof.

21.154 When one turns to the evidence of witnesses in Dover Street, one finds it is consistent with that from Hastings Street. Undoubtedly it was believed by police and others who were at the junction of Dover Street with Divis Street that at about 1 am, before the Shorlands were committed, they were being fired upon from the flats. The firemen thought so: so did HC Gray. There was also evidence from an ambulance driver and his attendant to the effect that there was heavy firing from the direction of the flats. Mr Hastings who was also in Dover Street thought he might have seen one or two shots coming from the Whitehall block but he "could not say with any certainty". Later, however, after he had visited the flats, he concluded that there had been none for, he said:—

"it is astonishing that one of the facts about both the Dover Street and the Beverley Street situation when I was there was that had there been any marksmen of the remotest consequence operating that night they could have mown down half the RUC".

21.155 Two witnesses attributed shooting at this stage to people in the Tower block. Mr McQuade said he saw single shots from the Tower, while Mr Hugh Johnston, a member of the Shankill Defence Association, who was with the Protestants when they erupted out of Dover Street into Divis Street, asserted that he saw two gun flashes at the top of the Tower and appeared to suggest that Herbert Roy was killed by fire from the flats.

21.156 The evidence of fire from the Tower block is extremely suspect. The medical and ballistic evidence of the fatal injury to Roy points to him having been shot from across the street rather than by a descending bullet from the Tower: and it was a revolver shot, the effective range of which is in any event limited. It is also likely that the other casualties in Dover Street at this time (eg the 3 policemen) were due to fire from Gilford Street, and not the Tower. The flashes and noises interpreted by Messrs Johnston and McQuade do not, by themselves on a night of uproar, necessarily indicate gunfire. Nevertheless there was a belief shared by all those witnesses at the time that shots were being directed from the flats area towards the Dover Street junction. If they were not coming from the Tower, they must in all probability have been coming from the Divis Street end of the Whitehall block.

21.157 Mr B did not believe that there was any shooting from the flats: he was certain that there was no shooting from the maisonettes where he was— he spent much of the night walking along the open galleries from the St Comgall's block to the Whitehall block. Nevertheless, he did not know where the first shots came from: his evidence on this point was:—

"Where the first shots came from I would not swear, but I certainly know they did not come from the maisonettes in which I was situated".

As soon as the Shorland firing began, he "fell flat", and could not have seen much.

21.158 Mr B's evidence does not rule out the possibility of firing from the roof of the Whitehall block: he was never there, and could speak with certainty only of the galleries he walked, the people he met, and the areas he could see.

FS. 1. 330

21.159 Mr Bryan, the occupier at the time of a flat in Whitehall Row, gave evidence and denied that there was any shooting from the flats. While he asserted that he saw uniformed men firing into the flats, there is a startling absence in his evidence of any reference to firing from Shorlands. The shooting by uniformed men that he saw was probably that associated with Sgt McPhillips' sortie into and withdrawal from Gilford Street. That he missed the Shorland firing indicates that he by no means saw all that was happening. His denial of shooting from the flats extends, therefore, only to his own incomplete observations and cannot be interpreted as evidence that there was none.

21.160 Mr Wyllie and Mr McGarrigan, who were on and near the roof of Whitehall block at the critical time, while admitting their missile assault on the police in Divis Street, deny that there was any shooting from there or elsewhere in the flats. We are not prepared to found any conclusions on the basis of their denials.

21.161 Mr John Mitchell watched events from the front door of his house, No 80 Divis Street. He had a good view up the street as far as Bath Place: but his vantage point did not give him an unobstructed view of the Whitehall block, since it was masked to some extent by the terrace of houses which include No 80 itself. Mr Mitchell saw one Shorland firing into the flats from a point in Divis Street opposite St Brendan's and was quite clear that there had been no shooting whatsoever from the flats. His evidence must be taken as confined to the limits of his own observation. It does not rule out the possibility of some shots fired earlier from the roof of the Whitehall block.

21.162 Similarly, the evidence of Mr O'Connor, who saw and heard Shorland fire directed into the flats, must be interpreted as confined to the limits of his observation. While he and Mr Mitchell powerfully support the contention that there was no firing from St Brendan's or the city face of Divis Tower, they cannot exclude the possibility of some shooting from the roof of the Whitehall block.

21.163 The effect of the evidence so far considered is, if accepted (always excluding Mr Wyllie and Mr McGarrigan), to establish that there could have been shooting from the roof of the Whitehall block, but none from the galleries of the Whitehall block, from St Brendan's, or from the city face of the Tower.

21.164 Some further evidence was given which is consistent with the fact of firing from the Whitehall roof. First, there is the evidence of two members of an ambulance crew who brought an ambulance out of Durham Street up Divis Street to the flats. Their evidence needs to be approached with caution, since they had been badly scared by the situation in which they found themselves; but one of them, the driver, spoke emphatically of "heavy firing from the direction of the flats". In fact he could not have known where the firing he says he heard came from, since it was behind his vehicle. He could, therefore, have been referring to firing from the police station, on the Whitehall roof, or both.

21.165 Secondly, there was the evidence of Constable McKittrick. If there was in fact gunfire from the roof of the Whitehall block one police witness who might have been in a position to observe it was Constable McKittrick who, with four other constables, spent the night of 14/15 from 7 pm onwards on duty in Millfield Technical College, a four-storey building to the north of Hastings Street RUC Station. Constable McKittrick saw about 12 people on the roof of the Whitehall and on the staircase roof from where petrol bombs were being thrown. He did not, however, see any gunfire from the Whitehall roof. Nevertheless he heard gunfire—single shots and automatic—which came from the countrywards direction—the direction in which, as far as he was concerned, the flats (including the Whitehall block) stood.

Conclusion

21.166 Upon full consideration of all the evidence we conclude that there was no firing from the Divis flats save for some shots fired either from the staircase roof, or from the roof, of the Whitehall block. We are satisfied that the RUC at Hastings Street fired in the justified belief that shots had been fired from the Whitehall roof. One of their shots killed Mr Hugh McCabe, after whose death there was no further firing either from the police station or from the Whitehall roof. The Tribunal consider that the firing which killed Mr McCabe was justified. While the police marksmen ran the risk that they might kill or injure innocent people in the flats, their target was a legitimate one. It was a grave decision to take, but (unlike the Shorland firing) the shooting consisted of single shots carefully and skilfully aimed.

SECTION 11—POLICE USE OF BROWNING GUNS IN THE DIVIS STREET/FALLS ROAD AREA

21.167 We have already made clear our view that the Browning gun should not have been used in city areas during the disturbances under review. We have also criticised its use in firing upon the Divis flats on the night of 14/15 August. In this section we consider the nature of the gun, and the facts leading to the decision to make it available for use in Belfast. We also examine the allegation of indiscriminate shooting from Shorlands in the area south of the Falls Road.

The nature of the weapon

21.168 The Shorland is an armour plated vehicle built on a Land Rover chassis and is designed to carry a machine gun. It is manned by a crew of three; the commander, who acts as observer, a driver and a gunner. It was designed for patrolling border areas of the Province and not for use in urban areas. By 1968 the RUC had taken delivery of ten vehicles. Of these, five were based at police stations near the border, three were under the control of the Reserve Force, and the remaining two were held in reserve.

21.169 The weapon mounted was a ·30 Browning machine gun. Mr Peacocke testified that this was the only weapon which could be fitted into the vehicle's turret. The Browning is a high velocity automatic gun with a rate of fire of 500/600 rounds/minute. A number of witnesses testified that it was virtually impossible to fire a single shot from a Browning—unless of course only a single round was loaded in the ammunition belt.

21.170 The gun is aimed by lining up a graticule marked on a periscopic sight with the target. Before firing it is necessary to "zero" the gun, since the barrel is not in line with the sight but displaced to one side of it. To do this the gunner dismantles part of the gun, looks down the barrel and aligns it with an object some distance away. Then, keeping the barrel in position, the periscopic sight is adjusted so that the graticule is lined up with the same object. Apparently it is army practice to test fire the gun after zeroing but this was not the practice of the RUC because of lack of ammunition and suitable firing facilities. In 1969 spotlights were mounted on RUC Shorlands. These could be adjusted so as to focus on the gun's target.

21.171 The Browning is so constructed that even if held rigid it will not fire at the same spot. The gun is designed to fire a pattern of shots having an area in the centre known as the beaten zone where the majority of strikes are concentrated. It follows therefore that whether it is being fired by day or night it is in practice necessary to fire a sustained burst in order to be sure of hitting the target. At night it was sometimes difficult to see the graticule on the sight and its position had to be guessed. For this reason tracer bullets are used to enable the gunner to line up on his target.

The decision to use it

21.172 Although Shorland armoured vehicles were used on the streets of Belfast on the night of 13 August Browning guns were not mounted. This was not a deliberate act of policy but due simply to the lack of time available.

21.173 On the 14th Mr Bradley and Mr Wolseley decided that the Shorlands should be armed for the night of 14/15. It was not clear from the evidence of senior police officers, however, which of them was responsible for taking the decision to fit the Brownings. Both Mr Bradley and Mr Wolseley pointed out that since the Shorlands were operated by the Reserve Force they would have expected the decision to be taken by the Inspector-General who was responsible for the Reserve Force. But Mr Peacocke denied that he took any such policy decision or that the mounting of Browning machine guns was a matter on which he would be asked to give a decision.* It was clear from Mr Peacocke's evidence that he regarded this as a matter for the officer in charge of the vehicle:

> ". . . a Browning gun is part of the vehicle, and it would be a decision for the operational commander as to whether he would mount the gun or not".

21.174 Thus while it might appear that the fitting of Browning guns on Shorlands on 14 August was a major decision taken at the highest levels of the RUC it may be that it was not regarded as such at the time by at least some of the officers concerned.† On this basis the crucial decision was the mobilisation of the Shorlands on 13 August which were unarmed simply because there was not sufficient time to mount the guns. On the next day when there was sufficient time available, the Brownings were fitted because they were "part of the vehicle".

*But see his answer to the Chairman ". . . I cannot fully recall whether I decided it or whether the Commissioner told me he had done it and I approved it, but whichever way it was, my Lord, it basically comes back to being my decision".

†Mr Bradley, however, thought the decision was one of policy for the Inspector-General.

21.175 On the afternoon of 14 August a number of police officers were assembled in Musgrave Street RUC Station and assigned to armoured vehicles. Crews appear to have been made up for five Shorland vehicles and at least one Humber armoured car. The crews had not worked together as such before. Mr U had never seen either a Shorland or a Browning before this briefing and Mr X had not done duty in a Shorland previously. The three Shorland vehicles commanded by Mr X, Mr U and Mr V subsequently performed duty in Divis Street/Lower Falls area and two went to Crumlin Road.

21.176 Earlier in the day it seems that some at least of the Shorland gunners, of whom Mr Y was one, had come to Musgrave Street to mount the Browning guns and prepare them for use. In the afternoon the crews were briefed by HC Stewart and HC Patterson. The men were told that on the previous night police personnel and vehicles had been attacked with bombs and firearms. It was possible that there would be further shooting that night. According to Mr Y:

> "We were told that if we were to return fire we must have a proper target and be sure of our target. Also safety was greatly emphasised; we were told that we would be operating in a built-up area and the danger to civilians, etc, was very strongly emphasised".

Each gunner was provided with 500 rounds of Browning ·30 ammunition.

21.177 At about 5 pm three Shorlands and a Humber under the command of HC Stewart left Musgrave Street and travelled to Tennent Street where they remained until about 9 pm when they were called to Hastings Street station where they commenced operational duty. Their subsequent activities during the night have already been described. One important matter, however, remains to be considered.

The allegation of firing south of the Falls Road

21.178 A number of Catholic witnesses gave evidence that Shorland armoured vehicles positioned on Falls Road/Divis Street fired down side streets on the south side of the main road; other witnesses said that one or more vehicles drove into these side streets and discharged their Browning guns there.

21.179 Mr McCormick described how after he saw armoured vehicles shooting in Divis Street he ran down Albert Street and into Mary Street. An armoured vehicle followed him into Mary Street. During the night Mr Linton saw vehicles fire down Derby Street on four or five occasions as they passed along Divis Street. Mr P Kennedy MP (NI) testified that after a Shorland had fired at St Comgall's School it travelled along Divis Street to the junction with Albert Street where it stopped and fired down Albert Street. On its way up Divis Street towards Albert Street it appeared to Mr Kennedy to fire down Derby Street although he did not see this. Dr McAllister who was responsible for the first-aid post in Sultan Street thought he heard gunfire discharged on about three occasions down Sultan Street and Plevna Street.

21.180 All the Shorland witnesses denied any responsibility for these alleged shootings; it was their evidence that at no time did they move south of Divis Street into Albert Street or any of the neighbouring side streets. In the absence of any Browning bullet damage in this area the Tribunal accepts these denials and finds that the Shorlands did not move south of Divis Street/Falls Road and could not, therefore, have discharged their weapons there. The evidence does not justify a finding that there was firing into side streets from the Falls Road or Divis Street.

PART VII—CHAPTER 22—CRUMLIN ROAD AND ARDOYNE RIOTS: PRINCIPAL FEATURES

22.1 The Tribunal has received a great volume of evidence dealing with the catastrophic riot that developed in the Ardoyne on the night of 14 August. Very naturally the evidence contains inconsistencies, many of them irreconcilable; and some of it is, the Tribunal believes, pure fantasy. While it is not possible to resolve all the conflicts and differences to be found in the evidence, the Tribunal is satisfied as to the principal features of the night's rioting. They were:—

(1) Hostile crowds assembled between 8 and 10 pm in the side streets north and south of the Crumlin Road.

(2) On the south side, the Protestant crowds were at first held back some 75/100 yards from the Crumlin Road.

(3) On the north side in Hooker Street Catholic crowds built barricades.

(4) At or shortly after 10 30 pm—darkness having come and their barricades being complete—the crowd in Hooker Street started to riot—attacking the police standing on the Crumlin Road with petrol bombs and other missiles.

(5) Protestant crowds began to assemble on or very near the Crumlin Road.

(6) Police baton charged into Hooker Street. Some small arms fire was directed at the police.

(7) Large dangerous Protestant crowd (estimated at 300 by some: probably nearer 100) followed the police into Hooker Street. They hurled petrol bombs and missiles.

(8) Police introduced a Humber barricade-breaker into Hooker Street. It broke the barricade, turned left into Butler Street and re-emerged on to the Crumlin Road.

(9) Second journey of the Humber: it turned right from Hooker Street into Butler Street, was set on fire: and a shooting incident developed.

(10) All foot police were withdrawn to the Crumlin Road.

(11) Trouble in Crumlin Road near Herbert Street and Butler Street. Shooting: deaths of Mr McLarnon and Mr Lynch as a result of police firing.

(12) Attack by Protestant youths on Chief Street school: police fired warning shots from Holy Cross grounds.

FS 1. 333

The Tribunal is satisfied that the Hooker Street crowd began the night's rioting, that a gun-battle developed between Catholics and police in the course of which no gunshot injury (save possibly to DI Gilchrist's leg) was inflicted by the Catholics but two men were killed and at least 10 others were injured by police fire, and that widespread damage to buildings was done by petrol bombs flung by both Protestants and Catholics (but none by the police). There are two important negatives: there was no gunfire by the Protestant crowd, and none from the Holy Cross Church or its grounds (save for two warning shots fired by a policeman). No positive finding can be made as to the degree of organisation that lay behind the riot. Clearly, preparations were made by the Catholics, as evidenced by the barricade building, the heavy initial attack with petrol bombs and the evacuation of Hooker Street, normally a residential area but observed by the police this night to be deserted, save for the rioters. Some rudimentary preparations must also have been made by the Protestants. Certainly both sides were spoiling for a fight.

SECTION 1—PRELIMINARY.—5 PM–10 30 PM

22.2 On Thursday, 14 August, there was considerable tension and apprehension among the residents of the Crumlin Road area: in the words of one witness "everybody seemed to think that something was going to happen".

22.3 It was to try to placate and reassure the residents of this area that a number of clergymen, both Catholic and Protestant, met at 5 pm in the Crumlin Road near the Hooker Street junction. Recollections differ as to whether it was the intention of all the clergymen to visit both sides of the main road jointly but in the event only the Catholic priest, Fr Delaney, entered Hooker Street.

22.4 Before the clergymen parted, Fr Delaney was asked to investigate a rumour that petrol bombs were being stored on the roof of the Edenderry Inn. He carried out a partial search but discovered nothing. Later in the evening at about 8 pm HC Kyle arrived at Hooker Street to investigate a similar complaint that petrol bombs were stored on the roof of Graham's old premises which adjoin the Edenderry Inn in Hooker Street. One crate of empty milk bottles was discovered, probably on a part of the roof which Fr Delaney had not been able to examine. As HC Kyle and his party were leaving Hooker Street after their search, a petrol bomb was thrown at them from the waste ground in Hooker Street. It landed harmlessly on the roadway and ignited.

22.5 By 8 pm the building of a barricade in Hooker Street about 100 yards from the Crumlin Road was already in progress. An hour later a second barricade near the junction with Chatham Street was in course of construction. By 9 pm, or shortly after, two parties of police had arrived to reinforce the patrols on the Crumlin Road. One, under HC Kyle, arrived in two land rovers which took up position in the main road to the east of Hooker Street. The other party, under HC Seay, comprised a sergeant and six men patrolling the Disraeli Street side of the Crumlin Road from that street to Chief Street, and a sergeant and six men on static duty at the corner of Chief Street. At this time there were no police on the Hooker Street side of the Crumlin Road.

22.6 Shortly after HC Seay's arrival (just before 9 30 pm) about a dozen members of the USC under SDC Hagen reported to him in Disraeli Street, having been sent there by DI Montgomery. The special constables wore steel helmets and were armed with batons and ·45 revolvers. Some carried shields. A hostile crowd of at least 200, some wearing helmets and armbands and carrying sticks, had gathered in Disraeli Street and the USC were instructed to form a restraining line 75 to 100 yards down the street, between the crowd and the Crumlin Road. This crowd became increasingly difficult to control as events developed at Hooker Street/Crumlin Road. At 11 pm another force of special constables under S/Sgt Miller arrived to perform the same task of crowd control in Palmer Street; men were also sent to Bray Street.

22.7 Although the members of the USC in Disraeli Street and, later, Palmer Street and Bray Street, were largely successful in preventing the crowds in those streets moving bodily up on to the Crumlin Road,* they did not and could not prevent the build up of crowds on that side of the main road, since there was nothing to stop the people in those streets gaining access to the Crumlin Road via Ohio Street and Rosebank or Chief Street in which there were no USC on duty. One or two members of USC did move from their position in the side streets on to the Disraeli Street side of the Crumlin Road, but there is no clear evidence that any special constable crossed the main road or took any active part in ensuing events that evening.

22.8 Between 9 00 and 10 00 pm work on constructing the barricade in Hooker Street continued and some time between 10 00 and 10 30 pm the crowd behind the barricade grew rapidly and a man approached the barrier from Hooker Street waving an Irish Republican Tricolour and shouting abuse designed to incite the police to take action. The large crowd being restrained by the USC in Disraeli Street was too far away to observe the incident, but by this time a smaller crowd had gathered in the mouth of Disraeli Street and there were knots of people along that side of the road.

SECTION 2—THE HOOKER STREET RIOT

The Catholic attack on the police on Crumlin Road

22.9 Some time after 10 30 pm the crowd behind the barricade in Hooker Street attacked the police on the Crumlin Road and a large number of petrol bombs were thrown at them. One struck a policeman and according to Rev Sansom and Constable Loney a civilian was also injured.

22.10 According to police witnesses some of these petrol bombs coming from the mouth of Hooker Street struck the side wall of the Edenderry Inn and that of the greengrocer's shop on the opposite side of the street. Both buildings caught fire. Some petrol bombs even landed across the Crumlin Road near Graham's bookmaking premises and struck the wall of that building. HC Kyle, who left the scene shortly before, returned to find the roadway in front of Hooker Street "a mass of flame" and Constable Loney described "a thick blanket of flame across the roadway" at the entrance to Hooker Street.

22.11 Other witnesses, however, testified that the Edenderry Inn, Graham's betting shop and the Rosebank Inn were set on fire by petrol bombs thrown from the crowd on the Disraeli Street side of the road. S/Sgt Moore also saw petrol bombs thrown at the Edenderry Inn and Graham's by a crowd which he took to be Protestants. In a riot situation with petrol bombs flying in all directions it is seldom possible to attribute any particular conflagration to a specific missile. It is probable that petrol bombs from both sides struck the Edenderry

Inn and possible that the same happened to the Rosebank and Graham's. But, when one recollects the fate of these Catholic-owned premises on the Disraeli Street side of the road on previous nights, it is likely that the Protestants, who were by now very angry, made it their business to burn them, whether or not assisted by a few bombs coming over from Hooker Street. A number of houses were also burned on the north side of the Crumlin Road between Hooker Street and Herbert Street. HC Wallace saw petrol bombs coming from the Chatham Street direction and landing on the roofs of these houses and other witnesses confirmed this. But Mr Wallace also saw petrol bombs being thrown at the same houses from the Disraeli Street side of the road. The Tribunal has no doubt that these houses were caught by the bombs of both sides.

22.12 The missiles and later petrol bombs thrown from the Disraeli Street crowd into Hooker Street followed shortly after the first petrol bombs came from that street. When DI Gilchrist arrived he saw hand to hand fighting in the Crumlin Road and HC Kyle described the scene he saw as a pitched battle.

The rioting in Hooker Street

22.13 The first police action in Hooker Street was a baton charge from the Crumlin Road. It seems that there were two or three such charges in which foot police were followed by Protestant civilians. Each baton charge was repulsed by petrol bombs and missiles thrown by the crowd in Hooker Street. One police officer, Constable Loney, gave evidence that during this phase he came under small arms fire from an entry off Hooker Street.

22.14 Unable to make any headway on foot the police summoned a Humber armoured vehicle which broke through the barricade in Hooker Street. Foot police followed the vehicle down Hooker Street as far as Butler Street. At this junction DI Gilchrist came under fire from Butler Street and withdrew to Crumlin Road. Shortly afterwards the Humber vehicle, which was commanded by HC Patterson, made a second trip down Hooker Street and turned into Butler Street. Here a shooting incident took place: shots were fired both by the police occupants of the vehicle and by civilians in the Catholic crowd. Foot police then withdrew from Hooker Street on to the Crumlin Road.

22.15 These events are of such importance that it is necessary to consider the evidence relating to them in some detail.

22.16 The Tribunal accepts HC Kyle's account of the Hooker Street riot, supported as it is in certain material respects by that of Constables Loney and Robinson and Rev Sansom. The first baton charge was by police on foot: as they advanced down Hooker Street resistance built up and they were forced back. An armoured vehicle was then brought in and eventually broke the barricade opposite Chatham Street. There was fierce fighting in Hooker Street, the police being under almost continuous attack from petrol bombs and other vicious missiles. (According to Constable Loney, the police were also attacked by gunfire—a topic to which we return later.)

22.17 It is not easy, after the event, to reconstruct a riot situation such as now prevailed as it must have appeared to those who were present. But the effort must be made. The street lights in Hooker Street had been deliberately extinguished during earlier disturbances and the street was plunged in darkness relieved only by fires burning in houses and other adjacent premises. In the Crumlin Road and the side streets were to be found, and stumbled over, all the clutter of urban rioting—barricades, debris, flame, and liquid petrol. Normal traffic movement had stopped: the noise of hostile, jeering crowds, the crackle and explosions of burning buildings, and the shattering of glass had enveloped the area. But, save where the fighting was in progress, the streets were empty.

Protestant participation

22.18 The small gatherings of people which had formed on the south side of the Crumlin Road during the evening grew rapidly in size after the attack on the police from Hooker Street. After the police had moved into Hooker Street they were followed by a number of people from the Disraeli Street side of the road, some of whom were wearing helmets and armbands.* It appears that no police had been left behind on the Crumlin Road to control this crowd. Once the police were into Hooker Street their attention was monopolised by the crowd ahead of them: they failed to prevent the civilians who had entered behind them from throwing stones and petrol bombs at the houses in Hooker Street. However, once again other witnesses said that some of the houses in Hooker Street were set alight by petrol bombs thrown from the Catholic crowd in that street.

22.19 While it is clear that civilians from the Disraeli Street side of the road did follow the police into Hooker Street, estimates of the number involved vary considerably. HC Kyle saw "a few", DI Gilchrist "about 20", while HC Seay saw about 30–40 turn off Hooker Street into Chatham Street while about the same number continued down Hooker Street. At that time the police officers must have been preoccupied with what was happening in front of rather than behind them and their estimates of numbers must have been very approximate. Messrs Lannigan and Elwood, both of whom were among the Protestant crowd which entered Hooker Street, put the number at 20–30 and 20 respectively.

22.20 Another witness, Mr. McMullan, told the Tribunal that from some distance away (Butler Street/Crumlin Road) he saw between 200 and 300

*Some of these armbands were white, improvised from a handerchief, others were red, white and blue and seemed to have been specially made. Wearers of armbands were among the most active combatants from the Disraeli Street side and some of them (eg Mr Elwood) crossed into Hooker Street behind the police. By his own account Mr McKeague was present when the Protestant people crossed the Crumlin Road and entered Hooker Street and dealt with the people concerned "giving them a lesson which I do not think they will forget". But he did not himself enter Hooker Street. His general part in the Ardoyne rioting on 14 and 15 August is discussed at 26.44.

civilians enter Hooker Street immediately behind the police. This estimate is supported by the evidence of Mr Walsh, a staff reporter with the Irish Times. We believe the number was substantial, certainly no less than 100.

22.21 Mr Walsh's evidence was that between 10 00 and 10 30 pm he was in the vicinity of Hooker Street/Crumlin Road from where he saw 300 to 400 people being marshalled by men wearing armbands into a position opposite the mouth of Hooker Street. From this crowd petrol bombs were thrown at the Edenderry Inn, the Rosebank Inn and Sean Grahams. A large crowd then entered Hooker Street followed by the police. This crowd smashed windows and set fire to houses in Hooker Street. Most of the crowd turned left into Chatham Street.

22.22 Clearly Mr Walsh did not see the beginning of the affair. The main body of the police, the Tribunal is satisfied, had entered and were fully engaged in Hooker Street, when the Protestant crowd made its incursion. No doubt some more police came in after the Protestants, perhaps to reinforce police already in the street, perhaps in the vain hope of restraining the Protestants. But the Tribunal acquits the police of deliberately encouraging the Protestants. The police were under attack from the Catholic crowd, and had neither the numbers nor the opportunity to control their uninvited supporters. Nevertheless the effect on the Catholic crowd who saw themselves under attack from a mixed force of police and civilians is obvious: a further piece of "evidence" of police bias and hostility against them.

22.23 The police party which followed these civilians into Hooker Street could well have been that under the command of HC Wallace who arrived at the Crumlin Road with all available men from Tennent Street RUC Station at about 10 45 pm. By this time all four corner buildings at the Hooker Street/Crumlin Road Junction* were ablaze as well as two houses on the Hooker Street side of the Crumlin Road itself. The roadway was littered with bricks and broken bottles. Youths from both Disraeli Street and Hooker Street were fighting in the middle of the Crumlin Road and the fighting stretched into Hooker Street as far as the junction with Chatham Street. HC Wallace's party divided into groups: one remained on the Crumlin Road to keep back the crowds which had gathered in the mouths of Disraeli Street, Bray Street and Palmer Street, while the other, under the Head Constable himself, entered Hooker Street. Here he met DI Montgomery who, with a party of police, was withdrawing from Hooker Street, driving before him about 25–30 civilians. At this time several houses in Hooker Street were burning. HC Wallace was able to ascertain that they were not occupied. Shortly after the appearance of DI Montgomery at the Crumlin Road end of Hooker Street, HC Seay and his party also withdrew from Hooker Street. At this stage, therefore, the parties of HC Wallace, HC Seay and DI Montgomery temporarily joined up.

The first shots

22.24 Constable Loney, a member of HC Seay's party of police, gave evidence. He told the Tribunal that, while taking part in the first baton charge down Hooker Street, he found himself under small arms fire coming from an entry on his left just beyond Chatham Street. He thought it "possibly a revolver or a small rifle, something of the calibre of a ·22", and, disclaiming any precision as to the number of the shots, said he might have heard 3 or 4: he added:—

> "I know there were at least two struck a wall on the right. I did not hear the whine of the bullets but I heard what I took to be the ricochet from the wall on the right".

He and other policemen immediately took cover, where they remained until "the shooting had stopped" when they came back to the Crumlin Road. It would appear from DI Montgomery's evidence that these men, or some of them, told him on their return to the Crumlin Road that they had been under fire. DI Gilchrist, who participated in one of the early baton charges into Hooker Street (he said it was led by the Humber, whereas PC Loney said there was no Humber in the charge in the course of which he came under fire), spoke of the sound of a bullet going over his head and another hitting a wall to his right. He heard the ricochet and had no doubt he was fired on. No police officer saw any weapon: PC Loney saw no flashes, though the DI did. The firing, if it occurred, caused no casualties other, possibly, than a superficial wound to DI Gilchrist's thigh: but this could have been done by a missile discharged from a catapult.

22.25 It is possible that these officers were mistaken: the noises of the riot must have been loud, varied and confusing. Further, the police were apprehensive, on the alert to detect shooting after the Leeson Street incident of the previous night. But we do not believe that they would have been deceived. Were they then giving us an honest recollection? We are satisfied that they were: and it is to be observed that after the incidents described the police withdrew to the Crumlin Road and reported the fact of shooting to DI Montgomery.

The shooting incident in Butler Street

22.26 The next shooting followed soon after. The barricade at the Butler Street end of Hooker Street had been broken by a Humber armoured vehicle under the command of HC Patterson. On its first run it turned left into Butler Street where it penetrated a barricade before emerging on to the Crumlin Road. From the Crumlin Road the vehicle entered Hooker Street for a second time, this time turning right at the junction with Butler Street with the object of clearing any barricades in that direction. Immediately after turning into Butler Street, HC Patterson's vehicle was confronted with two barricades separated by a short distance of roadway. At the first barricade, according to the evidence of HC Patterson, a liquid—presumably petrol—was poured over the windscreen of the Humber and ignited. The driver and HC Patterson himself were set on fire, but the progress of the vehicle continued for another 20–50 yards when the engine stalled. The rear doors of the vehicle were thrown open because of the fumes inside, and a number of police leapt out of the vehicle. According to HC Patterson one of the policemen who had emerged shouted "Look out they're shooting".* The Head Constable left the vehicle and as he was running for cover at a bunker in Butler Street to the east of the Brookfield Street junction he heard what he thought was shooting and saw flashes from a crowd of at least 50 which had appeared in Butler Street between the second barricade and the police vehicle. The crew of the Humber (with the exception of the injured driver and another police officer) had taken refuge behind a projecting wall in Butler Street. According to HC Patterson shooting, which he took to be from a revolver, continued from both ends of Butler Street and stones and petrol bombs were thrown at the police. He then ordered his men to fire a warning volley over the heads of the crowd and this was done using revolvers and Sterling sub-machine guns. After a short lull, shooting from the crowd continued and the Head Constable ordered his officers to fire for effect. They did so and most of the crowd dispersed although occasional shots were fired at the police, from whom there was a further discharge of fire.*

*The time of this incident can be fixed at about 11 10 pm since at this time the following message is recorded in the police log as having been received: "Red 2 on fire, crew bailing out. All vehicles to scene".

22.27 Eventually the police returned to the Humber vehicle, restarted it and made their escape before the arrival of a Shorland armoured vehicle which had been sent to assist them. Having reached the safety of Crumlin Road HC Patterson examined the outside of his vehicle and discovered what he believed to be a bullet mark. DI Gilchrist also inspected the vehicle and saw 14 of what could have been lead marks but he accepted that "equally they could have been stone marks". This matter could only have been resolved by tests carried out by a ballistics expert. HC Patterson's Humber was not, however, subjected to such an examination.

22.28 The account of the Humber incident, given by another witness, Mr P M Toal, conflicts with HC Patterson's evidence in a number of important respects. Mr Toal told the Tribunal that there was only a single small barricade in Butler Street to the east of the junction with Hooker Street; that immediately the rear doors of the Humber vehicle opened a policeman fired shots from within the vehicle; that there was no crowd on the streets at the time, only 6 youths and 4 neighbours; and that there was no shooting from these civilians. Mr Toal's evidence was supported by that of a Mr Deeds—unfortunately a witness on whom the Tribunal was not prepared to rely.

22.29 It is not possible to accept Mr Toal's account of the incident: his picture of a crowd exhibiting little or no hostility towards a police vehicle in trouble and its wounded occupants in the heart of the Ardoyne while a bitter struggle was in progress in Hooker Street is not very likely in the circumstances. Nevertheless it could well have happened that a member of the police party, at a time when the vehicle was on fire and its engine stalled in a hostile area, panicked and fired to cover the escape of himself and his comrades from the vehicle.

22.30 In view of all the circumstances it is not possible to be certain whether as the police leapt out of their vehicle they were in fact fired upon or merely thought that they were. In either event it is very probable, and we so find, that a policeman, as he emerged believing he was under fire, did himself fire: he would have done so before the Head Constable left the vehicle and knew from his own observation what was going on. We are satisfied that, as the incident progressed, shots were fired from the crowd and that, thereafter, the affair developed as described by the Head Constable.

*HC Patterson's party fired 20 rounds of ·38 revolver ammunition and 13 rounds of 9 mm Sterling ammunition = 33 rounds in all.

22.31 The episode marked a turning-point in the riot. The shooting was heard by many: interpretations of it varied according to the loyalties of those who heard it. HC Seay, for example, assumed that the shooting was exclusively Catholic in origin. From then on the Protestants believed the Catholics were provoking a gun-battle, the Catholics were sure that the police had decided to use firearms against them: and the police, some of whose senior officers already believed they were faced with an armed uprising, were confirmed in their belief. The ensuing tragedy of death and maiming by gunfire which overwhelmed the area this night and the following day developed from this incident.

22.32 The immediate consequence, however, of the shooting and of the reports of small-arms fire emanating from Hooker Street, was a police withdrawal from the Ardoyne to the Crumlin Road.

SECTION 3—THE RIOT IN HERBERT STREET: THE DEATH OF SAMUEL McLARNON

22.33 We had taken the chronology of events that evening up to the time when DI Montgomery, HC Seay and HC Wallace met at Hooker Street/Crumlin Road. As the police were leaving Hooker Street they were attacked from Chatham Street with petrol bombs. With the protection of an armoured vehicle, HC Wallace then took his party into Chatham Street across Herbert Street towards Butler Street. Chatham Street rises in this direction and HC Wallace's party found themselves unable to advance any further because of the hail of petrol bombs. They were then forced back to Herbert Street/Chatham Street where they were again attacked from Herbert Street—the worst the Head Constable had experienced in all the rioting.

Shooting in Herbert Street

22.34 At this point HC Wallace and DI Montgomery heard shooting from Herbert Street in the Crumlin Road direction. They took cover behind a Shorland armoured car which was sitting at Chatham Street/Herbert Street. This vehicle became enveloped in flames and reversed towards the Crumlin Road with the police officers sheltering behind it. As the Shorland armoured vehicle backed out of Herbert Street a second armoured vehicle nosed in. This second armoured vehicle was HC Patterson's Humber although he was not inside it when it moved into Herbert Street. At about this time a number of police witnesses heard firing from Herbert Street. Some (including DI Montgomery) thought it was automatic fire while others thought they heard only single shots. For reasons which we state later the Tribunal is satisfied that there was no Catholic automatic fire in this area this night.*

22.35 Although it is not in dispute that police officers on foot returned the fire into Herbert Street, the evidence is conflicting as to whether there was firing from the Humber or Shorland armoured vehicles as well. HC Kyle was in

*Our conclusion is stated in 22.41.

Chatham Street to ... of Herbert Street and he saw the burning Shorland reverse into his view from his right in Herbert Street and disappear to his left. When it was out of sight he heard two very heavy shots from that direction which he assumed were fired from the Browning gun mounted on the vehicle. But DI Gilchrist, who was in command of the two Shorlands, and Sgt Catterson, who was in charge of one of them, denied that the Browning guns were fired. The Tribunal finds as a fact that they were not fired in the Crumlin Road area on that night*.

22.36 Sgt St John observed the driver of the Humber vehicle firing four shots with a revolver from the window. Neither HC Wallace nor DI Montgomery nor HC Patterson seems to have seen this and there is no reference to firing from the Humber vehicle in the schedule of police discharge of weapons extracted from the police statements submitted to the Tribunal. However, Sgt St John's recollection seems quite clear when he describes the driver taking careful aim. HC Seay testified that one police officer fired from behind the open front left-hand door of the Humber as it faced into Herbert Street and another officer fired from within the vehicle. According to HC Seay an SLR repeating rifle and a Sterling SMG were used by the police to return the fire into Herbert Street.

22.37 The records furnished to the Tribunal by the RUC show that fire was returned into Herbert Street by three policemen on foot using Sterling SMGs. Two of these officers fired bursts of shots while the third discharged single shots amounting to a total of 55 rounds. The firing of the two Sterlings on automatic would appear to contravene an order given by DI Montgomery earlier in the evening that these weapons were only to be used for single action fire. The explanation may be that the two officers responsible were from the Reserve Force and would not therefore have been briefed by Mr Montgomery.

The Riot

22.38 Once again, the Tribunal was faced with conflicting evidence. Mr McCargo was present in Herbert Street while the police were entering Hooker Street and his evidence is that shortly afterwards a crowd of police, B Specials and civilians entered Herbert Street and began to throw petrol bombs at the houses there. This invading force was resisted by some of the people in Herbert Street and it eventually withdrew. Later a police armoured vehicle entered Herbert Street from the Crumlin Road and drove towards Butler Street, passing the bend in Herbert Street. It then returned, reversing slowly in the direction of the Crumlin Road. As it passed the junction with Elmfield Street, two petrol bombs landed on the vehicle and ignited. The vehicle increased in speed and Mr McCargo heard a burst of automatic fire coming from it. As the vehicle reached the Crumlin Road uniformed men on foot appeared in Crumlin Road and fired down Herbert Street. The difficulty with Mr McCargo's evidence is that he asserts that there were no shots fired by anyone other than the police that night: this, in the Tribunal's view, is not true. But in other respects his evidence is credible and agrees, in its main features, with that of Sgt St John.

*Of the 5 Shorlands available to the Reserve Force in Belfast, 3 were on the Falls Road and 2 on the Crumlin Road.

22.39 The general course of events in Herbert Street was outlined in the evidence of Sgt St John. When he arrived a crowd from Herbert Street had emerged on to the Crumlin Road and was throwing stones and petrol bombs down the Crumlin Road. This crowd was forced back into Herbert Street by a mixed body of police and civilians which advanced up the Crumlin Road. This group contained about 15 civilians and about the same number of policemen. Some of the civilians were wearing steel or safety helmets and were armed with sticks and stones. When this group reached the mouth of Herbert Street the policemen joined up with others and prepared to baton charge while the civilians were pushed back down Crumlin Road, clear of the junction with Herbert Street. Another witness, Mr Lannigan, a resident of Disraeli Street, told the Tribunal that when he and some of his friends offered assistance to a group of policemen at the mouth of Herbert Street, one policeman accepted and he and his friends joined in the fighting. At one point the police asked them to move away because they were afraid guns might be used and when police reinforcements arrived he and his friends were moved away.

22.40 Sergeant St John told the Tribunal that the baton charge took the police about 30 yards into Herbert Street, beyond the junction with Chatham Street. They met with considerable opposition and eventually returned to Herbert Street/Chatham Street. By this time a few civilians had followed the police into Herbert Street and a house was on fire between the police party and the Crumlin Road. The police then withdrew to the Crumlin Road. They reformed and again entered Herbert Street this time preceded by a Humber armoured vehicle which turned left into Chatham Street. The foot police followed the vehicle into Chatham Street but returned to Herbert Street where two civilian factions were fighting. It was at this point that Sgt St John first heard shots and saw the fire being returned by revolver from the Humber armoured car. Mr McCargo believed B Specials took part in these incursions into Herbert Street: but his identification was too doubtful to enable the Tribunal to find as a fact that they did.

22.41 In relation to the allegation of civilian fire from Herbert Street, it may be noted that while some police officers heard what they took to be bullets striking the roadway and the front of the Humber and Shorland armoured vehicles there is no objective evidence of firing in the form of spent bullets or bullet-damaged property in the Crumlin Road/Chief Street area. To some extent this is understandable since bullets from Herbert Street whose path was not obstructed by the armoured vehicle would probably have travelled into the part of Chief Street where there are no houses or into the grounds of Holy Cross Church, Ardoyne. Bullets or damage caused by them would not therefore be easily discoverable. It will also be noted that no individual—civilian or policeman—was injured by gunfire coming out of Herbert Street. However, having considered all the evidence relating to civilians' fire from this street, the Tribunal is satisfied that single shots were fired at police from the back of Herbert Street but that there was no automatic fire.

22.42 Although no one was injured by fire coming out of Herbert Street a civilian, Mr Samuel Mc Larnon, was shot dead by police fire directed down the street from its junction with the Crumlin Road. He was in the sitting-room of his house, No [illegible]ert Street, when he was shot. Although the conclusion that he was shot by police fire was not accepted unequivocally by DI Montgomery, it appears to us from the forensic and other evidence to be irresistible and we so find.

22.43 Mr McLarnon's death was due to laceration of the brain caused by a gunshot wound of the head. The fatal bullet was a 9 mm copper jacketed pistol bullet of the type fired by a Sterling or Sten sub-machine gun or a Luger pistol. One report submitted to the Tribunal states that the bullet was partly flattened at the nose, indicating the possibility of ricochet. Examination of Mr McLarnon's home, No 37 Herbert Street, revealed three bullet holes in the front downstairs window but only two marks in the room consistent with bullet damage. The line of fire which can be inferred from this damage indicates a firing position from the Chatham Street/Herbert Street corner on the opposite side of Herbert Street from No 37 and from the western portion of the Herbert Street/Crumlin Road junction. The neighbouring houses, Nos 35, 39 and 41, also sustained bullet damage. Clearly police shooting in the street was for a time heavy: but the police were fired on first.

SECTION 4—THE RIOT IN BUTLER STREET: THE DEATH OF MICHAEL LYNCH

22.44 After the shooting in Herbert Street the centre of activity moved up the Crumlin Road with police and rioters in the Ardoyne area engaging one another successively at Butler Street and in the vicinity of Kerrera Street. From these streets, and Butler Street in particular, a crowd of about 100 to 150 emerged throwing stones and petrol bombs at the police. Using the cover of an armoured vehicle positioned between Herbert Street and Butler Street the police succeeded in forcing the rioters back into Butler Street. At this time there were groups of youths from the south side of the Crumlin Road, some wearing helmets and armbands, assisting the police and intermingling with them. DI Gilchrist gave evidence that the Protestant civilians were "incensed" by the shooting from Herbert Street and that the police had difficulty in restraining them. At one stage youths wearing steel helmets who had come out of Chief Street threw petrol bombs at the crowd in Butler Street over the heads of the police. According to one witness, Fr O'Donnell, both civilians and policemen moved into Butler Street. Some kind of explosive device was thrown at a Shorland armoured car which was stationed at Butler Street by a crowd which had come out of Kerrera Street.

22.45 At this stage the shooting began again. The evidence again is full of inconsistencies. We are reasonably sure that the explosion near the Shorland led to some warning shots being fired by police, that at a later stage some shots were fired from Butler Street, and that a policeman returned fire with a Sterling SMG. We also find as a fact that Michael Lynch was killed by police fire in Butler Street. All else is unclear. Two policemen spoke of Browning gunfire from the Shorland at Butler Street: its commander, Sgt Catterson, strongly denied it, and there are no police records of any such firing. One witness described "slow automatic fire" from Butler Street, while another denied there was any firing from the street at all. We are not prepared to find as a fact that there was Browning fire from the Shorland or automatic fire from Butler Street.

22.46 It is impossible on the evidence to establish who fired the bullet which killed Mr Lynch, although in all probability it was the policeman who fired the Sterling into Butler Street. Mr Lynch, with his companion (Mr Morris, who gave evidence) had been sheltering in the doorway of No 10 Butler Street near its junction with Upper Elmfield Street. They were attempting to make their way into Elmfield Street when Mr Lynch was shot through the chest: the wound was "consistent with wounding by a bullet of medium or high velocity fired at more than short range". Again, though there were fatal consequences for a bystander, the police were in fact returning fire.

The shooting in the chapel grounds

22.47 Some of the petrol bombs which were thrown out of Butler Street at the police landed in the grounds of Holy Cross Church. DI Montgomery himself entered the grounds to extinguish the flames and detailed 6 police officers to stand guard at the church gates. In addition 3 policemen (one of whom was Constable Robinson) were placed in the grounds of the church. After they had patrolled the grounds for about 10 minutes they were approached by a priest who told them that youths were burning the Holy Cross Girls School in Chief Street. Here the police found petrol bombs burning in the grounds of the school and within the building itself. Three youths carrying petrol bombs entered the yard of the school from Chief Street and one of them attempted to throw a petrol bomb into the school. Constable Robinson fired 2 shots in the air from his revolver and the youths made off.

22.48 It appears to have been this shooting which was heard by a number of policemen, including Sgt St John, who were on the Crumlin Road. Some of these officers appear to have assumed that they were under fire and shots were fired by them into the grounds of Holy Cross Church.* This incident in which policemen fired in error on, or in the direction of, their colleagues was acknowledged by DI Montgomery as being "undisciplined", and accepted by him as a "mistake".

22.49 Some evidence was received alleging shooting from the Holy Cross Church. Upon the instructions of the Tribunal Mr G Gibson, a senior Architect in the Ministry of Finance, and Dr Martin of the Northern Ireland Department of Industrial and Forensic Science, examined the church and its towers. In the opinion of these two experts there could not have been any shooting from the church. The Tribunal is satisfied that there was none and that the evidence to the contrary was mistaken.

SECTION 5—GENERAL

22.50 Hospital records of casualties show that in the Ardoyne area on the night of 14/15 August 1969, gunshot injuries were sustained by twelve men of whom two, Mr Samuel McLarnon and Mr Michael Lynch, died. Ten of the twelve were injured by bullets and two by shotgun pellets. Since there is no evidence of bullet firing weapons in the hands of Protestant civilians it is probable that the ten bullet casualties were caused by police fire. All those who sustained gunshot injuries during the period 11 pm 14 August to 1 am 15 August were Catholics.

22.51 DI Montgomery described the night of 14/15 August as "the worst night I have ever experienced", "absolutely frightening", and he was convinced that it "was certainly a very well planned calculated affair". However obvious this may have seemed to Mr Montgomery on the night in question, the evidence does not permit us to go so far. He was impressed by the fact that the police were attacked first in Hooker Street, which was cleared, and then attacked in turn from Chatham Street, Herbert Street, Butler Street and Kerrera Street. But this is not difficult to explain simply in terms of the police driving rioters from one street to another and the rioters reforming and counter-attacking. Mr Montgomery's other reason for assuming that the rioters were organised appears to be the persistence and intensity of the fighting. However the steady deterioration in police-Catholic relations in the area marked by increasing violence over the preceding three months shows that this is by no means an inevitable inference.

22.52 Nevertheless, the riots in the Ardoyne that night were started by the Catholic crowd; Hooker Street had been "cleared for action" before the riot began and firearms were used by the Catholics as well as by the police. In contrast with the riot of the previous night, it is not open to suggest that the object of the Catholics was to relieve pressure on Londonderry, because, by 5 pm on the 14th, the police had been withdrawn from conflict with the Bogsiders and the conflict itself had ended. Our conclusion is that certain elements in the Ardoyne were determined to embroil the police and saw a further opportunity this night. There is no evidence of any link between the Ardoyne and the Falls Road, but those who were out for trouble must have seen that the disturbed state of the City offered them a chance to stretch the police to breaking-point.

22.53 But equally, the Protestants on the south side of the Crumlin Road must have been ready to resume the conflict begun the night before and to crush the Catholics, if they could. For their part, the RUC, advised of possible and widespread armed subversive activity, were all too ready to see a community in armed rebellion in the actions of the Ardoyne mobs, especially after they had experienced gunfire from the Catholic side.

PART VIII—THE BELFAST DISTURBANCES: 15 & 16 AUGUST
CHAPTER 23—DIVIS STREET/LOWER FALLS

23.1 In the early daylight hours and throughout the morning of Friday, 15 August, the chief activity to be seen in Percy Street, Dover Street and Ardmoulin Avenue (as well as in Conway Street, Cupar Street and Norfolk Street) was the evacuation of Catholic families from their homes. Hand carts, cars and vans were used to carry away furniture and household effects. Lorries and other vehicles were hijacked for the same purpose. DI Cushley interpreted this Catholic exodus from border areas as "clearing the decks for further trouble that evening" and Rev Beattie testified that this view was widespread among Protestants whom he met in the area and who believed they had been attacked by the Catholics the previous night. Mr Allen said that he saw a man directing the moving out of Catholic residents and their belongings from Dover Street. He said that some people were unwilling to leave but they were told they had to go whether they liked it or not.

23.2 It was suggested that this activity was IRA inspired, but the Tribunal is satisfied that it was essentially a movement of residents and their friends organising their own self-help and protection, determined to quit areas where there had been vicious fighting and damage to property and where trouble might be expected to recur that night.

23.3 These apprehensions were not confined to Catholic residents. Rev Beattie spoke of an atmosphere of "tremendous fear" among Protestants whom he visited in the Dover Street area. He saw Protestant residents moving their valuables and shopkeepers moving stock. This contrasted with the complete evacuation of their houses by the Catholics. In Beverley Street Protestants were moving into houses which had been left empty by Catholics.

Afternoon riot in Percy Street

23.4 During the afternoon, fighting broke out in Percy Street. At about 2 30 pm Mr Pinder and Mr McAnally (Security Officer at Andrews Mill) saw a Belfast Corporation bus drive along Ardmoulin Avenue and park across Percy Street by the gates of Andrews Mill. After Mr Pinder and Mr McAnally had remonstrated with the driver of the bus, who was not wearing a uniform, it was moved away from the Mill gates but later put back into position across Percy Street just north of the Ardmoulin Avenue junction. Mr Pinder then left the Mill.

23.5 Mr McAnally described how after opposing crowds had gathered on either side of the bus the Catholic crowd charged up Percy Street towards it throwing stones and petrol bombs. The bus and houses nearby on the east side of Percy Street went on fire. Once the battle had started both sides were throwing petrol bombs some of which were hitting and igniting both the bus and the houses. Mr McAnally's view of Percy Street to the north of the bus was obscured by the vehicle itself but at the time of the first Catholic charge he thought there was a crowd of Protestants beyond Beverley Street. Both crowds reached 300–400 in number and exchanged missiles over the bus.

23.6 Evidence was given to the Tribunal about firing from Andrews Mill. Mr Hutton saw five men on the roof of Andrews Mill armed with rifles open fire on the Protestant crowd causing a number of injuries. Mr Morgan, on the other hand, described seeing flashes from the roof of the Mill as shots were fired into the Catholic crowd. This witness, who said that trouble started when two crowds of about 30 people clashed at around 5 45 pm, heard shooting from the Protestant crowd some of whom, including a man firing a revolver, entered the Messrs Andrews premises. A shotgun was fired from the Protestant crowd and fire was returned by the Catholics.

23.7 The reliability of the recollection of Mr Hutton and Mr Morgan must be suspect in the light of the evidence of Mr McAnally who saw no gunmen on the mill buildings and asserted that the only people on the roof of the granary were a fire-fighting squad of mill employees. According to this witness both Catholic and Protestant crowds broke into the mill yard. Fighting took place and eventually the Protestants forced the Catholics out of the yard, remaining there themselves until the arrival of the military. The only firearm which Mr McAnally saw was a shotgun being fired by a man from the Catholic side who was lying on the west side of Percy Street and shooting towards the bus (time 3 30 pm). Mr McAnally did not see anyone hit.

23.8 That there was at some stage shooting from both Catholic and Protestant factions is apparent from casualty lists which show that two Catholics and two Protestants sustained bullet wounds in Percy Street on the afternoon of 15 August. Mr McAnally thought that the placing of the bus barricade in Percy Street followed by the attack from the Falls Road crowd indicated a planned operation. Although the positioning of the bus precipitated violence in Percy Street the fact, as Mr McAnally acknowledged, that it formed an effective barrier between the two factions may suggest that this operation was originally intended as a defensive one by the Catholics responsible.

23.9 An attempt was made by a group of Catholics, including Mr Morgan, to set fire to Andrews Mill by igniting petrol poured on to the roof but the flames were extinguished with fire hoses manned by mill employees. This attempt was intended as a reprisal against the supposed use of the mill by snipers. The firing of the New Northern Mill at Divis Street/Northumberland Street, shortly afterwards, in which Mr Morgan was also involved, was a more successful enterprise: the building was completely destroyed. It was suspected of having housed snipers the previous night.

23.10 In the late afternoon Mr McKeown, returning to his home in Ardmoulin Avenue, observed a crowd of 10–20 people at the Percy Street end of Ardmoulin Avenue kicking open doors and throwing petrol bombs into the houses. By this time all the other residents of Ardmoulin Avenue had moved out. Mr McKeown telephoned both the police and the fire service but neither came.

23.11 Seven houses at the Percy Street end of Ardmoulin Avenue were destroyed as were another group of seven in Percy Street itself to the north of Ardmoulin Avenue. All these were occupied by Catholics. Other houses in both streets sustained minor damage. The Tribunal has no doubt that Protestants were responsible for the damage and destruction of houses in both Percy Street and Ardmoulin Avenue.

23.12 The disorder in Percy Street was not brought to an end until the arrival of the military who were in position by about 6 45 pm (see below). It appears that throughout the fighting in this area during the afternoon there were no police present. Mr McAnally thought he made about 20–30 telephone calls to the police from about 3 pm onwards. Entries in the police log from 3 23 pm onwards show that reports of trouble in Percy Street were reaching police headquarters. The reasons for the absence of police during this period are discussed in paras. 24.4–6.

The arrival of the army

23.13 Between 5 30 and 6 30 pm on Friday, 15 August, the 2 Battalion Queen's Regiment, under the command of Lt Col Fletcher, arrived in Shankill Road and having dismounted from their trucks advanced southwards along the side streets. By 6 45 pm they had taken up position in Divis Street from Northumberland Street to Millfield with orders to keep the two sides apart. The New Northern Mill was still burning. The troops met with no opposition; indeed Col Fletcher told the Tribunal that the small crowds which gathered around the army control points were "friendly and curious and the atmosphere on the whole was good".

23.14 By the time the military were in place barricades were in position in both the Catholic streets to the south of Divis Street and the primarily Protestant territory to the north. Those to the north were removed with little opposition from the residents but the army was denied access to the barricaded Catholic streets. It was apparent to Col Fletcher that there was some organisation behind the barricades on the Catholic side. After the army's deployment the police continued to operate mobile patrols in the area not occupied by the army.

23.15 HC Gray gave evidence that shortly after 11 pm at the request of the army he took his armoured vehicle to Dover Street where he saw houses on fire on both sides of the road between Beverley Street and Divis Street. There were also four or five houses burning on the south side of Beverley Street. In the vicinity was a Protestant crowd some of whom appeared to be evacuating a Protestant occupied house which was threatened by fire. "Some of them were well under the influence of drink and my assessment of the thing was that between drink and hatred they were practically insane, some of them". Eventually fire appliances arrived.

23.16 An entry in the fire log (call timed at 12 44 am 16 August) shows that six two-storey dwelling houses in Beverley Street and their contents were destroyed by fire. Other evidence before the Tribunal suggests that seven houses in Beverley Street were so severely damaged that they had to be demolished. All but one were occupied by Catholics. The inference that these houses were destroyed by Protestants is a strong one and the Tribunal accepts it. It may have been these events which Col Fletcher referred to in his evidence when he described some trouble he had with petrol-bombing Protestants in Dover Street on the night 15/16 August.

CHAPTER 24 DECISIONS OF THE POLICE AND ARMY

24.1 At 4 30 am, on the 15th, after the worst of the night's rioting was over, Mr Wolseley, in consultation with his deputy, Mr Bradley, made two important decisions. The first was to order the arrest, with a view to detention under the Civil Authorities (Special Powers) Act, of a number of suspected members of the IRA. This was done because, in Mr Bradley's words, he and the Commissioner were "satisfied that the night's events had been the work of the IRA". During the morning of 15 August six men in Belfast were detained under the Act.*

24.2 The second decision was a momentous one: to request the deployment of army units on the streets of Belfast. It was the final recognition by the two senior police officers in the city that the situation was beyond their control. The request was passed to the Inspector-General who met the Minister of Home Affairs at around 11 30 am, shortly before a Cabinet meeting was to be held. By this time the Inspector-General had prepared a written request for army assistance in Belfast. This was shown to Mr Porter and the matter was discussed by the NI Cabinet at a midday meeting. At 12 25 pm, with the agreement of the Cabinet, a formal request for military aid in Belfast was transmitted to the Home Office in London.

24.3 The request from the Inspector-General to the Army was as follows:

"From Inspector-General, Royal Ulster Constabulary to the General Officer Commanding, Northern Ireland. I have to inform you that, following the violence in the City of Belfast last night, renewed clashes are occurring at this time, 11 30 am, 15 August 1969. The Commissioner has informed me that all immediately available police have been committed but that he is unable to separate the rioting crowds and has had to fall back to defend his police stations. In the circumstances outlined, I now request further assistance of forces under your command in Belfast City. Information is to hand from a reliable source that an infiltration of members of the Irish Republican Army is about to commence from Eire into Northern Ireland. It is the intention to escalate the degree of control over inward-bound traffic and to this end assistance in the form of patrols by armoured cars is also requested. The information indicates that the infiltrators will be armed and the support of mobile armoured units, which I cannot supply, would be of material assistance in countering these subversive activities against the Government and people of Northern Ireland".

United Kingdom ministerial approval for the deployment of troops in Belfast was given at 3 10 pm. They were not however in position on the streets until early evening after rioting had broken out in West Belfast. Serious rioting also occurred in the Ardoyne but troops were not sent there until the following day.

24.4 One of the key features of the rioting which broke out during the afternoon in Percy Street, Ardoyne and Clonard was the absence of police in any numbers. In his evidence to the Tribunal, Mr Bradley thought it was going

*Four of these were released before the end of the month and charges were preferred against the other two. Outside Belfast 18 men were detained; all were released after a short period.

too far to describe Belfast as being unpol[illegible] 15 August although he acknowledged that "the men were thin on the ground; not in sufficient numbers to deal with an emergency". Mr Bradley expected army units would be deployed by 10 or 11 am and although small numbers of police came on duty at 6 am and 12 30 p.m. it seems that he was not expecting further serious trouble until the evening, by which time he assumed the military would be in position. A number of senior police officers, including DI Lagan and DI Cushley, gave evidence that, because of a threatened IRA attack on police stations, priority was given to station defence so that the limited number of policemen available were retained inside the stations instead of being deployed on the streets.

24.5 This falling back to defend their stations by the police is referred to in the I-G's request for troops set out above. Mr Bradley did not however accept that this had taken place; he said that the stations were "slightly strengthened" as a precaution against IRA attack. The evidence of the Commissioner, Mr Wolseley, on this point was that there was no general order to the police to remain in stations although it could be taken from his order given on the night 13/14 August that it would be unwise to patrol except in armoured vehicles.

24.7 Police tactics this day were clearly dictated by their interpretation of the previous night's events which they saw in terms of an IRA led uprising. The Tribunal does not question the sincerity of this belief, but it was quite mistaken. The Tribunal finds that the RUC are to be criticized for their failure to disperse mobs or protect lives and property on 15 August during the hours of daylight before the arrival of the army.

24.8 By 3 10 pm when permission to deploy troops had been received from London, preparations for military intervention had already been discussed by senior army and police officers. Shortly after midday the Commanding Officers of two battalions, Lt Col Fletcher of 2 Battalion Queen's Regiment and Lt Col Napier of the Royal Regiment of Wales, together with the Brigade Commander of 39 Brigade, Brigadier Hudson, met the Commissioner and Deputy Commissioner at Castlereagh. District Inspector Lagan was also present. The details of this meeting are of some importance in the light of criticism of the army's eventual decision as to where to place its forces, particularly those under Col Napier which were sent to the Clonard area.

24.9 The first meeting was between Brigadier Hudson and Mr Wolseley alone. The account given here is that of the Brigadier whose recollection was supported by notes he took at the time. Mr Wolseley could not remember anything about the meeting. Brigadier Hudson pointed out to Mr Wolseley that the limited forces at his disposal were only sufficient to occupy and operate from a stretch of r[illegible] about a mile long. Mr Wolseley described the unrest, shooting and arson which was taking place in various parts of Belfast. He thought troops should be put into Falls Road and Divis Street and the area immediately to the north. There were rumours that Catholic residents of houses to the north of Divis Street had been evacuated and that these houses had been occupied by the IRA. There was also a report that there were armed men in the grounds of Royal Victoria Hospital in Grosvenor Road and that the operating theatre had also been occupied. Mr Wolseley may have mentioned the need for troops in the Crumlin Road but Brigadier Hudson's forces were insufficient for deployment in both this area and Falls Road/Divis Street.

24.10 After a decision to deploy in the Divis/Falls area had been taken there were further discussions in which senior police officers pointed out to Brigadier Hudson the path of the "Orange-Green" line which separates the Catholic and Protestant area of West Belfast. This line runs roughly east-west to the north of Divis Street/Falls Road'.* It appears that after these consultations Brigadier Hudson decided that he did not have sufficient men to occupy the twisted path of the Orange-Green line which ran along small side streets. He decided instead to put his men initially on the main Falls Road/Divis Street. The Royal Regiment of Wales under Col Napier were to be positioned along Falls Road between Grosvenor Road and Northumberland Street and 2 Queen's under Col Fletcher along Divis Street between Northumberland Street and Millfield. Although Brigadier Hudson's decision to deploy his men in Falls Road/Divis Street instead of along the Orange Green line had unfortunate consequences in the Clonard area†, the Tribunal fully appreciates the factors which led to it and makes no criticism of what was essentially a matter of professional judgment.

CHAPTER 25—CLONARD

25.1 An important phase of the Tribunal's investigation of events in Belfast covered disturbances in a small area in the west of the city between Falls Road and Shankill Road on Friday, 15 August. This is the area where the Catholic Clonard district to the north of the Springfield Road/Falls Road junction abuts on to the Protestant Shankill area further north. The boundary between the two districts was sharply defined by the middle leg of Cupar Street which at the time of the riots had a mixed population in which Protestants outnumbered Catholics by about two to one. The most prominent single building in the area is the Clonard Monastery. Situated about 100 yards to the south of Cupar Street in Waterville Street, the Monastery was in many ways at the centre of the terrible events of the afternoon and evening of Friday, 15 August.

Thursday, 14 August

25.2 The disturbances on the Falls Road on the evening of Wednesday, 13 August, which have already been described, did not spread to the Clonard area. On the following day at about 1 30 pm an anonymous telephone message was received at Clonard Monastery advising the occupants to evacuate as they were going to be burned out. The message was passed to Fr McLaughlin, the acting Superior, who relayed it to the police at Springfield Road station at about 2 pm. Fr McLaughlin was told by the police to take necessary action to secure and protect his property. During this or perhaps a subsequent call to the station Fr McLaughlin informed HC Rooney, who was the senior RUC officer at Springfield Road, that he intended to assemble a fire guard to protect the church that evening. HC Rooney testified that he was told that "vigilantes" would be present in the vicinity of the church and they would be identified by white armbands.

*The path of the orange-green line is indicated on the Map M in Appendix VIII.

25.3 From men whom he knew through his pastoral duties to be reliable and responsible, Fr McLaughlin assembled a number of volunteers to guard the Monastery in two shifts. Apprehension and fear quickly spread among the Catholic residents as news of the threatened attack became known. Tension was also high among Protestants in the area. A Protestant resident of Cupar Street, Mrs Scott, testified that she was "disturbed and nervous" at a rumour that Protestants in Cupar Street were going to be burned out. Mrs Scott heard that Catholic children in Cupar Street had been evacuated to Clonard Monastery.

25.4 During the evening reports came into the Clonard area of disturbances elsewhere in the city, the nearest being in the southern parts of Cupar Street and Conway Street. Some Catholic residents in the area wanted to erect barricades to prevent an attack from Cupar Street but they were dissuaded by Fr McLaughlin who thought barricades might draw attention to the area. Petrol bombs were however accumulated at a point near Cupar Street. There was a rumour that a sniper was situated in the trees at the bottom of the Monastery garden. Fr McLaughlin was expecting the police to arrive but none came.

25.5 At about 10 30 pm Fr McLaughlin came upon two armed men, one with a shotgun and the other with a ·22 rifle, in a lower corridor of the Monastery. Both men were known to him as reliable. They told the priest that they were there to defend the building. Because of the fear of an attack, the rumour about the sniper and the absence of police, Fr McLaughlin decided to allow them to stay and guard the Monastery. They were taken upstairs to a room overlooking a laneway which led past St Gall's School beside the Monastery into Cupar Street. The door was left open and two priests as well as members of the fireguard were continually going in and out of the room. Fr McLaughlin instructed the two armed men to use their weapons as a last resort if the Monastery was being attacked, and then only to fire in the air. In fact there was no attack on the Monastery on the night of the 14th; nor were there any disturbances in the Clonard area. Before the volunteers guarding the Monastery that night had left they arranged to meet at 7 pm of Friday to discuss the situation.

Friday, 15 August

25.6 Shortly after midday Fr McLaughlin telephoned Springfield Road RUC Station and asked HC Rooney what should be done if an attack were mounted from Cupar Street. According to Fr McLaughlin the advice he received was "Rest assured; if an attack comes from Cupar Street, they'll never get through." Thoughout the morning Catholics were leaving their homes in Cupar Street. Mrs Scott described how during the morning lorries driven by strangers to the district began carrying away furniture from Catholic homes. Before they left "people who got on to the lorries" broke the windows of these houses.

25.7 At about 1 pm an informal meeting took place in Kashmir Road between Fr McLaughlin, Rev Beattie and a local Protestant businessman. Mr Beattie was not a local man; he had spent the morning among his congregation in the Townsend Street/Dover Street area which had seen severe rioting on the previous night. While in that area he was asked to go to Cupar Street to act as spokesman for Protestants in the Canmore Street/Cupar Street area by making contact with the Clonard priests in an attempt to preserve peace. At their meeting Mr Beattie and Fr McLaughlin both expressed a desire to prevent trouble from starting. Mr Beattie said that he would hold a meeting of Protestant residents at 3 pm; Fr McLaughlin told him that a meeting of Catholics had already been called for 7 pm. In his evidence to the Tribunal Mr Beattie could not recollect any discussion about the appointment of stewards but Fr McLaughlin testified that the outcome of the meeting was an agreement that 30 volunteers should be selected from the respective meetings. These volunteers would form a peace corps who would mount guard at Kashmir Road/Cupar Street to prevent the outbreak of trouble.

25.8 While this discussion was going on Fr McLaughlin noticed that there was considerable activity in Cupar Street: youths with sticks and bin lids were running up and down. Lorries were then placed across the mouths of Kashmir Road and Sugarfield Street. Kashmir Road was a Catholic Street and Sugarfield Street was Protestant, but both barricades appear to have been erected by Protestants. Mr Hemsworth, a Catholic resident of Bombay Street who appears to have become involved in the clergymen's negotiations, also described the positioning of a large mobile container in the mouth of Kashmir Road by a Protestant crowd. Subsequently a lorry barricade was erected by the Catholic residents at Bombay Street/Kashmir Road.

25.9 Mrs Scott gave evidence that before any barricade was erected she saw, from her position opposite the mouth of Kane Street, children and adult men carrying petrol bombs and stones into an entry between Bombay Street and Cupar Street. This was at about 1 pm. After 2 pm this witness saw two barricades erected in Kashmir Road. Unlike other witnesses Mrs Scott testified that the first to appear was a flat lorry which Catholics positioned at Kashmir Road/Bombay Street. Subsequently a large mobile container was placed across the mouth of Kashmir Road by a group of about 12 Protestants.

25.10 At around the same time as these events in the Kashmir Road/Cupar Street area Finnegan's, a Catholic owned public house in Cupar Street about 250 yards east of the Kashmir Road junction, was set on fire. The building was burned down and its contents looted. The schedule of calls to the Belfast Fire Brigade shows that when a fire appliance responded to a call made at 1 39 pm the public house had been completely destroyed.

25.11 At 3 pm the meeting of Protestant residents called by Mr Beattie was held at the junction of Ashmore Street and Canmore Street, only a short distance from Cupar Street. Before the meeting began Mr Beattie noticed a small number of people in Canmore Street making petrol bombs, which he was assured would only be used in defence. Some people also appeared to have been drinking: Mr Beattie was told that liquor had been looted from a public house—presumably Finnegan's.

25.12 Mr Beattie thought that there was a preponderance of women and children at the meeting with only a few men among the 50–100 present. In his address to the meeting he said that they should try and minimise any incidents which took place since the throwing of one stone could lead to a riot. He reported that he had been in touch with representatives of the Catholics whom he was quite sure wanted peace. While Mr Beattie was speaking Mr John McQuade, Unionist MP for Woodvale, arrived. Mr McQuade's account of the part he played in the meeting was brief and to the point:

> "He [Mr Beattie] informed me that he with a Roman Catholic Priest and a Republican had a peace pact. I informed the people that there was no need for any peace pact; if people would obey the law of the land and recognise the constitution there was no other need. I then warned the women and children to go into their homes, and keep off the streets. I told the men they would have to be prepared to defend them."

25.13 In his evidence to the Tribunal Mr Beattie said that far from rejecting the idea of a "peace pact" he thought that Mr McQuade had indicated his approval of such an arrangement. Mr Beattie denied that he was disappointed by the turn of events at the meeting, but when pressed by the Chairman he accepted that he would have preferred there to have been no other speakers. Nevertheless, after Mr McQuade had spoken, Mr Beattie, prompted by the former's reference to defence, resumed the platform to make it clear that he was not advocating that the people should not defend themselves if this became necessary. While understanding Mr Beattie's reluctance to concede that the meeting was a disappointment, we have no doubt that owing to Mr McQuade's intervention it failed in its purpose.

25.14 After the meeting Mr Beattie left the area. The Protestant businessman to whom reference has already been made then called on Fr McLaughlin in the Monastery and, according to the priest, told him that Mr McQuade had broken up the peace effort and only 8 people had volunteered to act as peace-keepers. As Fr McLaughlin was escorting the businessman from the Monastery shortly after 3 pm he saw that fighting was taking place in Kashmir Road; he did not however see its commencement.

25.15 By now the Catholic barricade at Bombay Street/Kashmir Road was in position and the area between it and the Protestant barricade at Kashmir Road/Cupar Street was filled with youths who were throwing stones. They were apparently Protestants from Cupar Street and they were being resisted by 10 or 15 youths on the Catholic side. Shortly afterwards Fr McLaughlin saw a petrol bomb thrown from the Cupar Street direction. While on his way back to the Monastery to telephone the police, he saw smoke coming from the chimney and an upper window of a house in Bombay Street. He assumed that it had been set on fire—perhaps by a petrol bomb thrown into the back of the house from the Cupar Street direction. The occupants rushed from the house into the Monastery from where Fr McLaughlin telephoned the police, telling them that trouble had started and asking for assistance.*

25.16 Father Egan's description of the early stages of the fighting in Kashmir Road corresponded closely to that of Fr McLaughlin. He saw about 45 people between the two barricades in Kashmir Road. They were throwing stones, bottles and petrol bombs at a smaller, younger group of about 20 Catholics who were returning the stones and bottles.

25.17 Neither of the two priests, however, saw the start of the violence in Kashmir Road; for this, the Tribunal had only the evidence of Mr Hemsworth and Mrs Scott. Mr Hemsworth said that shortly after an unsuccessful attempt to push over on its side the lorry which was being used by the Catholics as a barricade at Kashmir Road/Bombay Street, a hail of bottles and stones were thrown at the Catholics from the direction of Cupar Street. A much smaller group of Catholics—never more than 30—returned these missiles. After about 10 minutes the first petrol bombs were thrown by the Protestants. According to Mr Hemsworth the first building to catch fire was a shoemaker's shop (72 Kashmir Road) at the corner of Kashmir Road and Bombay Street. Fr McLaughlin also gave evidence that this building was among the first to be burned (at about 4 pm) and was ultimately destroyed. This witness thought that Nos 17 and 19 Bombay Street were set on fire from the back at about the same time.

25.18 Mrs Scott, however, thought that fighting commenced with the throwing of stones by Catholics from Kashmir Road. The Tribunal finds she was mistaken and that the riot began as Mr Hemsworth described.

25.19 Having witnessed the fighting in Kashmir Road, Fr Egan returned to the Monastery bringing with him some Catholic residents who were by now almost hysterical. At 3 45 pm as he was about to enter the building he heard shooting from the Cupar Street direction. He went upstairs and, looking out from a window, saw a boy whom he had taken into the backyard of the Monastery a few minutes earlier lying face downwards on the footpath in Waterville Street and writhing in agony. Fr Egan rushed out to the boy. He found a trail of blood running from the boy's position some yards along the footpath in the direction of Bombay Street. The injured boy, whose name was Gerald McAuley, was placed on a lorry and then taken by ambulance (the call for which was received at 4 20 pm) to the Royal Victoria Hospital.

25.20 When Gerald McAuley was examined at 4 45 pm he was found to be dead. He was aged 15 and had lived in Colinward Street which is on the opposite side of Springfield Road from Clonard. Death was caused by a medium or high velocity bullet fired at close range which entered the chest and heart, passing right through the body.

*It appears that at this time a fire-appliance was attempting to deal with a fire in a mill in Cupar Street. When one of the occupants of the burning house tried to use one of the hoses on this building, there was an altercation as a result of which the crew of the appliance departed, abandoning their vehicle.

25.21 After hearing of more shooting casualties and seeing houses set on fire Fr McLaughlin once again telephoned the police, this time from a private house. His description of this conversation and of his state of mind at the time was a vivid one.

". . . I was terribly agitated and worked up and terribly afraid there was going to be a holocaust and that the whole area was going to be wiped out, I was absolutely convinced that this was an attempt not merely to wipe out the Monastery but the whole area. I was really in desperation for help and I said to the man whoever answered the phone, 'Why are you not coming up to help us?' Then I said, 'Is it because your own side are doing the attacking?' and he got a bit annoyed at that and he said, 'What do you mean?' and I said, 'You know very well', I said 'the people of Cupar Street'. So I put down the phone and that ended the conversation".

It was not only Catholic residents who sought the help of the police. Mrs Scott telephoned them on several ("about seven") occasions but there was no response to her calls.

25.22 During the afternoon (at about 4 30 pm) Fr Hanly the Superior at the Monastery, who had now returned, went to Springfield Road RUC station to seek police assistance. HC Rooney, the senior RUC officer, had however gone off duty at 2 30 pm so that he did not learn of Fr Hanly's visit or of the several telephone calls which were made from the Monastery until some time later. At around 5 pm a crowd near the front of the Monastery urged Fr Hanly to summon help by ringing the church bell. He thought this would be unwise but the decision was taken out of his hands when a young boy in a hysterical condition ("really he was mad, his eyes were bulging and he had lost all self-control") rushed into the bell-tower and rang the bell.

25.23 Such evidence as the Tribunal has from Protestants indicates that panic and hysteria were not confined to the Catholic side of Cupar Street. Mr McMillan described seeing excited and hysterical people especially women in Sugarfield Street at about 4 30 pm. Shortly afterwards this witness saw bottles and stones being thrown from the mouth of Kashmir Road down Cupar Street towards Sugarfield Street. He went into Cupar Street where he was struck by shotgun pellets immediately after he had seen a flash from the Kashmir Road direction.

25.24 Mr Hugh Johnston, who had been in Dover Street the night before, told the Tribunal that he left his work that afternoon at 4 30 pm, about 10 minutes earlier than usual. He was employed at the factory of James Mackie and Sons Ltd in Springfield Road and on leaving work took the precaution of arming himself with an iron bar. Some of the hundreds of fellow employees who went with him into Cupar Street on their way home may also have had similar weapons. Barricades were being erected by Catholics on the south side of Cupar Street. According to Mr Johnston the Catholics threw stones at the workers on their way home and these were returned. A shotgun was fired from Clonard Gardens injuring one man and forcing a crowd of Protestants which had entered the street back out into Cupar Street. Mr Johnston moved along Cupar Street to the Kashmir Road junction. In the mouth of Kashmir

Road a big Scania lorry had been turned on its side and set on fire with petrol bombs (he thought by the Catholics). Two crowds were exchanging stones across this barricade. At this time Bombay Street was black with smoke.

25.25 At about 5 pm two Protestants, Mr S Wallace and Mr Orr, were walking down Sugarfield Street towards Cupar Street when Mr Orr was shot in the leg. Mr Wallace thought the shot had come from Clonard Monastery although he admitted that he did not know from where it had come.

25.26 Sometime before 6 pm Rev Beattie who since the meeting in Canmore Street at 3 pm had been assisting in refugee work elsewhere in the city heard that there had been trouble in the Clonard area. He drove to Ashmore Street where he heard shooting. Turning into Cupar Street he saw a man firing a gun (probably a shotgun) towards the Catholic crowd in Kashmir Road. Mr Beattie telephoned the police and reported what he had seen. He also telephoned the central office of the Presbyterian Church from which he learned that there were plans to bring in the army. Mr Beattie remarked that if they were to be of any use troops should be deployed without delay.

25.27 At about 6 30 pm Mr Traynor, a Protestant, arrived in Cupar Street in response to a message that the premises of his employer (Lawther and Harvey) were on fire. This message proved to be false. He saw a woman walking southwards along the eastern footpath of Cupar Street. She fell to the ground and he subsequently learned she had been shot. He then saw the barrel of a shotgun protruding from a second floor window at the rear of St Galls school in Waterville Street after which he himself was shot, he thought from the direction of the school.

25.28 During the afternoon older residents in the Monastery had been evacuated. The Eucharist was removed by the priests to a place of safety. At a time he estimated as 6 pm, Fr Egan telephoned Army Headquarters at Lisburn and learned that the army units were on the way to Belfast. Details of what was possibly a subsequent telephone conversation in which Fr Egan referred to burnings, shootings and the death of McAuley are recorded in the log of the 39 Infantry Brigade. This call is timed at 7 40 pm.

25.29 Reference has already been made to the discussion between the military and police authorities about the area where the army were to be deployed*. At this meeting Brigadier Hudson decided to place 1st Battalion the Royal Regiment of Wales under Col Napier along the Lower Falls Road from Grosvenor Road to Northumberland Street. It has been pointed out to the Brigadier by Mr Wolseley and Mr Bradley that the Catholic Clonard area lay to the north of this area of deployment. Mr Wolseley suggested that if possible troops should be positioned in Cupar Street, along the border between Catholic and Protestant territory. Brigadier Hudson, however, decided against this: "Working out the number of troops I had to the area I had to deal with, I decided that what was most important to me was to get a secure base along that main [Falls] road from which I could operate subsequently . . . " It is clear from this answer that Brigadier Hudson was aware of the advisability of deploying along Cupar Street but decided against doing so because of his limited manpower. Col Napier did not however appreciate the significance of Cupar Street. He "clearly understood" that Falls Road marked the border between the Catholic and Protestant areas. In fact, far from being the border between the two factions, Falls Road was to the south of the conflict area and well within Catholic territory.

25.30 At about 6 30 pm two companies of 1 Royal Regiment of Wales, numbering about 250 men in all, arrived in Falls Road and set up headquarters in Springfield Road RUC station.

25.31 Mr Hemsworth, who saw the army arrive, gave evidence of hearing a sergeant tell people on one side of the Falls Road to stay away from those on the other side although he, the sergeant, was told by local people that Catholics lived on both sides. They moved along Falls Road clearing it of people who began to gather in side streets some of which were barricaded. There was no resistance to the soldiers who were under orders to use their weapons only as a last resort.

25.32 By 7 30 pm the soldiers were in position and had erected barricades to prevent north-south movements across the road. Hearing noises and seeing fires to the north of Falls Road, Col Napier took a small party towards the Monastery at about 8 pm. His evidence was that he made this decision on his own initiative. Fr Egan told the Tribunal that at about 7 pm he went to Falls Road and told the soldiers he found there that they were needed in the vicinity of the Monastery. Rev Beattie testified that Protestant residents in Canmore Street complained to him that soldiers had not yet been seen in their area. When Col Napier arrived at the Monastery he was taken upstairs by Fr Egan. From this vantage point he could see that areas of Bombay Street were ablaze. Fr Egan's evidence was that while they were inside the Monastery he had pointed out to the Colonel the stretch of Cupar Street where he thought soldiers should be positioned. While Col Napier was inside the building he saw a civilian with a shotgun "of some age." Fr McLaughlin and Fr Egan confirmed that the two men armed with guns who had been in the Monastery on the previous night returned on the night in question. This time only one was armed—with a shotgun.

25.33 Fr McLaughlin was not aware of any firing from the Monastery into Sugarfield Street. Fr Egan did not see guns being used at any time although he admitted, with some reluctance, that he had heard it "hinted at" that a shotgun had been fired at or in the direction of two men who had climbed on to a shed in the Monastery backyard. Ballistics experts gave evidence of bullet damage to a front first floor window in 177 Cupar Street. Both Mr Price and Dr Martin found this damage to be consistent with having originated from or passed close by the northern corner of the Monastery building at the Bombay Street end of Waterville Street. While Mr Price could not exclude the possibility of the bullets having travelled from further afield, the Tribunal is satisfied in the light of all the circumstances that some shots were fired from the Monastery in the direction of Cupar Street.

25.34 Col Napier spent 10 minutes in the Monastery before returning to his men on the Falls Road. He then ordered one platoon up to the area of the Monastery. From an entry in the platoon diary it appears that 2nd Lieut Adams and a platoon of B Company with Col Napier in command left for the Monastery at about 8 10 pm. This platoon comprising 26 men was deployed around the Monastery for a short period and then sent back to the Falls Road to rejoin B Company under Major Davey. Col Napier ordered this Company to move into Cupar Street and get between the two factions. In pursuance of this order Mr Adams and 8 men were sent into Cupar Street to ascertain whether Cupar Street was in fact the border between the two communities.

25.35 As this patrol advanced up Cupar Street, passing a mill burning furiously on the west side, they observed barricades in the side streets to either side. There were small numbers of people on the east (Protestant) side of Cupar Street, some of whom appeared to Mr Adams to be drunk. Some people on this side told him that there was a sniper in the direction of the Monastery. The Catholic Streets to the west were deserted. His reconnaissance completed, Mr Adams then returned to his Company Commander on the Falls Road, on the way back dispersing a crowd of (presumably) Protestants from Argyle Street, two of whom had come forward and thrown petrol bombs against a wall.

25.36 Having reported back to Major Davey at 9 35 pm, Mr Adams was sent out on his third trip, this time to patrol Waterville Street and ensure that the school next door to the Monastery, St Gall's, was not destroyed. When Mr Adams arrived the school was already on fire.* He took part of his platoon from Waterville Street into Bombay Street where he was "horrified" to see houses burning on both sides of the road. Bombay Street was deserted but there were sounds of activity in Cupar Street. Having halted his men at Bombay Street/ Kashmir Road Mr Adams ordered a Private Tyler to cross Kashmir Road to a position outside the remains of 72 Bombay Street, the shoemaker's shop which, we have seen, had been set on fire much earlier in the day. As Private Tyler was crossing Kashmir Road there was a blast as from a shotgun from the direction of Cupar Street. He fell to the ground injured and a second shot was fired grazing his ear.

25.37 Mr Adams ordered one of his men to fire a round into the gable end of a derelict house to provide cover while Private Tyler was dragged back to safety. The whole section then withdrew along Bombay Street and into Waterville Street (time: about 10 15), regrouped and returned to Kashmir Road. Shortly after the withdrawal Mr Adams learned that the corporal in charge of his rear section had fired a round at a man who appeared to be carrying a ·303 rifle. This shot and the one fired to cover Private Tyler's rescue were the only two rounds discharged by soldiers on duty in Belfast on 15 August.

*Fr Egan gave evidence that a fire started in the school earlier in the evening had already been extinguished.

25.38 On his return to Kashmir Road, Mr Adams ordered the discharge of CS gas against a Protestant mob of about 20 or 30 people who had entered Kashmir Road from Cupar Street throwing bricks and petrol bombs. They were driven back into Cupar Street. Further along Bombay Street at the Kane Street junction, Mr Adams saw youths throwing petrol bombs into houses in Bombay Street from behind a lorry-barricade in Kane Street. These people could only have come from Cupar Street. Mr Adams thought that only minimal damage to houses in Bombay Street was done at this time. He did not feel that he had sufficient men to advance along Bombay Street as far as Kane Street: this would have exposed his rear and might have allowed rioters to get between his front and rear sections.

25.39 Col Napier, who by this time had returned to the Bombay Street area, was also of the opinion that he had insufficient men to prevent attacks from across Cupar Street. He could not bring other men into this area while he had "to retain the firm defence, if that is the right word, of Falls Road/Divis Street".

25.40 For some time Mr Adams' men continued to use CS gas against groups of people attacking from Cupar Street. At one stage he addressed them through a loud-hailer. In the course of the evening about 50 CS grenades and cartridges were used in the Bombay Street/Cupar Street area. As the situation began to quieten down it was thought safe to bring the abandoned fire engine, manned by civilians, along Waterville Street to deal with the fire in St Gall's school. Other fires in Bombay Street were also dealt with. The soldiers gave what help they could in fire-fighting.

25.41 After midnight Mr Adams with extra men took up position at Clonard Gardens/Cupar Street where flames from burning lorries had spread to nearby houses. From this position he noticed a large barricade from which a Union Jack was displayed in the mouth of Lawnbrook Avenue. By this time soldiers had occupied Waterville Street, Clonard Gardens, Bombay Street, Kane Street, part of Cupar Street and part of Kashmir Road, thus covering all entrances to the Clonard area from Cupar Street. In Cupar Street Mr Adams found substantial crowds of Protestants in each of the side streets to the north: some of them were drunk.

25.42 Earlier in the evening Mr Max Hastings of the London Evening Standard had attached himself to Mr Adams' party. Mr Hastings testified to the confused state of affairs which existed in the Clonard area at that time. The military were short of men, did not have adequate maps of the area, nor, according to Mr Hastings, did they appear to know where the boundary between the two factions lay. At one stage Mr Hastings saw a police armoured vehicle drive along Cupar Street from the Springfield Road direction and crash through the barricade at Lawnbrook Avenue. Learning that there was a police officer on the far side of the barricade who wished to speak to him, Mr Adams invited him to come forward. This police officer was DI Cushley and he offered to try and talk some sense into the people at the barricade; Mr Adams agreed and provided him with a military escort.

25.43 The District Inspector's party seems to have been the only group of police in the Clonard/Cupar Street area during the afternoon and evening of 15 August. DI Cushley's evidence was that in response to a radio call from DI Lagan (who had been asked for assistance by Fr Egan at about 9 30 pm) he took his two armoured vehicles, a Commer and a Shorland, to the Clonard area. He was apprehensive of the sort of reception he might get: he had heard from a "very reliable source" that there was a detachment of IRA in the area. Having gained access to the area he found himself in a street enveloped in flames, presumably Bombay Street. He spoke to a priest who told him about a sniper in Lawnbrook Avenue. DI Cushley agreed to investigate this. "I left the area as I got the impression that we were not wanted. We were in an armoured Commer and we had a Shorland armoured car with Browning gun mounted and we were not wanted so we left". Moving to Lawnbrook Avenue, DI Cushley met Mr Adams and told him about the situation in Bombay Street and the rumours of snipers in Lawnbrook Avenue. As his instructions were to leave the area in which the army was deployed solely to them, DI Cushley was satisfied that he could do nothing more. He therefore left the area and resumed patrolling elsewhere. After his meeting with Mr Cushley, Mr Adams continued to patrol Cupar Street, witnessing an incident at Bellevue Street where a Protestant crowd threatened Mr Hastings when someone told them he was a reporter.

25.44 Realising that he had insufficient men Col Napier had in the course of the evening sought troop reinforcements. At about 2 am. on the morning of Saturday, 16 August, a company of 90 men of the Third Light Infantry was deployed in Cupar Street. By this time the area was quiet although many buildings were still burning or smouldering. During the evening requests for the fire service were sent out from Col Napier's headquarters. But it was not until the early hours of the morning that a fire engine manned by firemen arrived to supplement the operations of the abandoned engine.

Casualties and damage to property

25.45 There was one fatality during the fighting. The boy, Gerald McAuley, was a Catholic and the evidence available to the Tribunal supports the inference that he was killed by a gunman from the Protestant faction and the Tribunal so finds. In addition there were many non-fatal gunshot casualties. Information collected by the Tribunal based on hospital records shows that over the period 15-16 August 23 Protestants and 12 Catholics (excluding McAuley) were shot. Of the total of 35 casualties 29 were injured by shotgun or ·22 and 5* by bullets (one projectile unidentified). Up until about 5 pm on 15 August Catholics and Protestants were injured in about equal numbers. From that time onwards the records show that of the 17 people injured only two were Catholics.

*3 Catholics, 2 Protestants.

25.46 It is unlikely that these figures are exhaustive of all Catholics who sustained gunshot injuries, since some, particularly those who received slight shotgun wounds, may not have gone to hospital. Instead, they may have attended casualty or refugee centres for treatment. First-aid centres were set up in Kashmir Road and in Clonard Monastery itself. If therefore the figures quoted are taken as minimal it is clear that there was a considerable amount of shooting from both sides.

25.47 If it is true that for the reason given Catholics are under-represented in these totals and that therefore both sides suffered casualties in roughly equal measure, the same is emphatically not true of damage to property, the brunt of which was borne by Catholics. Three-fifths of the houses in Bombay Street, which was almost exclusively occupied by Catholics, were destroyed* by fire. Houses were also damaged--many so seriously that they had to be demolished —in Cupar Street, Kane Street, Kashmir Road and Clonard Gardens. This property was overwhelmingly Catholic. Apart from one block in Cupar Street where the houses required minor repairs, hardly any Protestant homes were damaged. The Tribunal finds that almost all the burnings in the Clonard area were caused by Protestants.

Three important questions

25.48 Three questions arise:

(1) Was the Protestant attack planned?

(2) Why did the police not intervene?

(3) Why did trouble continue after the intervention of the Army?

(1) Was the Protestant attack planned?

25.49 The Protestants began the fighting and were responsible for most of the destruction. It is likely that they were retaliating against what they believed was Catholic aggression in neighbouring areas on the previous two nights. Fr McLaughlin thought the first attack was planned rather than spontaneous since it took place in the afternoon when there would be few men in the area. He also thought that the setting up of barricades, the use of sticks and bin lids, as well as the fact that Catholics were being forced to leave their homes on Friday morning, suggested an organised operation. He told the Tribunal that the general impression in the area was that workers in Mackie's factory in Springfield Road had been let out early and had been responsible for the trouble.

25.50 In a letter to the Tribunal prompted by a newspaper report of Fr McLaughlin's evidence, the heads of Mackie's various departments and shops took issue with the implication in the report that the firm's employees had been let out early on Friday, 15 August, in order to take part in an attack. This letter stated that "In the afternoon of 15 August 1969, the management of the Company, after considering the seriousness of the situation in the area and the fact that public transport had been withdrawn, and in the interest of the safety of their employees, so that they might reach their homes not later than their usual time of arrival, issued a message to all heads of departments that all employees would be free to leave as soon as they received their wages and all essential duties had been completed. Employees left, department by department, as they were paid, between the hours of 3 15 pm and 4 15 pm."

While it seems clear that there was nothing sinister in the early departure of Mackie's employees it is apparent from the evidence of Mr Hugh Johnston* that he and his fellow workers did take part in the fighting in Cupar Street in the afternoon of 15 August. The Kashmir Road/Bombay Street area which was at the centre of the conflict lies directly between Mackie's factory in Springfield Road and the residential Shankill area where many of Mackie's workers live.

25.51 There is no evidence of any military-style planning behind the Protestant mobs. The explanation that fits the facts and the mood of the Shankill on the night of the 15th is one of communal anger against what they believed to have been a Catholic assault on them and the established order of the province.

(2) Why did the police not intervene?

25.52 No police reached the area until after 9 30 pm: and then only a token force under DI Cushley. It is not surprising that many Catholics felt that they had been deserted by the police on 15 August. The various requests for help made both personally and by telephone by priests and others (Protestant as well as Catholic) have already been described. Entries in the police log from 3 34 pm onwards show that the police were aware of disturbances in the Clonard area.

25.53 The explanation for the failure of the police to respond to the calls for help was that in their judgment their numbers were not sufficient to enable a force to be sent to the area. DI Lagan, who was in charge of "B" district which includes Clonard, first learned of the calls for help from the Monastery when he returned to Hastings Street RUC station at 6 pm. His informant was HC Rooney who also told him that there had not been sufficient men available in the area.

25.54 The absence of policemen available to do duty on the streets was a feature of the Belfast scene on the afternoon of Friday, 15 August: it was equally noticeable in the disturbances in Percy Street and Ardoyne the same afternoon. The reasons are discussed elsewhere.† Briefly, it appears that the police were exhausted after a sustained period of duty while many had been injured on the previous nights. But there was also their concern for the safety of their stations which led them to concentrate what strength they had on the defence of police stations against the possibility of an IRA attack which they believed was threatened. It seems also that they may have been taken by surprise: they did not expect trouble to break out during the day and so men were stood down until the evening.

*Mr Johnston was armed with an iron bar; it is unlikely he was the only one so armed (see 25.24.)

25.55 Mr Lagan was asked in cross-examination why when, on his return to duty at 6 pm, he learned of calls for help from Clonard he did not notify the military commander. His reply was that, in the light of his knowledge of the fact that the military were being deployed in Falls Road and not in Cupar Street, he assumed that the Clonard area was a police responsibility. Nevertheless it was not until 9 30 pm that he arranged to send DI Cushley there.

(3) Why did trouble continue after the intervention of the Army?

25.56 Fr McLaughlin told the Tribunal that Clonard residents were frustrated at the apparent inability of the military to bring the situation under control although he himself accepted that their intervention saved the whole area from devastation.

25.57 Records of gunshot injuries in the area indicate that some were sustained after the army's arrival although very little direct evidence of this was heard. Of greater significance to the Clonard residents was the fact that the military, equipped with firearms and CS gas, were unable to prevent the near total destruction of Bombay Street and severe damage to other Catholic property.

25.58 It may be said, first, that there is evidence which the Tribunal accepts that many fires in and round Bombay Street were started before the army's intervention. Reference has already been made to the evidence of Col Napier that when he first went to the Monastery at 8 pm "areas of Bombay Street were ablaze" and other fires were burning. Later in the evening Lt Adams in command of the first body of soldiers to enter Bombay Street was "horrified" to see houses burning on both sides of the street. Fr Egan put the number of houses on fire before the military arrived at "at least 10". There were no fires in Clonard Gardens, Kashmir Road and—he was not sure of this—the south side of Bombay Street.

25.59 Secondly, it was suggested by the army witnesses that much of the damage caused after their arrival was due to the spreading of fires which had been started earlier on. This may be true to an extent but there is no doubt that petrol bombs were being thrown at houses while the army were on the ground. Mr Adams thought that these petrol bombs did not start many major fires in Bombay Street while he was there. Fr Egan pointed out that the three houses which were burned at the Cupar Street end of Clonard Gardens were not on fire when the army came into Bombay Street. Mr Adams' evidence supported this.

25.60 The possibility of fires spreading from one building to another in Bombay Street does seem a real one since, according to Lt Adams, there was a very strong wind as well as little effective fire fighting. It is true that there was an abandoned fire-appliance in the vicinity but Mr Adams' evidence suggested that it was not brought into use against houses in Bombay Street until later in the evening after the fires had got a hold—and then manned by civilians. A fire-appliance operated by fire officers did not come into action until well after midnight.

25.61 The simple reason why the army was not able to restore order in Bombay Street until late in the evening was the inadequacy of the number of troops available. Col Napier did not feel that he could spare more men in this area without weakening his position in the Falls Road. He was however under the impression that this, his initial area of deployment, constituted the border between the two factions. But this as we have seen was quite incorrect: the Falls Road between Cupar Street and Springfield Road is flanked on both sides by Catholic territory. With hindsight it is easy to see that if a substantial number of Col Napier's men had been deployed initially along the Orange-Green line in Cupar Street peace might have been restored much earlier in the evening.

CHAPTER 26—ARDOYNE AND CRUMLIN ROAD: 15 AUGUST

26.1 After the rioting, shootings and burnings which had taken place the previous night, the residents on both sides of the Crumlin Road were in a state of panic. People were talking about how many were injured and who was dead. Some were boarding up their houses and others were moving out. Their fears were justified. Unknown to them the police, plagued by fatigue, casualties and rumour, had by the morning of 15 August abandoned the effort to maintain or re-establish law and order in the area of the Crumlin Road. In the course of the day DI Montgomery reported that it was essential that the army should assume responsibility for policing the Ardoyne; he had already made up his mind that no police should go on duty in the area unless they had the protection of armoured vehicles. By the morning, if not earlier, police action had been reduced to the patrol of the Crumlin Road with the limited objective of containing an armed uprising. Police officers were thinking of the situation in terms of rebellion: and the rebels, in their view, were to be found (and, if possible, held) in the Ardoyne. This view also determined army tactics when at long last on the evening of the 16th three companies of the 3 Battalion Light Infantry took over the Crumlin Road, approaching through the "friendly" streets lying between it and the Shankill.

Preparations—the two communities

26.2 During the morning and early afternoon barricades were erected in Disraeli Street, Herbert Street and Butler Street*. Some residents were evacuated from the north side of the Crumlin Road, especially women and children. One witness, Miss McGrath, saw children making petrol bombs in an entry off Rosebank Street.

26.3 In the afternoon a number of Protestant clergymen held a meeting at St Mary's Church in the Crumlin Road at which it was decided to request that the army be sent into the area. This message was communicated to Mr Greeves, Permanent Secretary to the Ministry of Home Affairs, by Rev Sansom. According to Mr Sansom he was told by Mr Greeves that the army was being sent in and this reply was passed on to the residents of Disraeli Street. Whether or not there was a misunderstanding, Mr Sansom no doubt spread the news around his parish: so did other clergymen, and we have no doubt that its immediate effect was to quieten the Protestant community. When, however, it proved false, the counter-reaction was serious. The "failure" of the army to arrive combined with the inadequate presence of the police and the hostile activities of the Catholic community provided the opportunity and the incentive for the burning of the houses in Brookfield Street, and the destruction of the Catholic owned public-houses.

26.4 Also in the course of the afternoon, at about 4 45 pm, a number of Catholic residents from the Ardoyne area met and agreed to post lookouts to give warnings of any attack. Two men armed with shotguns were deputed to move about the district and fire shots down the various streets to give the impression that there were many more weapons, including machine guns, in use. This evidence was given by Mr Toal. Another witness, Mr O'Reilly, told of a meeting at about 4 30 or 5 pm held at Herbert Street/Butler Street at which it was decided to get together 12 men to attempt to obtain firearms. Mr McCorry's evidence corroborates this, though he puts the meeting a few hours later.

26.5 It is not clear how many weapons were in the hands of and used by the Catholic population. Mr Toal said that he saw only 2 shotguns. Mr McMullen and Mr O'Reilly saw 2 shotguns and a defective rifle. Father Gillespie who seems to have moved round the area more than most also saw two shotguns and a ·303 which would not work. While it is not possible to make a precise finding, the Tribunal does not doubt that more weapons were available on this night than these witnesses describe, and that they included at least one automatic.

The police withdrawal

26.6 Before he left the Crumlin Road on the morning of the 15th, DI Montgomery arranged for an armoured vehicle to be stationed in the Hooker Street/Disraeli Street area for the rest of the day. The only force of police available for the afternoon was a Reserve Force Platoon of about 30 men plus the crew of one landrover. These men were to come on duty at 3 pm. At 6 pm a section of the local force was due to come on duty. Men from the local force had been working long hours over the previous two days and this, coupled with police injuries, meant that only about 40-45 men would be available from 6 pm onwards. Of these only about 35 could be sent out on to the streets.

26.7 In the early hours of the morning of 15 August, DI Montgomery decided that no foot police should be sent into the Disraeli Street/Hooker Street area because of the amount of shooting which had taken place the previous night. He also felt that it would not be safe to use "soft-skinned" (ie non-armoured) vehicles such as landrovers for the same reason.

26.8 At about 2 30 pm the armoured vehicle which had been on duty in Crumlin Road since 9 am was ordered to the Falls Road by the Commissioner, Mr Wolseley. In a telephone conversation with Mr Wolseley, DI Montgomery urged that the vehicle should be kept in the Crumlin Road but the Commissioner insisted that there was greater need for it elsewhere. It was not until 6 pm that another armoured vehicle, under the command of HC D B Wallace, was made available for the [illegible] Road area. Mr Montgomery was also told by the Commissioner that a [illegible]certed attack on police stations throughout the city was expected and that he, Mr Montgomery, should be ready for such an attack in his district. Mr Montgomery's own view was that there was a "very real threat" of an insurrection. When the Reserve Force platoon of about 30 men came on duty at 3 pm they were sent to the Millfield/Divis Street area.

26.9 Thus for a period of well over two hours, up until 6 pm on the afternoon of Friday, 15 August, there were no police officers or vehicles in the Ardoyne/Crumlin Road area. It was during this period that fighting between Protestant and Catholic civilians broke out across the Crumlin Road and resulted in a number of civilians from both communities sustaining gunshot injuries which in one case proved fatal.

The afternoon riot

26.10 Some time in the late afternoon word got round among the Catholic residents that people on the Falls Road had hi-jacked Belfast Corporation buses for use as barricades. Despite the suggestion by Fr Gillespie that it would be preferable to remove buses from the Ardoyne depot rather than seize those which were in use, this latter course was adopted and a bus coming up the Crumlin Road from the City direction was commandeered between Bray Street and Chief Street by 3 men from the north side of the road.* The Tribunal was told by a number of witnesses that this incident was the first disturbance of any kind in the Crumlin Road during the afternoon.

26.11 According to Fr Gillespie, possession of the bus was taken without any violence and the driver, conductor and passengers left peacefully. The bus was driven via Butler Street and Chatham Street to Hooker Street where the tyres were deflated. Fr Delaney appears also to have witnessed this incident but he described the bus being stopped by a crowd of people spread across the road.

26.12 Even if the hi-jacking which Fr Gillespie described was peaceful, there seems to have been a second such incident which sparked off fighting between those who were attempting to take over the bus and others who were trying to stop them. Miss McGrath gave evidence that at about 4 30 she heard a commotion and saw 3 men trying to pull the driver from a bus which had come up the Crumlin Road and stopped at Disraeli Street. This seems to be another bus from that already referred to since there were no passengers on it. In fact this second bus was probably that of which Mr F C Hill was conductor. Mr Hill was on a bus travelling up the Crumlin Road when, at about the Tennent Street junction, he saw in front of him near Chief Street, a bus which he thought a crowd was attempting to overturn. (This could well have been the bus incident which Fr Gillespie described.) Mr Hill let all the passengers off his bus but instead of turning the bus round the driver drove on up the road and when he reached Disraeli Street a crowd attacked the driver and tried to pull him from his cab. Apparently, however, the driver succeeded in getting away with the vehicle which he drove on up the Crumlin Road and back to the City centre. Up to this point Mr Hill's story fits in with Miss McGrath's account. She saw 2 or 3 men come out of Disraeli Street and attempt to prevent the bus from being taken. Once the bus had moved off the two factions began to fight amongst themselves and one of the men from Disraeli Street threw a petrol bomb.

26.13 The events which followed must remain obscure owing to the confusion of the evidence. But it is clear that a shotgun battle developed. One witness described two men entering Hooker Street from Disraeli Street and opening fire on the people in the street. According to the same witness, these two armed intruders were themselves hit by a return of fire from Chatham Street. Certainly there were gunshot casualties among the Catholics, as it is known Fr Delaney took two victims to hospital.

26.14 It may well be that yet another two men emerged from Palmer Street and also fired into Hooker Street, as described by another witness: but equally it is possible that this is no more than another account of the incident just described.

26.15 Whatever the course of events, the exchange of shots ultimately led to one man being killed, and another blinded.

26.16 Mr N Irvine, a resident of Palmer Street, gave evidence that at about 5 30 pm two dozen men threw stones and bottles into Palmer Street. Residents of the street, among whom was Mr David Linton who lived at No 37, left their homes and threw missiles back. A small barricade which had been built in Palmer Street was then moved up to the mouth of the street and according to Mr Irvine, while he and Mr Linton were at the Crumlin Road/Palmer Street junction, Mr Linton was hit by a blast from a shotgun. He received multiple shotgun pellet wounds in the head and neck, some of which caused internal bleeding which led to death 10 hours later. The autopsy report states that: "The scatter of the pellet wounds and the degree of penetration suggests that the gun was discharged at a range of perhaps 20-30 yards. The character of some of the skin wounds indicates that if Mr Linton was upright when the gun was fired, then the shot must have come from almost directly in front of him in trajectory roughly parallel with the ground".

26.17 As well as Mr N Irvine, a number of other Protestant witnesses described the events of Friday afternoon as commencing with attacks from the north side of the Crumlin Road into Disraeli Street and the neighbouring streets on the south side. Mr Lannigan and Mr Elwood gave evidence that between 4 30 and 5 pm about 12 men on the Crumlin Road began to throw empty bottles into Disraeli Street where children were playing. They were gradually forced back by a crowd which rapidly formed in Disraeli Street. A mob then came over from Brookfield Street and there was a further exchange of missiles. This, in substance, is Mr Lannigan's evidence, and a significant feature may be that he describes these events as preceding the commandeering of what was probably the first bus. But in our view it is probable that the riot began with the hi-jacking of the buses.

26.18 In addition, Palmer Street and Disraeli Street, fighting also spread to Bray Street where Mr A E Irvine and Mr H Megarry described seeing men with shotguns and others who threw petrol bombs into No 1 Bray Street. Mr Megarry and Mr Irvine entered No 1 Bray Street to extinguish the fire which had started. Having done this Mr Irvine emerged followed by Mr Megarry. As Mr Megarry came on to the footpath he was shot at by a man with a shotgun with the result that he was blinded in both eyes. Both Mr Irvine and Mr Megarry deny being in possession of firearms although 12 rounds of 12-bore shotgun ammunition were found in the pockets of Mr Megarry's trousers when he was later admitted to hospital. By whatever means Mr Megarry acquired these cartridges (his own explanation was not convincing), it is clear that he retained them in the belief that they might come in useful.

26.19 During all these shooting incidents which took place in the Ardoyne/Crumlin Road area between about 4 45 and 5 45 pm no police were present. When at 6 pm the local police force of about 34 men reported for duty, they were retained as a reserve in the station in case of an attack on police stations in the Falls Road or a fresh outbreak of violence in the Tennent Street area.

The return of the police

26.20 When DI Montgomery heard that trouble had broken out he rang the Commissioner's office and requested an armoured vehicle. This request was granted and at about 6 pm a Humber armoured vehicle under the command of HC Wallace was sent to investigate reports that armed men had removed buses from Ardoyne Depot. On his arrival there, Mr Wallace found that the gates had been forced open and that about 20 buses had their engines running. The depot was deserted. Mr Wallace decided to immobilise the front and rear bus in each parked line by discharging rifle bullets into the tyres. These shots were heard in Hooker Street by Fr Gillespie.*

26.21 Between 6 and 6 30 pm, HC Kyle came on duty at Tennent Street from where he led a party of 3 Land Rovers (each containing a sergeant, driver and four constables) to the Crumlin Road near Tennent Street to investigate a complaint that a man was stealing petrol from a petrol station. After this Mr Kyle received a report that there was a sniper on the roof of Ewart's Mill which is in the area bounded by Flax Street, Crumlin Road and Ewart's Place. Some policemen climbed on to the roof of the mill while others remained on the ground. No one was found.†

26.22 While this search was being carried out, HC Kyle was joined at Ewart's Mill by HC Wallace's armoured vehicle which travelled there from Ardoyne bus depot via the Crumlin Road. From a position to the rear of the mill in Antigua Street, HC Wallace saw a figure on a roof, from whose direction

*Subsequent inquiries revealed that during the August riots in the City 54 buses normally based at Ardoyne depot had been taken without authority, either from the depot itself or hi-jacked elsewhere in the City.

†It will be noted that this police expedition travelled in "soft-skinned" vehicles, contrary to the decision of Mr Montgomery that only armoured vehicles should enter the Crumlin Road area. But HC Kyle's party does not appear to have travelled further up the Crumlin Road than Flax Street, some distance short of Disraeli Street/Hooker Street.

3 shots, some of them tracer, were fired at his vehicle. It transpired that the roof on which HC Wallace saw this figure was not that of Ewart's Mill but of the neighbouring Brookfield Mill. (This probably explains why HC Kyle's search proved fruitless.) Fire was returned towards the figure on the roof both from HC Wallace's vehicle (from a self-loading rifle) and from the Browning gun of a Shorland under Sgt Johnston which had joined HC Wallace's Humber at Antigua Street.

26.23 Having left Antigua Street, the 2 armoured vehicles drove out on to the Crumlin Road with the intention of investigating complaints that there had been shooting in Glencairn Estate which is to the west of Woodvale Road. When Sgt Johnston's vehicle arrived in the area of Glencairn Road he was met by a crowd of people who complained that they were being shot at from the Crumlin Road. An architect, Mr Mills, who gave evidence to the Tribunal as an expert witness, testified that a line of fire from Sgt Johnston's original position in Antigua Street and passing over the roof of Brookfield Mill would pass through the area where Sgt Johnston learned that bullets had landed. It is possible therefore that when Sgt Johnston went to the Glencairn Estate he was investigating the destination of his own fire from Antigua Street: but a finding as to the origin of this shooting cannot be made. Some spent bullets were collected in this area and subjected to ballistic examination. It appears that none was ·30 Browning ammunition or 7·62 British Military SLR ammunition.

26.24 Before this, however, another shooting incident took place as the armoured vehicles of Sgt Johnston and HC Wallace were passing the mouth of Hooker Street on their way up Crumlin Road. According to Sgt Johnston, as Mr Wallace's vehicle was passing Hooker Street, a number of shots were fired at it and this fire was returned by the Head Constable.

26.25 Between 8 30 and 9 pm Mr F M Foster was returning to his home in Brookfield Street. He turned into the street from the Crumlin Road and was crossing a barricade which consisted of 2 buses flanked on either side by piles of flagstones, when he heard gunfire coming from the direction of Brookfield Mill. He fell to the ground and then heard firing coming from a Shorland armoured vehicle at the mouth of Brookfield Street. Shots struck the buses, flagstones and the fronts of houses. Mr Foster was hit as this stage, though his wound was not serious.

26.26 Mr Y, a police officer who was acting as gunner in a Shorland vehicle on duty in Crumlin Road on 15 August, gave evidence that on two occasions he fired the Browning gun mounted on the vehicle into Brookfield Street. On the first occasion at about 7 or 8 o'clock Mr Y described how his vehicle was coasting down Crumlin Road out of gear past the mouth of Brookfield Street when it was fired upon. On the orders of the commander of the vehicle Mr Y fired several bursts at puffs of smoke at the side of one of the two buses which blocked the street. This was probably the incident to which Mr Foster referred, since the second occasion when Mr Y fired was later on, after dark. This time his platoon commander in another vehicle had come under fire and Mr Y's Shorland had gone to assistance. Again he was fired on from Brookfield Street and on his vehicle commander's instructions he fired several bursts into the buses at about 3 feet above ground level. Mr Y's evidence was that he discharged a total of 45 rounds into Brookfield Street. A ballistics expert, Mr Price, found bullet damage to the front of 6 houses in Brookfield Street. This suggested automatic fire from a point on the Crumlin Road. The shooting from Mr Y's vehicle seems the likeliest explanation of this damage.

26.27 Later in the evening at around 11 pm the two vehicles of HC Wallace and Sgt Johnston, having summoned the fire brigade to 2 public houses which were burning at the Agnes Street/Crumlin Road Junction, proceeded to Hooker Street from where it had been reported that there was firing into Disraeli Street. As Sgt Johnston's Shorland, which was leading the other vehicle, turned right out of Disraeli Street into the Crumlin Road, automatic fire was directed at it from behind the bus barricade in Hooker Street. In reply Sgt Johnston's gunner discharged about 4 or 5 bursts into Hooker Street from the Browning gun mounted on the Shorland. About 100 shots were fired.

26.28 When the firing ceased HC Wallace brought his vehicle up to the mouth of Disraeli Street and was in the course of turning to his right to follow Sgt Johnston when his vehicle was subjected to automatic fire from behind the buses. One bullet, which appears to have entered an aperture on the left-hand side of the Humber vehicle, struck HC Wallace's ear and passed out through the windscreen. It was later discovered that the aerial wire to the vehicle's radio had been partially severed. Fire was returned into Hooker Street by the Humber. The incident took place some time between 11 and 11 20 pm.

26.29 The injury to Mr Wallace's ear is the only one to a police officer which can be attributed with certainty to gunfire in the Crumlin Road area over the period 13/16 August.

26.30 The 2 vehicles continued to patrol the area for the remainder of the evening and they were joined by other armoured vehicles. At about midnight an explosive device was set off in the vicinity of HC Wallace's vehicle which was travelling down Flax Street. The loudness of the explosion suggested to Mr Wallace that gelignite or a hand grenade had been used. Two shots were fired into the air from the police vehicle to cover its departure from the area.

26.31 It is difficult to make coherent sense of the evidence concerning the desultory, but none the less frightening, shooting battle that developed with the return of the police in their armoured vehicles. There must have been a sniper on the roof of the Brookfield Mill at one time—though whom he thought he was assisting or attacking remains a mystery. Pot shots were taken by Catholic gunmen at police vehicles, which responded with a fire much heavier than they got. The police no longer felt inhibited about using the heavy Browning machine gun fitted on the Shorlands. From Sgt Johnston's vehicle in Antigua Street, and from Shorlands in the Crumlin Road there was Browning fire. It would not be right to condemn the police in their vehicles for opening fire when they were fired upon: but the Tribunal has no doubt that these incidents provide an illustration of the unsuitability of the Browning for riot control. It was a merciful chance that there were no fatal casualties from Browning fire this evening in the Ardoyne. The expert ballistic evidence of bullet damage to the Brookfield Street houses illustrates the menace of the weapon.

The burning of Brookfield Street

26.32 In the early hours of the morning of Saturday, 16th, about 20 houses on the west side of Brookfield Street, extending from the Crumlin Road junction down to the bus barricade, were burned out. The occupants of these houses were Catholics; they had, however, already left because of the riots. Mr McMullen, a Catholic resident, gave evidence that before these houses were burned they were looted by civilians who appeared to come from Rosebank Street. Doors and windows were broken down and material was carried across the Crumlin Road. The houses were then set on fire. Mr McMullen said that at the time that civilians were crossing to and from Brookfield Street there was an armoured vehicle parked at Herbert Street.

26.33 Mr Lannigan was at Brookfield Street at the time when the houses were burned. He said there was a smell of gas and the houses "just sort of blew up", "they did not go on fire". Mr Lannigan also suggested that Protestants had set fire to the houses because a sniper was present in the end house in Brookfield Street.

26.34 No police evidence of the burning of Brookfield Street was available. Yet it is inconceivable that so large a conflagration could have arisen unseen by the police, unless they had conceded the day to chaos and withdrawn. If, as the Tribunal thinks is likely, there was a police vehicle parked near Herbert Street, its occupants could not have failed to observe the fire. But it would be wrong to conclude that the police encouraged or condoned this arson. The truth is that they felt themselves no longer able to exercise any effective control, and were concentrating on their limited objective of containing the Ardoyne trouble-makers north of the Crumlin Road.

26.35 The Tribunal has no doubt about responsibility for the burning: the Protestants did it. Their opportunity was the lack of effective policing: their motives a compound of anger and fear sparked off by a rumour, which may or may not have been true, that there was a sniper in action at the end of the street.

Alleged shooting from Ardoyne Monastery belfry

26.36 Mr and Mrs Jackson, Protestant residents of 9 Woodvale Drive, gave evidence of seeing shooting from Ardoyne monastery belfry, a four-sided tower at the western end of the monastery building overlooking Woodvale Road. At about 10 30 pm on 15 August Mrs Jackson who was in her home heard shooting. She went upstairs to a first-floor window from where she could hear shooting and see red and blue flashes coming from the belfry. She told her husband what she had seen and he left the house and went to a point on the footpath at the junction between Twaddell Avenue and Woodvale Road where about 50 other people were standing. From here he heard shots and saw blue and red flashes from the belfry. He thought the shooting was in the direction of Chief Street. Mrs Jackson joined her husband and she too saw shooting. Mr Jackson then moved to an alleyway between Nos 164 and 165 which gave him a clear view of the belfry tower from which he again saw shooting. Mr Jackson thought the firing went on until midnight.

26.37 After the evidence of Mr and Mrs Jackson had been heard the Tribunal received seventeen statements from members of the religious community resident in the monastery, whose sleeping quarters were in the vicinity of the belfry. The signatories of these statements denied hearing any shooting from the belfry over the period 13–15 August 1969. At the request of the Tribunal, Mr G Gibson and Dr Martin visited the monastery and belfry. Having first verified that the belfry was visible from each of the points from where the Jacksons claimed to have observed firing, Mr Gibson gave evidence that access to the belfry was by means of a small trap-door in the ceiling of an upper corridor near to the monastery sleeping quarters. A pair of steps was needed to gain entry through the trap-door which led to a water tank on top of which was a second trap-door leading to the belfry itself. In Mr Gibson's opinion it would also have been feasible to enter the bell tower without entering the monastery building using an external fire escape. This would require a certain amount of determination, skill and agility. The effect of Mr Gibson's evidence was that while the bell tower was accessible from within the building and (with greater difficulty) from outside it was highly unlikely that the tower could have been entered and shots could have been fired from it without the knowledge of the monastery residents.

26.38 Fr O'Donnell testified that between 11 pm and 12 pm on 15 August he was in the precincts of the church and monastery and that there was no firing.

26.39 It is not possible to identify what the Jacksons saw. Many flashes were illuminating the night sky and many noises disturbing the peace during the period of their sightings: and it would need a skilled observer in their circumstances to assess with any accuracy what he saw or heard; and he could well make a mistake. The Jacksons were not skilled observers but surprised and anxious householders. The Tribunal finds as a fact that there was no firing from the monastery.

26.40 In the course of his cross-examination Dr Paisley alleged that he had seen a police statement claiming that Ardoyne Church had been used as an arsenal and that the priests were handing out bullets. Dr Paisley said that this statement had been shown to him by Sgt Harry Taylor of the Special Branch. In a statement to the Tribunal Sgt (now Det Inspector) Taylor emphatically denied having given any such information to Dr Paisley. The Tribunal is perfectly satisfied that the church was not used as an arsenal and that the priests did not hand out bullets.

The destruction of the public houses

26.41 During the night of 15/16 August, a number of public houses were set on fire and looted. Earlier on in the month of August (from the 4th) a static guard had been mounted by the USC on Catholic owned licensed premises which had been threatened*. This arrangement was continued up to and including the night of 14/15 August. On 15 August the USC guard was withdrawn when DI Montgomery decided that the limited manpower at his disposal would be better deployed in protecting Tennent Street RUC station and as a reserve in case trouble broke out elsewhere.

26.42 On the evening of 15 August, therefore, the only protection afforded to licensed premises, the majority of which were owned by Catholics, was a mobile patrol of four land rovers operating in pairs under HC Kyle. Mr Kyle visited a number of public houses which had been set on fire, but he was unable to prevent any of them from being destroyed. From the fact that many of them were burned at about the same time, he assumed that the firing and looting of public houses was in some way planned or organised. All the premises which HC Kyle visited were Catholic owned.

26.43 The Tribunal does not doubt that Protestants were responsible for these attacks. The withdrawal of the police gave groups or gangs of angry or criminal Protestants an opportunity which they took. It was sufficient that a licensee should be a Catholic for his premises to be burned.

The role of Mr McKeague

26.44 According to his own evidence, Mr McKeague appears to have been in the Crumlin Road area on both Thursday, 14 August and Friday, 15 August. Since he seems to have confused events of the two days it is not possible to establish with any precision what his role was. Nevertheless it is clear that he saw himself as one who could rally and organise some, at least, of the Protestant people. His organisation, the Shankill Defence Association, included among its members some from this area—including 3 young men who feature in the events that took place and gave evidence, ie Mr Elwood, Mr Lannigan and Mr Megarry. Mr McKeague's presence on 14 August has already been noted, but at some stage in the evening he left for Percy Street. On the 15th he claimed to have helped with defensive preparations including sandbag emplacements on each side of Disraeli Street, with men armed with shotguns behind them.

26.45 The Tribunal has not found it possible to assess the degree of his participation in Protestant activity on or near the Crumlin Road or the extent to which he really did assume any leadership: but he certainly contributed to Protestant unrest before and during the riots and helped to organise a warlike defensive posture in the Disraeli Street area.

Casualties

26.46 Records of injuries sustained in the Ardoyne/Crumlin Road area on the night of 15/16 August show that 26 civilians suffered gunshot injuries which in one case, that of Mr David Linton, proved fatal. In marked contrast with the previous night only two casualties were injured by bullets, the vast majority of the remainder (21) being caused by shotgun pellets. Fifteen of those injured (including the two who sustained bullet wounds) were Catholics and the remaining eleven were Protestants. These figures are based largely on hospital reports submitted to the Tribunal and they are almost certainly not complete.*

26.47 The casualty reports reveal that it is not possible definitely to attribute any bullet injury to civilian fire, save the injury to HC Wallace's ear. Light weapons such as shotguns appear to have been the firearms of the crowds. Yet there is evidence of automatic fire from the Ardoyne on the night of the 15th which the Tribunal accepts. The explanation must be that such weapons were few. It should also be borne in mind that, once the foot police were withdrawn, the police were well protected and the streets for the most part deserted save in the immediate area of the riot.

CHAPTER 27—ARDOYNE AND CRUMLIN ROAD: 16 AUGUST

27.1 By the standards set by the three previous days, Saturday, 16 August, was a peaceful day in the Ardoyne: the observant Miss McGrath commented that there was not the same tense atmosphere. But it was the quiet of exhaustion. The basic situation was unchanged, i.e. no effective policing, but anger, bitterness and fear on each side of the Crumlin Road.

27.2 Shortly after midnight on Friday 15, Mr V Simpson MP (NI) had made in his turn an urgent request for troops. In the afternoon of the 16th, he, with Fr O'Donnell, the Rector of Holy Cross Church, Ardoyne, went to the Cabinet Offices and repeated the request. Thus by Saturday the clergy of all denominations, the local MP, and the police had declared to higher authority their belief that only the army could restore order. We have no doubt that, had the Army arrived on the Friday, the rioting would have stopped then and the destruction of the houses in Brookfield Street would never have occurred. Mr Linton might be alive today, and Mr Megarry able to see.

27.3 In the absence of troops on the Saturday, Mr Montgomery again only allowed police to go on duty if they had the protection of armoured vehicles. At 12 30 pm, an armoured car, under Sgt Slevin, went on duty in the Crumlin Road. This vehicle, accompanied by another, gave protection to fire appliances which were attending fires in the area. At about 4 pm what a police constable took to be a sniper's bullet, passed over the roof of the armoured vehicle which was parked in the Crumlin Road near the Hooker Street junction, and struck a window on the south side of the main road.

27.4 During the day rumours were rife about snipers stationed on high buildings in and around Ardoyne. A deputation of local businessmen who were worried about this and about threats to their factories and property called on DI Montgomery.

*Some further material about casualities is set out in the chapter on Social Cost (31.3).

27.5 The atmosphere of the day emerges well from the DI's account of this meeting, which we quote:—

> "About 2 o'clock on Saturday afternoon, that is the following day, I was meeting a deputation of industrialists in my area. . . That particular morning I had armoured vehicles operating in the area. The plastics factory in Havana Street had been burnt down, a fire had been started in the Doagh Spinning Company, it was necessary for police to give protection to the fire service to fight the fires . . . There were a number of rumours and stories that there were snipers on the high buildings in the area, and in the presence of the deputation I called in the Sergeant in charge of one of the vehicles and gave him explicit instructions in the presence of these gentlemen that they were to take up position on the roof of Doagh Flax Spinning Company and ensure that nothing happened to the buildings immediately around that area, that is the industrial buildings. Whilst I was speaking to them the telephone rang: it was the Commissioner to say that I could expect troops on Crumlin Road later that evening.

The DI remembered that throughout the day, until the army arrived, he could hear gunfire, while sitting in his office in Tennent Street.

The arrival of the army

27.6 At around midday the first meeting of the Joint Security Committee was held at Stormont under the chairmanship of Mr Porter, the Minister of Home Affairs. Great concern was expressed for the situation in the Ardoyne and the Committee asked the GOC, General Freeland, to provide military assistance there. Urgent steps had, in fact, already been taken to reinforce the units available to the GOC. The 3 Battalion Light Infantry had arrived overnight. It had an operational strength of 4 companies, one of which had been committed to Cupar Street immediately on arrival (1 30 am, 16 August). At 6 30 pm the remaining 3 companies entered the Crumlin Road under the command of Lt Col Ballenden, who had received his orders at about 3 pm.*

27.7 The Colonel's orders were to establish a force on the Crumlin Road and keep the Protestants and Catholics living on either side of the road apart from each other. It was decided to approach the area from the City centre via the Shankill Road, thus reaching the Crumlin Road through side streets on the south side. This was thought to be more satisfactory militarily than travelling directly up the Crumlin Road, along the border between the two factions.

27.8 The streets which connect Shankill Road to Crumlin Road were crowded with people. Many had barricades which were removed at the request of the army. At each barricade there was a store of petrol bombs. Lt Col Ballenden found the people in these streets on the south side of the Crumlin Road greatly relieved at the arrival of the army. He also noted an air of festivity: "they appeared to be slightly enjoying themselves".

*The order to move to Northern Ireland had been received by the battalion at Plymouth at 2 am on 15 August: by 2 am on the 16th one company was in action in Cupar Street, and the remaining companies were ready for action by 10 30 am—a swift piece of work by all concerned.

27.9 Once on the Crumlin Road the troops took up position from above Kerrera Street to Flax Street, Lt Col Ballenden taking care to ensure that some of his men faced one side of the street while others faced the other. Small groups of people eventually appeared on the streets to the north side of the Crumlin Road. Col Ballenden's impression, and that which he gained from his officers, was that the people on the Hooker Street side were "very, very frightened indeed". Fr O'Donnell described the "enthusiastic welcome" which the soldiers received from the Catholic residents and Fr Delaney said that "they were delighted that the army was there, and there was a general feeling of relief". Col Ballenden, however, does not seem to have found his reception quite so euphoric as the clergymen suggest. He found that at first he was not trusted by the Catholic residents and it took several days before he could convince them that the army was there to help and not to attack them.

27.10 During that evening and the following 2 or 3 days the troops found large quantities of petrol bombs behind the barricades on both sides of the streets; in the first 24 hours about 800 or 900 petrol bombs were destroyed.

27.11 Within a short time of the arrival of the army, Col Ballenden received a number of complaints that snipers were shooting in the area. One of the most persistent rumours was of a sniper on the Doagh Spinning Mill on the east side of Brookfield Street to the north of Brookfield Mill. Soldiers and police searched the Mill but found no unauthorised person on the premises. A permanent army post was set up on the roof of the Mill in order to dampen down the fears of the residents. On this occasion it was Catholic residents who complained of snipers but there were constant complaints that people on both sides of the road were being shot at. No sniper was ever found nor was there any trace of one having been present.

27.12 On Sunday, 17th, a mass meeting of Ardoyne residents was held in a local school. Fr Gillespie gave evidence that, in consequence of the events of the previous few days, there was a demand for guns in case there should be further attacks. Father Gillespie said he "did not agree with guns and that they should not have guns, and they accused me of being a cheek-turning fool". He then walked out of the meeting. "A lot of people walked out after me and the meeting broke up". This witness also testified that some residents "raided the houses of people who were supposed to be IRA men by repute and found nothing, and after the riots they called the IRA the 'I ran away'."

27.13 Two days later, on Tuesday, 19 August, Col Ballenden and Mr Montgomery walked through the Ardoyne area together and shortly afterwards joint RUC/Army patrols were instituted.

PART IX

CHAPTER 28—BELFAST OUTSIDE THE RIOT AREAS

28.1 The disturbances in Belfast were confined to a relatively small area of the city—Crumlin Road, Lower Shankill and Unity Flats, Falls Road/Divis Street, and the "Orange–Green" line from Hastings Street to the Springfield Road. In general, Belfast, outside police divisions B and C, saw no major disturbances during July and August. The situation in each of these police divisional districts is summarised in this chapter.*

Police District A

28.2 The District consists largely of commercial and industrial property and is the business heart of the City. Included in the District is the predominantly Protestant Sandy Row area and the predominantly Catholic Markets area. Between them are some streets where the religions are mixed, and to the north of the District around Great Georges Street is another predominantly Catholic area.

28.3 Relationships before and during the disturbances were very good between the residents of Sandy Row and the Markets. Up to the end of July there was no marked difference between the state of affairs in 1969 and in previous years in the District. It remained peaceful, though Head Constable Thompson stated that he was conscious of tension in the area. During August the District was the most peaceful part of the City, and was not involved in the riots. There was no gathering of persons in the Sandy Row or Markets areas and there were no clashes between the police and civilians or between rival gangs of civilians.

28.4 Four barricades were put up on the night of 14/15 August in Sandy Row and in September barricades were erected in the Markets area: but they were voluntarily removed by the residents. There was never any attempt to create a "no go" area in the District. About 16 August businessmen in the Markets formed a peace committee and at about the same time one was formed in Sandy Row. The two committees collaborated well and worked together to maintain peace.

28.5 Police relationships with the people of the Markets area were good, and remained so throughout the troubled period. During the period of 13 to 16 August only about a dozen policemen were available for patrolling at any one time since members of the District were in Londonderry and other areas of Belfast. There was no loss of life or personal injury.

28.6 Damage to the property in the area was not severe. In April a Post Office in Cromac Street suffered a petrol bomb attack. During August there were petrol bomb attacks on the BBC, Armagh House (Government building), the Law Courts, four licensed premises, a private house, a Catholic club and the University Catholic Chaplaincy. There were also a few cases of windows being broken and an attempt to burn a car.

*Belfast police districts are set out on map at Appendix VIII (J).

Police District E

28.7 DI Shute was in charge of E district, and had been for five years. The district stretched from the River Lagan near the City Centre along the side of the shipyard and Belfast Lough and then southwards to include the suburban Knock/Bloomfield areas. The western part of the district is densely populated and contains the Catholic Short Strand area which is in the middle of a larger predominantly Protestant area. Save for this western area, the district was trouble-free during July and August.

28.8 Petrol bombs were thrown at two Post Offices in the district in April. In July windows of a public house were broken and some inflammable substance thrown into the hedge around a Catholic church. Apart from these minor incidents the district remained quiet up to the month of August.

28.9 In August, however, tension was becoming dangerously high and Catholic vigilantes appeared in the streets. On 13 August the local parish priest called to tell DI Shute of the rumour that the Catholic area was to be invaded by Protestants from the Shankill Road. DI Shute assured him this was not correct. He also told the Catholic vigilantes that the rumour was incorrect. His assurances seemed to have been accepted, but later on while patrolling Mountpottinger Road he found the area in chaos with women and children out in the streets screaming hysterically. Two men whom the DI had particularly noticed earlier talking to a group in the Catholic area, had gone round the houses rapping the doors, breaking some windows and calling "there are 400 or 500 Protestants coming down the Ravenhill Road to attack you and burn you out". There was absolutely no truth in the statement and DI Shute was convinced that the two men did it deliberately to increase tension. There was no hostility or violence shown in the area on 13 August.

28.10 On the next night, 14 August, there were several attempts by Protestants to attack the Catholic area but the police were successful in protecting the Catholic population. The crowds were not organised: they never got into the Catholic area and there were no clashes between civilians. About 9 30 pm 40 to 50 Protestant youths coming from a football match threw stones at Seaforde Street but two or three policemen on duty in the area chased them away. Half an hour later 200 to 300 Protestants attempted to march on Seaforde Street: some bottles were thrown at the police. Two police constables with their batons drawn and the DI with his blackthorn stick were sufficient to force the crowd to retreat. About 50 of the crowd broke away to get to the Catholic area by another way but this and other attempts were foiled by the police.

28.11 On 16 August a crowd marched towards the Catholic area but this was also stopped by the police. At this stage barricades were erected by the Catholics in their streets, and remained until early September: but the police were never kept out. Throughout August, they patrolled Seaforde Street, and were welcome. The local committee which controlled the Catholic vigilantes co-operated with the police, as did the mainly Protestant East Belfast Peace Committee which was composed of churchmen and other leading citizens. The Trade Unions maintained peace in the shipyard.

28.12 Damage to property was not widespread, but some Catholic licensed premises were damaged and looted. While there were rumours of shooting, there were no gunshot casualties. As the police succeeded in keeping the factions apart, there was little or no personal injury suffered: there were two assaults upon individual Protestants, but they were not serious. The police force in the area was at the barest minimum due to the demands for men from Londonderry and other areas of Belfast. The USC was used to protect licensed premises and other property from 14 August onwards but not near Catholic areas. The army entered the district on 15 August.

Police District F

28.13 The District covers the southern part of the city and is mainly residential, with a population of 100,000 to 120,000. The area contains two flash points: one at the bottom of the Protestant working-class Woodstock Road which adjoins the Catholic working-class Short Strand in E district. The other is the Protestant working-class area on the Donegall Road near the entrance to the Motorway, and facing the Catholic Falls Road. DI Hamilton was in charge of this District.

28.14 During the early part of the year there were no disturbances in the area other than a petrol bomb attack on a Post Office in April. Save for a petrol bomb attack on the house of Mr William Craig MP (NI) in July, the district remained outside the area of the civil disturbances which disfigured Belfast in July and August. Crowds did gather, but the police were able to control them. Consequently, there was no loss of life or personal injury. But there was damage to property: no public property was damaged but six Catholic houses and four Protestant houses had their windows broken. Seven business premises and a Catholic school were also damaged. A car with a Southern registration was also burnt.

28.15 Seventeen attacks took place on eleven licensed premises, all owned or staffed by Catholics: three were completely destroyed. The attacks on the licensed premises started just after midnight of the evening of 14 August with the throwing of milk bottles and ended on 17 August (except for one attack on 30 August). During July and August 20 USC members were used in patrols of two or three men to protect property which might be attacked. DI Hamilton considered that all Catholic licensed premises would have been destroyed in the area but for the work of the patrols. These patrols chased mobs, extinguished fires and saved premises.

28.16 This damage which was accompanied by looting was the work of gangs of Protestant youths. In the Woodstock Road area they numbered about 150 but on the Donegall Road the numbers were smaller. The police were very thin on the ground and were insufficient to prevent the damage or suppress the looting.

28.17 During August barricades were erected on the Donegall Road at the Motorway. Broadway and Market Street: barricades were also erected on the Woodstock Road. The barricades interfered with the flow of traffic and were ultimately removed by the police. On the Donegall Road the barricades were manned by both Catholics and Protestants working in harmony. There were no attacks either way on the Donegall Road. In the Broadway area, clergy of all denominations came together and achieved a measure of success in keeping the peace during August and September.

Police District D

28.18 The District includes Unity Flats and stretches northwards from there along the west side of Belfast Lough to the City boundary to include the Shore Road, Antrim Road and Cavehill Road areas. The area around Crumlin Road Prison is also within the division. The sensitive points in the area were Unity Flats/Peters Hill, North Queen Street/New Lodge Road, north end of Halliday's Road known locally as Tiger Bay, and York Street/North Queen Street.

28.19 During the first half of the year the district was quiet. People did gather sometimes at the prison on the Crumlin Road, for example when Dr Paisley and members of the Peoples Democracy were held there. But there were no outbreaks of violence. When the trouble occurred at Unity Flats on 12 July, there were no repercussions elsewhere in the district. When the trouble occurred at the beginning of August at Unity Flats, there was a heightening of tension in some parts of the district but there were no acts of violence.

28.20 After the disturbances of 13, 14 and 15 August 1969, the situation changed completely in the district and tension ran very high, particularly in the New Lodge Road, Duncairn Gardens and Tiger Bay areas. Barricades were built at each end of New Lodge Road and crowds gathered in the Duncairn Gardens and New Lodge Road area. The Protestants also built barricades. DI McCluney was not aware of any organisation on the Protestant or Catholic side arranging to erect barricades. The rival crowds gathered facing one another and exchanged catcalls, shouts and songs but there was no serious trouble.

28.21 Save for those associated with the disturbances at Unity Flats, there were no casualties reported in the district. Damage to property was slight other than that sustained by licensed premises in North Queen Street, which in August were ransacked and looted.

Conclusion

28.22 This chapter exposes one remarkable fact: that the Belfast riots of August 1969 did not spread from the Falls and the Ardoyne into the rest of the City. In so far as there was any sectarian activity outside the riot areas, the Protestants were those ready to provoke trouble; the Catholics were looking only to their defence. The most notable damage to property was that done to licensed premises—undoubtedly the work of Protestant hooligan gangs.

28.23 Police behaviour and tactics were exemplary. Despite their limited numbers they succeeded in maintaining the peace outside the riot areas of the city. They did their utmost to protect the lives and property of all sections of the community and succeeded except in the case of some licensed premises. They dealt firmly and efficiently with law breakers, who in this case were Protestants.

CJ 1 · 352

PART X—ARMAGH

CHAPTER 29

29.1 Armagh is a cathedral city of great antiquity, and the seat of two Archbishops. The Catholic Cathedral is approached from Cathedral Road, which is where, in the course of a riot on 14 August, a civilian, Mr John Gallagher, was shot dead. The riot and his death have been the subject of a detailed investigation by the Tribunal.

13th August

29.2 On 13 August the local Civil Rights Association organised a special demonstration in support of the Bogside. This meeting was held in the open air. A police tentler was stoned and some violence occurred, but on a small scale. Police did not attempt to stop the meeting, in spite of the Minister's ban, because they had very few men available and it was felt better to keep out of the way.

14th August

The Civil Rights meeting

29.3 At 8 30 pm on the 14th, the local Civil Rights Association held another meeting, which, unlike that of the day before, had been arranged some time earlier, and for which the City Hall had been booked. There was an attendance of some 200 or 300 people, amongst them many teenagers; they discussed the current crisis in the Province and what they could do about it. The meeting was orderly and there was general agreement at its close that all present should go home and keep off the streets. The meeting ended at approximately 10 pm—at about the same time as other people were leaving the public houses.

29.4 Between 10 and 10 30 pm, therefore, a number of people appeared on the streets in the centre of the city. In particular, a small Civil Rights or Catholic crowd gathered at the junction of Abbey Street and English Street, while a small Protestant crowd appeared on the other side of the road, where College Street enters English Street.

Police strength and attitudes

29.5 The police had foreseen the possibility of trouble, but their numbers were not great. They were under the overall command of CI Buchanon, but DI O'Hara was in tactical control on the ground. The police available for duty comprised 2 Head Constables, 7 sergeants and 47 constables. No men in the reserve force were available, as they had been sent to deal with disturbances in Lurgan. At about 10 30 pm DI O'Hara, 2 Head Constables, a sergeant and 8 constables were positioned at the GPO in English Street. One sergeant and 12 constables were at Cathedral Close (near the Church of Ireland cathedral) and 1 sergeant and 5 constables at Lonsdale Street, beside the Courthouse. There were 20 USC constables with the RUC at Cathedral Close and 20 with the RUC at Lonsdale Street. The other 20 were in reserve at the RUC station.

FS 1 - 358

29.6 County Inspector Buchanon, who was well aware of what was happening elsewhere and had been the night before in Lurgan where there had been serious rioting, believed that there was incipient civil war. He also had information that police officers at Armagh might be attacked with firearms. Although in the event there was no firing upon the police, it is necessary to an understanding of police action to remember that the police expected it.

The riot

29.7 The riot began at about 10 30 pm when a young man in Abbey Street threw a bottle at the Protestant crowd in College Street. The Catholic crowd then beat a retreat towards the Shambles, pursued by Protestants.* DI O'Hara had only 4 or 5 men available on the spot. He went to the junction of Cathedral Road and got between the Protestants and Catholics. At this stage, stones and bottles were being thrown, and the Catholic crowd fragmented, some going into Cathedral Road and others to Banbrook Hill. Initially there may have been 60 or 70 people in Cathedral Road. The police were reinforced and made a charge into Cathedral Road. By now there were about 25 RUC and 20 USC in English Street. Behind them, however, there had gathered some 200 Protestants, who faced the police with the difficult task of restraining them from breaking out into an attack upon the Catholics lower down the street.

29.8 The riot grew more threatening. The Catholics, who were concentrated for the most part near the junction of Cathedral Road and English Street, kept up a rain of stones and petrol bombs on the police and the Protestant crowd behind them. The Protestants kept up their pressure to break through the police and attack the Catholics. The USC were detailed to hold back the Protestants, who in fact never did break through or reach the area of the Shambles, which lay near Cathedral Road's junction with English Street. Meanwhile, the Catholics added to the confusion by setting on fire a car in Cathedral Road. The RUC attempted to disperse the Catholic crowds in Cathedral Road by a baton charge, but were unsuccessful.

29.9 This account of the English Street rioting is broadly accepted by Catholic civilian witnesses and the police. The principal controversy relates to the initial movement of police and Protestants down English Street. It was argued that the police showed themselves partisan, and co-operated with the Protestant crowd. However, there is no reason to doubt that a sectarian riot developed suddenly and that the police were too few in numbers to prevent it. They did in fact get between the two groups, using the USC to hold back Protestants. It was inevitable that the appearance of RUC at Cathedral Road should be open to misinterpretation, but it is clear that their intention was to prevent a sectarian clash, and certainly not to participate on the Protestant side.

29.10 By 11 pm DI O'Hara considered that the riot was well under control. However, at 11 5 HC Dickson sent the following message from DI O'Hara's car to the police station: "A lot of people in Cathedral Road are causing the real trouble. Try and get a party to move in from behind". DI O'Hara told the Tribunal that at that time the car was at the Post Office and he was at the Shambles. He was not consulted about the message and indeed would not have considered it wise to put police into the rear of the crowd, so hindering dispersion.

*A map of the Shambles area is at Appendix VIII (F).

29.11 HC Dickson, however, thought that there were adequate escape routes by the Cathedral gates, Edward Street, the Council grounds, and by a back way across to Banbrook Hill. He thought that if the rioters in Cathedral Road could be dispersed, the police could deal with the crowds in English Street and Banbrook Hill. The importance of the message is that it set going the train of events which brought the Tynan platoon of the USC to Cathedral Road. The death of John Gallagher followed.

The death of John Gallagher

29.12 When HC Dickson radioed for a police party to be moved into Cathedral Road behind the rioters, CI Buchanon was in the control room, and heard the message. He decided himself to go to Cathedral Road. As he hurried out of the station, he happened to meet a party of USC from Tynan, a small village about twelve miles from Armagh. He told them to follow him to Cathedral Road.

29.13 The Tynan party comprised 17 men commanded by SDC Murray. They had had no training in riot control: their main USC task had been border road patrols. They had been ordered to Armagh as reinforcements for the RUC, and had just arrived in four private cars. Of the 13 special constables 11 had ·303 rifles and 2 had Sterling sub-machine guns. SDC Murray and the 3 sergeants had revolvers.

29.14 The next stage in the tragedy is that the County Inspector lost the Tynan party. He travelled via Nursery Road to Cathedral Road. The four Tynan cars could not get away so easily: and when they did get away, they took a longer route.* By the time they arrived the County Inspector had left Cathedral Road for Abbey Street. He told the Tribunal it was a "cruel mischance" that this had occurred. Once he had seen the severity of the rioting, he would have been unlikely, he said, to have made use of the USC. But, in the event the Tynan party was deprived of his leadership and left to act on their own in a situation which they were not trained to handle.

29.15 After the County Inspector had gone, the Tynan party arrived in Cathedral Road, driving rapidly towards the City. As they approached the Cathedral grounds, they saw ahead a riot and a blazing car. The main trouble was near English Street, but there was also a crowd at the Parochial Hall. Rubble had been scattered across the roadway to form a rough makeshift barricade, and there was an obstacle (described by one witness as a garden seat) lying in the mouth of Edward Street. The leading car (S/Sgt McAnea's Morris) stopped suddenly at a letter box not far from the Cathedral gates. The second car (SC McWilliams' Peugeot) swerved to the right and went over the makeshift barricade into Edward Street. The third car (S/Sgt McWilliams' Triumph) swerved right to avoid the Morris and then pulled left in front of it. The fourth car (SC Bloomer's Ford) swung right and stopped on the wrong side of the road just forward of the Morris. There were some threatening movements from the crowd. It was a moment of panic. The party believed they were isolated and ambushed. Most of them jumped out of their cars and fired. A few moments later those in Edward Street fired towards Cathedral Road. No order to fire was given, and these two ragged bursts were all the USC firing that occurred at that time and place.

29.16 It is not really disputed, and the Tribunal finds, that at a time when the USC were in Cathedral Road Mr Gallagher was shot dead and two men injured. The most direct description of the death of John Gallagher was given by Mr McGleenan. His evidence was that he saw cars arrive at the Cathedral gates. He heard gunfire but did not see it, because between the Cathedral and his position beside Kearney's shop there was a crowd. He ran into the entry beside the shop, along with perhaps a dozen others. He thought 30 or 40 shots were fired. After it had stopped he looked out again and saw a man lying on the other (Shambles) side of Cathedral Road. He went over to the man, recognised him as John Gallagher, and saw that he was wounded but still living. At this stage there were 2 young men beside John Gallagher. There was another burst of what he thought was about 5 automatic shots from the direction of the Cathedral gates, and he went back into the entry. He returned a little later and found Mr Gallagher lying on his back with his head towards English Street and he did not turn him over. He was then helped over the Shambles wall and went to a house he knew in Edward Street which had a telephone. From there a message was sent to the hospital.

29.17 There was also evidence from two men who were wounded. Mr McParland was near the Cathedral gates and told the Tribunal that when the USC arrived the crowd then tried to escape by way of either the Cathedral or the Council grounds. It was not aggressive. The USC formed into a line across the road and moved forward, firing from a crouching position, with their guns on their hips. He was wounded as he ran up into the Cathedral grounds. The other evidence by a wounded man was from Mr Moore. He was in a crowd between the Parochial Hall and the Cathedral and he thought there were very few people in the road countrywards. He described a car going through a crowd into Edward Street and the formation of a USC line in Cathedral Road. Some of the USC stood and fired from their shoulder and some fired from a kneeling position. Perhaps 10/15 people, including himself, scattered into Edward Street. Then he saw that USC were firing from 30 yards up Edward Street and he ran back towards the Parochial Hall on the other side of Cathedral Road.

29.18 If the evidence of Mr McGleenan and the two wounded men be substantially correct, the USC fired from their positions in Cathedral Road and Edward Street into the crowd and must surely be responsible for the death of Mr Gallagher and the other two casualties. Since the USC strenuously deny that they fired into the crowd, it is necessary to examine the evidence.

The evidence against the USC

29.19 A great deal of evidence was adduced before the Tribunal in support of the contention that the casualties were due to USC firing. It fell into three categories:

(i) the evidence of eye-witnesses,

FS 1 · 359

(ii) expert examination of the personal injuries sustained, and of damage done to property,

(iii) evidence of the time of the shooting.

(i) The eye-witnesses

29.20 There is little dispute as to the manner of the arrival of the Tynan party, which was as described above. Conflict arises when one comes to the shooting. Two civilian witnesses were standing countrywards on Cathedral Road and could see the situation near Edward Street with some perspective. Mr Kelly, at Daires Willow, thought the crowd at the Cathedral was not dense because he could see through it towards the English Street riot. He thought the USC fired two bursts, including automatic fire. He could not see the second burst. He thought the USC were firing guns from the shoulder and were pointing towards the playing fields and towards the Cathedral side of the road. Mr Boyle also believed there were two groups of shots and that these included automatic fire. The second was directed, he thought, at men emerging from Edward Street. He thought the USC spread across the road. He did not know about the USC in Edward Street, and he did not see any move by the civilian crowd towards the playing fields entrance, nor any aggressive move by it.

29.21 There is some evidence from a Mr Mackle and a Mr McManus neither of whom however saw the USC firing. Mr Mackle thought there were three groups of shots, while Mr McManus thought there was 20 minutes to half an hour between the initial shots which he thought he heard in English Street and the arrival of the USC. Mr McManus also had a quick impression of a man getting out of the driver's seat of the front USC car in Cathedral Road carrying a rifle whose butt was at his hip and which was pointing slightly upwards.

29.22 There is some evidence from civilians in Edward Street, in particular Mrs Tennyson and Mr Cafolla. At first Mr Cafolla was standing at the junction of Edward Street and Cathedral Road. The crowd then had stones and sticks, and when the USC arrived he heard someone say "Stop them cars". He than ran to a small entry in Edward Street and saw the two back passengers get out of the car. One was stout and red-faced, the other thin. The stout man had a firearm at his hip and told Mr Cafolla to get off the street. The thin man fired a rifle towards the Parochial Hall. Mr Cafolla thought the rifle was held level at his shoulder.

29.23 Mrs Tennyson's evidence was that a man got out of the driver's seat swung round with a rifle at shoulder height and fired towards Cathedral Road. There might have been a second man who got out of the driver's side of the car. She could not say how many shots were fired by the driver. She thought that two men ran from the other side of the car towards an entrance to the Shambles and went into the Shambles yard. She believed that the firing in Edward Street was the first firing she heard that evening.

29.24 Finally there is the evidence of Mrs McKee, who told the Tribunal that she was threatened by the driver of the car, a man who was holding a long gun which he fired three or four times down Edward Street. This gun was held at waist level. She thought two other men went down the offside of the car, one of them going into the yard. However, her written statement was to the effect that she was threatened by a man with a long gun sitting behind the driver, and that men from the offside of the car walked down Edward Street, firing as they went. When this was read to the Tribunal she said she had heard shooting and merely assumed from whom it had come. The statement made no reference to the Shambles entrance, and it made no suggestion that either the driver or the man behind him fired their guns.

29.25 While it would be unwise to accept all the detail of this evidence at face value, it constitutes formidable support for the contention that members of the USC did fire deliberately into the crowd.

(ii) The expert evidence

29.26 The evidence of the two experts, Mr Beavis and Mr Price, clearly indicates that there was low level gunfire in Cathedral Road. They found six sites which were consistent with bullet damage, either in Cathedral Road or in shops facing Cathedral Road in Lower English Street. These included two sites at low level, one in a down pipe against the wall of 4A Cathedral Road, which was 33 inches from ground level, and one in a door jamb at 5 Lower English Street, 14 inches from ground level. There was minor damage to the shop at 5 Lower English Street caused by that bullet. The damage to the down pipe was not firmly identified by Mr Beavis as having been caused by a bullet. At one stage he said it was probably bullet damage, but later he said that if pressed and forced he would have to concede that it probably was not. On the other hand, Mr Price, when questioned on the same issue, said that in his considered opinion that it was bullet damage. Higher level bullet damage included a mark at the top right corner inside the porch of the Parochial Hall, a hole in a road sign in Cathedral Road at 8 feet 6 inches above street level and penetration of a roof at No. 1 Lower English Street, leading to bullet and slate particles entering a bedroom at about bed level. The expert witnesses attributed the bullet damage in all identifiable instances to bullets which had been fired from Cathedral Road. They attributed the damage in two instances, including that to the porch of the Parochial Hall, to bullets fired from the vicinity of the mouth of Edward Street.

29.27 The expert witnesses had examined a number of cartridge cases, bullet jackets, spent bullets, etc. These had come from miscellaneous sources. There was no reliable evidence linking all the objects with Cathedral Road. Ballistic examination, however, established that:

(a) One cartridge case had been fired in S/Sgt Orr's revolver.

(b) Two cartridge cases had been fired in SC Beattie's rifle.

(c) Two cartridges had been fired in SC Gray's rifle.

(d) One cartridge had been fired in SC Millar's rifle.

(e) One cartridge had been fired in SC J G Bloomer's rifle.

(f) One cartridge case had been fired in SC D W Murray's rifle.

There was also a fragment of lead removed from Gerald Moore's leg, which was considered to be entirely consistent with having come from a bullet.

29.28 The cause of John Gallagher's death was elucidated for the Tribunal by Mr Beavis and Dr Carson. Mr Gallagher was killed by a bullet which entered his back at a point not higher than 3 feet 8 inches above the ground, and exited through the front of his chest. The entrance wound was of small diameter and the bullet passed through bone and bone cartilage in two places. It caused considerable damage to the heart and did not seem to have been deflected to any extent in its course through the body. It appeared, therefore, that the wound was caused by a high velocity bullet. There were minor injuries to the mouth and chin, which suggested that he fell forwards at the time of the gunshot or soon afterwards.

29.29 On 15 August 1969 there was blood at a place on the Shambles side of Cathedral Road. The spot is marked with an X on the map. This blood was of the same group as John Gallagher's. A blood sample from the body contained 177 milligrams of alcohol and 100 millilitres of blood. A urine sample contained 212 milligrams of alcohol and 100 millilitres of blood. With this alcoholic intake it is likely that Mr Gallagher was considerably under its influence. It is possible but not certain, that he was staggering. Mr Beavis was absolutely certain that he was not killed by a revolver bullet and almost certain that he was not killed by a sub-machine gun bullet. In his opinion it was almost certain that Mr Gallagher was killed by a rifle bullet.

(iii) The time of the shooting

29.30 The time of the shooting is well established by the police log. This reports gunfire from Cathedral Road at 11 21 pm. At 11 35 it also records a query from a Mrs Gallagher about a man who had been reported shot. One minor uncertainty is how Mr Gallagher came to be found lying on his back. The Tribunal has no evidence that his body was turned over, yet the injuries to his face suggest that he must have fallen helplessly on to it. There is no doubt, however, from the evidence of Mr McGleenan and Mr Peilow (the ambulance driver) that there were one or two people near Mr Gallagher. They may have turned him over. Another minor uncertainty is the timing and origin of the call for an ambulance. The ambulance driver had no contemporary record of the time he received the call to collect Mr Gallagher. He knew that he travelled from the hospital by Dawson Street and Edward Street and said that the hospital's day ledger recorded "11 40 to Cathedral Road", a call which was, according to the record, from the RUC. There is no reference to Mr McGleenan's phone call, and it is not possible to make the time entirely precise. The police log reports, opposite an entry at 11 35, that the City Hospital says a man called Gallagher has died. But the margin of uncertainty is relatively small.

29.31 The expert evidence, in the opinion of the Tribunal, puts beyond doubt that there had been low-level gunfire, including rifle fire, in Cathedral Road. It conveys a strong indication, and the Tribunal finds as a fact, that Mr Gallagher was killed by a bullet fired from a rifle in Cathedral Road. Further, the expert evidence is consistent with that of the eye-witnesses who say that the USC party fired down Cathedral Road and across it into the crowd.

The evidence of the USC

29.32 Against this evidence has to be set that of the USC party, every member of which gave evidence. We propose only to summarise its main features and state our findings.

29.33 When the four USC cars arrived in Cathedral Road, they were expected; for Mr Vallely, who gave evidence, and possibly some others as well, had heard on the radio the police message asking for the movement into Cathedral Road. Thus, the rumour of their impending arrival had reached the crowd, which now numbered a hundred or so in the neighbourhood of the Cathedral gates and the Parochial Hall. A reception had, therefore, been hurriedly arranged—the loose barricade across the road, the garden seat in Edward Street, and some petrol bombs.

29.34 SDC Murray said his party had been ambushed. His reason for so thinking was the obstructions in the road coupled with the sudden appearance of hostile people from the direction of the Parochial Hall and the playing fields. He said he heard three shots from the Shambles direction before his car stopped and then three later. If he had had an opportunity he would have ordered a couple of men to fire warning shots in the air. The Tribunal heard admissions from individual members of the platoon that they fired 24 shots in the air from near the Cathedral entrance. Only 4 of the 17 denied that they had fired. The inference, even on Mr Murray's assessment of the situation, is that in his view the shooting was undisciplined and excessive. Mr Murray himself did not fire, and no one claimed that any order to fire was given.

29.35 S/Sgt J H McWilliams, the driver of the Triumph (the third of the four cars), said there were crowds of 60 near Edward Street and 40 near the playing fields. Just as he was stopping he heard two or three shots coming from either the Shambles area or Edward Street. When he got out of the car he fired three shots in the air. When asked his reason, he told the Tribunal "It was more instinct; we were being rushed by a crowd and it was to protect the rest of our men; to try to scatter the crowd that was coming towards us". S/Sgt McAnea, who was the driver of the Morris Oxford (the leading car though when it stopped it was overtaken by the others), said five or six shots came from behind the Shambles wall and people poured out round the Triumph and the Ford in front of him. The USC, he said, were always taught that if they were ambushed they should get a few shots off quickly and then get to cover. He therefore fired two shots directly into the air and was probably the first USC man to open fire. Nevertheless he did not think firing for effect would have been justified. He thought the USC shooting was in two bursts each of five or six shots. He felt the heat of someone firing close behind him. During his evidence he said he did not think a group of USC spread themselves across Cathedral Road, facing English Street, but that a group of them did go over to the playing fields. Two of his passengers (SC Davidson and SC Murray) spoke of hearing shots ahead of them as they travelled down Cathedral Road and before the car stopped. The man, the heat of whose firing was felt by S/Sgt McAnea, was SC Gray who said he heard two shots from the Shambles yard and that he fired two shots in the air towards the playing fields entrance.

29.36 The car that entered Edward Street was the Peugeot driven by SC E J McWilliams. As he entered, he said he heard gunfire from the Shambles. Then they were confronted by a crowd with stones and cudgels, coming up the street from the direction of the Cathedral. He told Mr Cafolla to get off the street but did not speak to Mrs McKee or any lady. A shot by S/Sgt Orr, who was near him, dispersed the rioters down Edward Street into the Cathedral grounds. He did not fire, but his Sterling went off accidentally and shot a bullet into the ground. He saw no one go towards the Shambles. Two of his passengers, S/Sgt Orr and SC Irwin, admitted to firing in the air. They also spoke of firing in the Shambles/Cathedral Road area before they opened fire.

29.37 In brief the USC evidence is that twelve of the platoon discharged their weapons into the air and that SC E J McWilliams accidentally discharged his weapon into the ground. No one admitted to firing for effect. All but one of those who fired, discharged either one or two shots. S/Sgt J H McWilliams said he fired three shots. Of the four who did not admit to firing, three were in the Morris Oxford. These were SDC Murray, SC Murray and SC Davidson. The fourth who did not admit to firing was SC Mayne Harris who was in the Peugeot. Each of the USC in the Triumph and the Ford gave evidence that they fired their weapons. Twenty-four shots were admitted to in evidence.

29.38 Very few of the platoon identified anyone else who fired. No conflict of evidence emerged from those who did. For instance, SDC Murray saw S/Sgt McAnea and SC Gray fire and SC W H D Bloomer saw SC Hamilton fire. On the other hand most of the witnesses claim to have seen remarkably little. S/Sgt McWilliams did not see anyone fire. Nor did S/Sgt McAnea. Nor did SC J G. Bloomer. Nor did SC Davidson. Nor did SC W E Murray. Nor did SC Beattie. Nor did SC Gray or SC D W Murray or SC Reid. SC Hamilton and SC Millar were aware of firing but could not identify those who had fired. This summary covers all the USC witnesses in cars on the Cathedral Road.

29.39 The evidence of the four USC witnesses in Edward Street does not raise such serious problems. It is sparse, but unusually specific. SC McWilliams knew that S/Sgt Orr fired and that his own weapon discharged accidentally. S/Sgt Orr heard one shot which did not come from either SC McWilliams or himself. SC Irwin saw S/Sgt Orr fire and heard, but did not see, SC McWilliams' gun firing. SC Mayne Harris in effect confirmed that S/Sgt Orr and SC Irwin fired. He did not see SC McWilliams' gun going off.

29.40 Several of the witnesses who said they fired in the air were asked whether they were trained to do so and said that they were. This was stated, for example, by SDC Murray. S/Sgt McAnea said they were instructed to fire into the air in certain circumstances, although not actually trained to do so. Major Moore, the adjutant of the Arnagh USC, told the Tribunal that the USC was not taught to fire in the air. As a soldier, he said, he was taught to kill, not to fire in the air.

29.41 There is general agreement that the platoon stayed in Cathedral Road for about 15 minutes after the shooting. They saw a body on the road and heard someone say that a man was dying and people asked them to get an ambulance. They saw the ambulance arrive, and then drove away along Cathedral Road.

Evidence of earlier firing

29.42 It will be noted that SDC Murray and others spoke of some firing in the area of the riot before the party opened fire. The importance of the allegation is obvious: if there was other firing, perhaps it was not the USC who killed Mr Gallagher. There was some evidence of firing besides that of the USC, before the USC arrived.

29.43 Mr McManus was in the rioting crowd at the English Street junction of Cathedral Road. He thought he heard two shots from the English Street direction and ran to the Parochial Hall in Cathedral Road. He said that these shots were fired about 20 minutes before the Tynan platoon fired their shots. Mr Kelly, who was standing in Cathedral Road near Daires Willows, testified that he heard shots from the direction of the City Hospital just before the Tynan cars arrived. And there is evidence from CI Buchanon that in Abbey Street he heard two/three shots from the area of Cathedral Road and Lower English Street. In total, this is substantial testimony that shooting took place a few minutes before the Tynan platoon opened fire in Cathedral Road. Its source and location has not been determined, but it must be unlikely that it was heard by the Tynan platoon or that it can have been the firing described by the USC as occurring immediately before they opened fire.

29.44 It is not possible to attribute to the firing described by these witnesses the casualties or property damage assembled in evidence, since neither its apparent location nor its timing fits the facts as known to the Tribunal of the death, the woundings, and the property damage in Cathedral Road.

The Tribunal's findings

29.45 It is not possible to identify who fired the shot that killed Mr Gallagher, or who wounded Mr McParland and Mr Moore. Nevertheless the Tribunal rejects the contention that none of the USC fired into the crowd. The Tribunal is satisfied that some of them did so fire, and that one of them killed Mr Gallagher, while others wounded Mr McParland and Mr Moore. Their leader, Mr Murray, did not seek to justify "firing for effect", and S/Sgt McAnea specifically said it would not have been justified. The evidence of firing from the crowd as the USC approached and jumped out of their cars is vague and uncertain: if, which the Tribunal doubts, it occurred at all, it was not serious enough to enable Mr Murray or S/Sgt McAnea to say that it justified firing by the USC for effect. After making all allowances for the strange, difficult and frightening situation in which they found themselves, there was no justification for firing into the crowd—as the USC themselves impliedly admitted by their strenuous denials that they had done any such thing.

29.46 Grave as was the misconduct of the USC in firing into the crowd, the Tribunal considers that a measure of responsibility rests with the County Inspector, who put an untrained but armed party of USC drawn from a country area into an alarming town riot without briefing or leadership.

Events subsequent to the shooting

The investigation

29.47 The subsequent conduct of the Tynan party is indicative of a state of panic among them and is, certainly, consistent with a sense of guilt.

29.48 SDC Murray said he told the party to go to Armagh RUC station. Near the old railway bridge SC Hamilton, sitting in the front passenger seat of the Ford, said he fired two shots into the air to disperse a crowd which was moving across the road to restrict their passage. In the same car SC W H D Bloomer had his gun pointing out through the back offside passenger window but said he did not fire.

29.49 A civilian witness thought that at least a dozen, and up to thirty, shots were fired at this stage. There were believed to be about thirty bullet marks on the roadway, although he discounted most of them. Another civilian witness was sure there were many more than two shots. He thought the car stopped at the railway bridge. A ballistic examination was carried out on 16 December 1969. About a dozen sites had been circled with white marks but Mr Beavis could not identify them as different from the rest of the road. However there is USC evidence that SC McWilliams' Peugeot stopped at some point on the road while waiting for S/Sgt McWilliams' Triumph, and SC McWilliams says he heard a shot at about this stage.

29.50 SDC Murray gave a direction that the platoon should go to Armagh RUC station. His evidence was that S/Sgt McAnea's car was short of petrol. They had to go to a "safe" petrol station. If the other cars had come with them they could all have gone back to Armagh police station together. He admitted that the chosen petrol station was three and half miles out and it was pointed out to him that there would have been enough petrol in the tank to get to the RUC station. In any event SDC Murray, travelling in S/Sgt McAnea's Morris Oxford, went to Tynan police station.

29.51 SDC Murray did not report the firing in Cathedral Road that night. He agreed that he was scared by the situation. He wanted first to discuss it with others in the platoon and produce a statement which would exonerate them. He discussed what happened only with S/Sgt McWilliams (at some stage) and eventually made a statement to an investigating detective at Tynan on 15 August. In evidence he gave other reasons for delay, including the absence of the Tynan station sergeant when he first returned and his bitterness at being let down by the County Inspector.

29.52 The other three cars returned to Armagh. S/Sgt McWilliams' evidence was that the men were more or less stunned, but decided to clean their weapons. At an RUC arms check they made no report of the shooting. They told the police conducting the check that they had been on duty at English Street: none admitted to having been at Cathedral Road. According to S/Sgt McWilliams they were afraid of being accused of killing John Gallagher and they wanted to see their SDC before making a report.

29.53 Apparently the police had no suspicion that the Tynan platoon had been involved and a Duty Officer's report at 12 40 am referred to shooting from within the Civil Rights group. CI Buchanon arranged for a detective to go to the Shambles early in the morning of 15 August and meantime regarded the police arms check as a "routine precaution". There was no significance in the fact that a police radio message directed that "all USC arms must be examined before allowing these men to proceed home".

29.54 However at 9.15 am the next morning CI Buchanon heard a rumour that the USC had been involved, and at 12 noon he received more precise information about cars and shooting from an informant. He then spoke to Sergeant Lindsay, the station sergeant at Tynan, and asked him to institute "discreet inquiries". The inquiries were to be "discreet" because of the danger of reprisals and because precipitate action might have alienated "at least part of the only force in the Province that the Government could call upon in the situation of great gravity and had called upon on the previous day, when they called them out".

29.55 Sergeant Lindsay established that the Tynan platoon had been present and reported this in Armagh to the County Inspector. The Armagh detective, Constable Emery, was sent to Tynan in the late afternoon by the County Inspector. It appears that he first saw SDC Murray, and then the SDC arranged for the four USC drivers to come to the barracks.

29.56 By this time the brothers McWilliams had discussed the situation. They knew that SC McWilliams' car number had been noted by civilians at Cathedral Road. Detective Constable Emery recorded that the group told him that they had been brought in convoy to Cathedral Road by an officer whose car they had lost, and that they had been attacked by rioters when they were trying to turn their cars. They said they heard shots from the playing fields direction. SC Bloomer and S/Sgt McWilliams said they had fired warning revolver shots over the heads of the crowd. At this, Detective Constable Emery telephoned CI Buchanon, told him what had been said and suggested that outside officers should be brought in to investigate. CI Buchanon told him to hold the men at the station and arranged for Head Constable McComish to be sent from Belfast.

29.57 The Head Constable obtained seven statements that night. These now showed a change, because they indicated that nearly all the men had fired. Head Constable McComish arranged to see the rest of the platoon at Tynan RUC station on 22 August, but by then they had taken legal advice, and no more statements were furnished. Head Constable McComish pursued his inquiries for some time, but was handicapped by lack of a bullet which could be shown to have killed John Gallagher. The Tynan platoon's weapons were collected for forensic examination on 25 August and replacement arms were issued. No prosecution was ever brought against any member of the Tynan platoon.

29.58 The Tribunal took some evidence about public statements by the RUC about the shooting. On 15 August, following information from CI Buchanon, it was stated that no police were on duty in Cathedral Road when the shooting occurred there. By the evening of the 15th CI Buchanon realised that the Tynan platoon must have been present, and on 16 August suggested to police headquarters that the statement should be corrected. In the event a second public statement was issued. This did not however refer to the presence or otherwise of police. It said that a Detective Head Constable had been assigned to investigate the shooting, that a definite line of inquiry was being followed and that it was likely a number of people would be charged.

29.59 It was put to the Armagh County Commandant and Adjutant that the Tynan platoon should have been suspended while the Gallagher incident was being investigated. The adjutant, Major Moore, believed, and the Tribunal agrees, that suspension would have been appropriate, but Captain Torrens Spence, the County Commandant, took the view that disclipinary action would have been out of place while a police investigation was proceeding. He added that the matter had been raised in Parliament and no action was taken by anyone superior to him. At a practical level he considered it important to do nothing to damage the effectivness and morale of other USC platoons, given the need for their services at that time. A few days after the incident, the USC was placed under the command of the GOC, Northern Ireland; consequently responsibility for action was formally removed from the Inspector General of the RUC.

The end of the riot

29.60 The shooting in Cathedral Road virtually ended the rioting. The police had the Protestant crowds under control in the Upper English Street area, while the Catholics, no doubt scared by the shooting, dispersed in the direction of Banbrook Hill and Railway Street. Later that night, at about 3 30 am, a severe fire broke out at the Bairnswear factory on the outskirts of the city to the north of Banbrook Hill. The damage was so substantial that over £1·1 m was paid in compensation.

29.61 The evidence given to the Tribunal is not enough to enable a finding to be made as to the responsibility for the fire. It is possible, as the police believe, that it was a planned IRA operation: but this has not been established to the satisfaction of the Tribunal. In the Tribunal's view the burning may equally well have been a reprisal for the death of Mr Gallagher. Whatever be the truth, it is likely that the fire was an act of arson associated with the rioting.

PART XI—CROSSMAGLEN

30.1 Crossmaglen, a small town in the south of County Armagh, stands where six roads meet—four from the border and two from the north. By car it is only ten or fifteen minutes away from the Southern Irish town of Castleblaney to the west and Dundalk to the east. Only one of the four roads leading to the border was in August 1969 an "approved" crossing-point—Carrick Street going south to Cullaville and the border at Art Hamills bridge, near which stood a United Kingdom customs post. But the other roads leading to the border were unobstructed, presenting no difficulty to anyone who chose to use them to cross the border. The police station is situate on Carrick Street, and near it is some modern housing. A more tempting target for terrorists operating from the other side of the border it would be difficult to imagine: and some were tempted on Sunday, 17 August.

30.2 At about 8 30 pm Sgt Clint of the RUC, who was in the station, saw a van coming across the lawn in front of the station. He sounded the alarm bell and fired a revolver shot, hoping to frighten away those who were in the van. At about the same time a member of the USC, who was also in the station, hearing the alarm, fired a burst from a sub-machine gun. The van stopped in front of, and close to, the station: three men leapt out of it and ran off: as they did so, one of them lobbed a hand grenade* towards the van. The grenade exploded and damaged the van: but fortunately the explosives (which were later discovered) in the van did not go up.

30.3 Nobody now doubted that the van contained explosives intended to blow up the police station. Police reinforcements were summoned, and a party of Reserve Force police under HC McMaster arrived. Displaying courage of a high order, this party towed the van away from the station and the houses.

30.4 On the morning of the 18th, Captain Willcox of the Army Bomb Disposal Unit arrived in Crossmaglen and found in the van a demolition charge of about 50 lbs. In his opinion the charge was expertly made and "with a little more determination the initiative would have been successful"—ie, it would have exploded. Had the charge exploded, in all probability the police station and its inmates would have been destroyed; the nearby houses would also have been severely damaged and some of the residents killed or injured.

30.5 The van had been stolen from a local farmer. The explosives, manufactured by ICI Ltd, had been sold in the Republic of Ireland: but the identity of the purchaser has not been established.

30.6 Such evidence as the Tribunal has been able to obtain indicates that the van, accompanied by two cars containing armed men, entered Crossmaglen from the Dundalk direction. After the attack, the r[illegible]from the van were picked up by the two cars, one of which fled in the direction of Castleblaney and the other towards Dundalk.

*Capt Willcox found that the hand grenade was of the same type as that used in Leeson Street on 13 August.

Conclusion

30.7 The incident bears the hallmark of an IRA attack mounted from the other side of the border. It was foiled by the alertness, energy and courage of the police. Had it succeeded, a number of innocent people would have been murdered, and serious damage done to public and private property.

PART XII—SOCIAL COST

CHAPTER 31

31.1 The true social cost of the disturbances is not precisely measurable. The Tribunal has not attempted to estimate their economic and social effects. But some part of their social cost can be directly assessed. In this chapter we set out in tabular form what is known about deaths and personal injuries, damage to property, and the intimidation and displacement of people.

SECTION 1—DEATHS

TABLE 1

Name	Age	Religion	Place of fatal incident
Francis McCloskey	66	Catholic	Main Street, Dungiven
Patrick Corry	61	,,	Unity Flats, Belfast
Herbert Roy	26	Protestant	Dover Street, Belfast
Samuel McLarnon	47	Catholic	Herbert Street, Belfast
Michael Lynch	28	,,	Area of junction of Butler Street and Elmfield Street, Belfast
Trooper Hugh Anthony McCabe	20	,,	Whitehall Maisonettes, Divis Street, Belfast
Patrick Rooney	9	,,	5 St Brendan's Path, Divis Street, Belfast
John Gallagher	30	,,	Cathedral Road, Armagh
Gerald McAuley	15	,,	Waterville Street, Belfast
David Linton	48	Protestant	Palmer Street, Belfast

31.2 Table 1 shows that directly and indirectly the rioting in July and August 1969 caused the death of ten people. Of these eight died of gunshot wounds, seven in Belfast and one in Armagh. The other two persons died of head injuries, one person in Belfast and one in Dungiven. Eight of the persons who died were Catholics and two were Protestants.

SECTION 2—PERSONAL INJURIES

31.3 Table 2 shows (a) the extent of RUC injuries in Londonderry, (b) the extent to which gunshot injuries were concentrated on civilians in Belfast, (c) that Protestant injuries occurred overwhelmingly in Belfast.

31.4 However, the table understates the extent of injury to Catholic civilians. Large numbers attended first-aid centres operated by the Order of Malta and St Johns Ambulance Brigade. In addition, a number of Catholic civilians (probably not very many) went to hospitals across the border.

Footnotes: (i) This table is based on hospital records and claims under the Criminal Injuries Acts (Northern Ireland).
(ii) Community identification of injured was made from evidence available to the Tribunal.
(iii) Statistics for Belfast were not available for July and those included from Mater Hospital, Belfast, are only from 14 August to the end of August.
(iv) A possible pellet or dart injury.
(v) The bullet injury to Courtable Smyth is not included in the gunshot injuries in the table.

31.5 It would be misleading simply to add the figures furnished for the first-aid centres to the table for Catholic civilian injuries in the main table, because there is some overlap with hospital records, particularly in serious cases, and because the criteria for seeking first-aid on the streets are likely to differ from those where hospital treatment is obtained. Also records kept by the first-aid centres are more likely to be imperfect.

31.6 Subject to such reservations we can record that the Derry Unit of the Order of Malta furnished figures of persons treated by them. These are set out in Londonderry Exhibit 68 and may be summarised as follows:—

	Number treated at first-aid posts	Number treated on streets	Number of persons sent hospital
Treated for personal injuries ...	440	122	33
Treated for CS gas	194	179	1

31.7 In Belfast Dr McAlister, who gave evidence about casualties treated at the Order of Malta's Sultan Street centre, stated that the centre had dealt with about 70 gunshot injuries of which 85 per cent had been referred to hospital. In addition 200 to 300 other casualties had been dealt with at the centre but as no records were kept these figures were only an estimate.

31.8 Ten other first-aid centres were opened by the Order of Malta in Catholic areas of the City in August 1969 on or after 15 August but no evidence of the number of casualties they treated was furnished.

31.9 The St Johns Ambulance Brigade has a mixed Catholic and Protestant membership although the membership of its West Belfast division was all Catholic. The Brigade set up twenty-two first-aid/refugee centres in both Catholic and Protestant areas of the City. About a dozen of these centres were in Protestant areas and of those in Catholic areas a number were combined Order of Malta and St Johns Ambulance Brigade centres. The West Belfast division stated that 260 patients went through their hands. Evidence was given that other divisions had given medical attention to casualties but Col Hughes, Deputy Commissioner of the Northern Ireland Brigade, could not give details of the numbers treated.

31.10 Father Gillespie referred to 100 wounded by gunshot wounds, presumably in the Ardoyne area. When pressed for corroborative evidence he stated "I think it was just general conversation at one of the corners. I cannot recollect any specific person". The hospital figure for treated gunshot wounds of Catholics in the area is 27. It is recognised that many did not go to hospital and that there were those treated in first-aid centres but it is felt that this evidence is less reliable than the figures supplied by Dr McDermott, Dr McAlister and Col Hughes.

SECTION 3—DAMAGE TO PROPERTY

31.11 A summary of evidence about property damage based on claims and awards under the Criminal Injuries Acts (Northern Ireland) is set out in Table 3 below. (A map of the main riot areas of Belfast, which gives an indication of property damage, is attached at Appendix VIII (M).)

31.12 The evidence is in many ways imperfect. It does not cover all damage everywhere in Northern Ireland. It excludes local authority and Crown property. For Londonderry and Belfast, where the major damage occurred, it does not provide total figures for court awards. Figures for claims are quoted, but these are often subject to heavy reductions when cases are determined by the courts.

31.13 Damage in the smaller towns is described in the narrative sections of the report. Table 3 shows that there was a substantial number of claims for damage to commercial property in Londonderry and the narrative sections of the report fill out the information about the damage done. However, it may be said that damage in Belfast was largely confined to the area covered by the map and in particular to the three main riot areas.

31.14 It has proved difficult to ensure complete agreement as to the damage done, partly because the Tribunal's concern was only with damage directly caused by the disturbances. However, a list of destroyed and damaged residential and residential/commercial property was discussed and agreed with interested parties by the solicitors to the Tribunal. The agreed list (List A of Exhibit 14A) contained 179 premises requiring demolition, 94 requiring major repair and 323 requiring minor repair. Catholics occupied 83·5 per cent. of the premises damaged or destroyed and Protestants 16·5 per cent. Exhibit 14A also contained a List B of 68 houses upon which agreement was not reached concerning damage. 75 per cent. of these houses were occupied by Catholics and 25 per cent. by Protestants.*

31.15 The extent of the damage to industrial premises is shown on the Map. Ten sets of exclusively commercial premises are included in Exhibit 14 as premises damaged in the disturbances. It is inappropriate to describe industrial or commercial property as Catholic or Protestant, but it is generally accepted that the major financial interests or management in this type of property were Protestant, or at any rate non-Catholic. Commercial and industrial property accounted for by far the largest percentage of the monetary value of property damaged or destroyed. The loss of employment, however, was shared by both sections of the community.

SECTION 4—DAMAGE TO LICENSED PREMISES

31.16 A distinctive aspect of the damage to property was the extensive damage to licensed premises. This has major significance because the licensed trade represents the biggest Catholic business interest in Northern Ireland,

*Licensed premises included in Lists A and B of Exhibit 14A have been deleted from the statistics set out in this paragraph since these premises are included in the figures for damage to licensed premises in the next section.

(iii) Total amount claimed in Belfast up to June 1971 amounted to £9,422,977 according to Belfast Corporation records. Details of amounts claimed are not included in Belfast Exhibit 54 or profile.

(iv) The amount of the award for industrial premises and contents in Armagh was stated as "in excess of £1,100,000". This figure is in respect of one factory and includes a figure for loss of production, reinstatement and consequential damage in respect of water supply installations damaged in April 1969 amounting to £40,000 is not included above. The cost of damage to electricity supply installations during March and April 1969 is also not included: evidence of the actual cost was not furnished but it is known to have been heavy.

According to the secretary of the Belfast and U[illegible] Licensed Vintners Association 80 per cent. of the 480 publicans in Belfast were Catholic, and only the remaining 20 per cent. Protestant. While most Belfast property damage was in three main riot areas the damage to licensed premises occurred in widely separate areas of the city. In total 24 on-licensed premises were destroyed and 36 damaged while 6 off-licensed premises were destroyed and 10 damaged. The value of the property damaged and destroyed was stated to be between one and one and a quarter million pounds. All these premises were either Catholic owned or Catholic managed. The Tribunal is satisfied that the damage was the work of Protestant gangs

31.18 Intimidation is the most insidious result of community conflict. It is easily committed and hard to detect. Documentary evidence (Exhibit 21, Belfast) was given to the Tribunal of complaints and reports received by the police of threats and intimidation during the months of July and August 1969 in Belfast. The Tribunal did not attempt any investigation of the truth or otherwise of these complaints and reports. Intimidation was not limited to Belfast but in other areas there is no evidence of large numbers of cases of intimidation. The attached summary (Table 4) is based on the information contained in the exhibit.

31.19 The figures for Police District C give some indication of the significance of intimidation in the Ardoyne. The full exhibit shows that in the Ardoyne Catholics were the principal victims. No claim can be made for the accuracy of these figures, which are subject to various limitations, and merely give some indication of the way in which intimidation increased during the summer of 1969.

SECTION 6—DISPLACEMENT OF PERSONS

31.20 In towns other than Belfast a very limited number of families moved house, usually for a temporary period. In Belfast the permanent displacement of families reached major proportions. This section is limited to the Belfast displacement.

31.21 During the hearings evidence of specific families leaving their homes was given and the exhibit on intimidation referred to above confirms that at least 128 families were displaced because of intimidation. Evidence of families leaving homes to go to relief centres was also heard. This evidence, however, does not adequately cover the large displacement of families in Belfast during the wo prosecutions were unsuccessful.

31.22 This report was furnished in a form requested by the Tribunal and is to be found in Exhibit 49 (Belfast). The following table sets out its main data summary. The numbers of Catholics displaced were obtained from a questionnaire and from enquiries made of Catholic clergy. The report describes the remainder as "Non-Catholics" and is strictly accurate, although for consistency of terminology we use the term "Protestant".

TABLE 5

TOTALS	1,505	28,616	315	88,379

31.23 It can be calculated from Table 5 that 1·6 per cent. of the households in Belfast moved to other accommodation during the two main riot months and the month following. Of these households 82·7 per cent. were Catholic and 17·3 per cent. Protestant. The table includes about 145 families who were displaced in September 1969; these were all in the Oldpark locality (Area III).

31.24 The report puts the number of Catholic households in Belfast at almost 29,000, and the remaining households at slightly over 88,000. Hence they calculate 5·3 per cent. of Catholic households were displaced, compared with 0·4 per cent. of Protestant households.

31.25 There are pitfalls in such comparisons. The Tribunal has no means of establishing objectively whether those who moved "needed" to do so. The police records provide evidence of 128 families having moved house because of intimidation but why the remainder of the 1,820 families moved house is not analysed in Dr Poole's evidence. It is likely that the root causes of this exodus were direct violence, intimidation or general fear due to the disturbances, and isolation from co-religionists. There is evidence that some families were forced to move by members of their own community but this evidence is inconclusive and it is considered that the number of households concerned would be small. It was also argued before the Tribunal that some people in riot areas took advantage of the situation to get priority on housing lists. But the Tribunal has no reason to believe that this occurred on a scale to invalidate the calculations of the report. It should also be appreciated that the report has excluded very substantial estimates for temporary displacement, since these were liable to "Catholic" bias. Accordingly the Tribunal accepts the four main conclusions in Dr Poole and Miss Day's report, which are as follows:—

(1) The percentage of Catholic families in the city who suffered displacement is very much higher than the percentage of non-Catholic families suffering displacement.

(2) The displacement problem was consistently more severe in the west and north-west than elsewhere in the city.

(3) In every single sector of the city the percentage of Catholic families displaced was much higher than the percentage of non-Catholic families displaced.

(4) The highest percentage of Catholic families displaced was in the north-west, with a high percentage also in the west, and, indeed, in no sector was the proportion insignificant. For non-Catholics, on the other hand, the highest percentage displaced was in the west and the proportion elsewhere was insignificant.

APPENDIX I

TRIBUNAL PROCEDURE

The Act of 1921 does not prescribe the procedure to be followed by Tribunals of Inquiry to which it is applied. In 1966 a Royal Commission under the Chairmanship of Lord Justice Salmon made a number of recommendations as to the law and practice which should govern Tribunals of this kind. Although no legislative action has yet been taken on the Salmon Report[1] we have, in general, followed its recommendations which we regard as an invaluable code of procedural rules and safeguards. Such departures from the Commission's proposals as we have made have been dictated by the special, and in many ways unique, features of an inquiry into highly controversial matters conducted in Northern Ireland over the period September 1969 to June 1971. Aspects of the Tribunals procedure which are of special interest are summarised in the following paragraphs.

1 Immunity of Witnesses

Under Section 1(3) of the 1921 Act a witness before a Tribunal is entitled to the same immunities and privileges as if he were a witness before the High Court. This does not however mean that a witness's answers cannot be used against him in any subsequent civil or criminal proceedings. The Salmon Commission recommended that a witness's immunity should be extended to cover these situations[2] but no amendment to the Act has been made. However, a similar protection for witnesses was achieved through an undertaking given by the Attorney General for Northern Ireland in the following terms:

> "the immunity of a witness should be extended so that neither his evidence before the Tribunal, nor any statement furnished by him for the purposes of the Tribunal, nor any documents he is required to produce to the Tribunal shall be used against him in any subsequent criminal proceedings, except in criminal proceedings in which he may be charged with having given false evidence before the Tribunal or conspired with or procured others to do so."

The undertaking was limited to criminal proceedings, since it was not within the competence of the Attorney General to extend the immunity to a witness in respect of any subsequent civil proceedings.

A further extension of the immunity of witnesses was effected by a ruling of the Tribunal that:

> "it would be contrary to the spirit of the undertaking given by the Attorney General if the Government should invoke its powers of detention without trial under the [Civil Authorities (Special Powers) Act (Northern Ireland) 1922] against any person based upon any answer given by that person to the Tribunal . . . ."

The Minister of Home Affairs, in a letter to the Secretary of the Tribunal, expressed his agreement with this opinion and stated that the Government had no such intention.[3]

2 Hearing of Evidence in Private

Section 2(a) of the 1921 Act provides that a Tribunal to which the Act is applied shall not refuse to allow the public or any portion of the public to be present at any of the proceedings of the Tribunal unless in the opinion of the Tribunal it is in the public interest expedient so to do for reasons connected with the subject matter of the inquiry or the nature of the evidence to be given.

The Salmon Commission pointed out[1] that these words had only been construed as applying to cases in which hearing the evidence in public would constitute a security risk. We found it necessary to hold a small number of hearings in private for a variety of reasons. In each case we satisfied ourselves that the reason given was sound. The cases were:

(a) Two witnesses gave their evidence in private because there were reasonable fears of violence or intimidation if it were made public. (Five witnesses gave evidence in public, but anonymously, for similar reasons.)

(b) a senior police officer gave evidence of subversive activity in private since publication would have been inadvisable on security grounds.

(c) Two witnesses, Mr. McKeague and Mr. Johnston, gave evidence in private in order to avoid prejudicing them in respect of criminal charges which were at that time pending. This evidence was published later.

(d) Medical witnesses testified privately about the health of a potential witness.

(e) In one case we took the exceptional step of hearing evidence in the absence not only of the public but also of counsel and solicitors for interested parties. With the witnesses' consent their own counsel and solicitors were also excluded. Only counsel for the Tribunal and members of its secretariat were present. The time and place of these hearings were not made public.
The witnesses concerned were four policemen who had formed part of the crews of three Shorland armoured vehicles operating in Belfast on the night of 14 August 1969. The state of affairs in the Province combined with information received from the R.U.C. convinced us that the identity of these men should be kept secret. It was in these wholly exceptional circumstances that we felt it right to depart from normal procedure in order to take evidence which was vital to our inquiry.
The evidence of these witnesses was made public after we had satisfied ourselves that it gave no clue to their identity.

3 Commencement of Hearings

The Salmon Commission strongly urged that more time should be allowed than in the past for the preparation of an inquiry before public hearings begin.[2] Our own experience, particularly in the early days, certainly supports this suggestion: as one likely in the end to shorten the inquiry. But, as the Commission realised, there is a competing consideration. It is in the public interest that work on an inquiry into matters of urgent public importance be commenced, and be seen to have been commenced, as quickly as possible. It was for this reason that the Tribunal's first hearing of evidence took place within one months of the Parliamentary resolutions establishing it.

(1) Paragraph 122
(2) Paragraph 49

4 The Tribunal's Legal Advisers

In England the Treasury Solicitor acts as solicitor to tribunals of inquiry. He and his staff have built up over the years a very considerable expertise in the assembling and marshalling of evidence for submission to a tribunal: he also can call into action the many agencies of investigation, including the police, usually available to government. The Salmon Commission believed that the practice of the Treasury Solicitor advising Tribunals of Inquiry was a good one and should usually be adopted.[1] But there is in Northern Ireland no equivalent to the Treasury Solicitor: and, because the police were themselves involved in the disturbances under investigation, it was not fitting that the Tribunal should rely on them to conduct the Tribunal's investigations. We, therefore, had to improvise. Two firms of solicitors were instructed: the principals of one were Protestant, the principal of the other Catholic. When, as soon occurred, they gained the confidence of the public, there was no shortage of evidence: contrary to the expectation of many, the problem became not a search for evidence but a discriminating and difficult choice from what was freely offered.

The Tribunal solicitors acted under the advice of counsel (2 leaders, 2 juniors): and ultimately upon the instructions of the Tribunal, given at conferences attended by the Tribunal members, the secretariat, and the legal advisers.

What may have been lost through the lack of police investigators was more than balanced by the gain in public confidence arising from the knowledge of the Tribunal's independence and the guarantee of confidentiality. The Tribunal did have a measure of assistance generously provided us by the Treasury Solicitor on certain matters.

5 Closing Speeches by Counsel

Instead of allowing counsel for interested parties an opportunity for making closing speeches on behalf of their clients we decided to invite written submissions. This eliminated any necessity for restricting the time available to each counsel as well as any problem over the order of delivery of closing speeches. The Tribunal embarked upon this innovation only after prolonged consideration. The quality of the written submissions received by the Tribunal and their value to us in our deliberations fully justified this departure from the tradition of the spoken word.

APPENDIX II

TRIBUNAL ORGANISATION AND ADMINISTRATION

1 Secretariat, Counsel and Solicitors

a. Tribunal Staff. The Tribunal was directly assisted by a Secretary and Assistant Secretary, seconded from the Northern Ireland Government, and by a legal assistant seconded from the Law Commission of England and Wales. The Secretary and Assistant Secretary had had similar appointments with the earlier Cameron Commission.

b. Counsel and Solicitors. The Tribunal appointed two senior and two junior counsel, and two firms of solicitors, to act for the Tribunal. The appointments were divided equally between Catholics and Protestants. The two junior counsel had had similar appointments with the Cameron Commission. Counsel and solicitors played the major part bringing together all the evidence into a rational coherent form and in presenting it to the Tribunal. Detailed research and investigation had also to be undertaken by them on the gaps and contradictions in the oral and written evidence received. In addition to its own counsel and solicitors the Tribunal felt a need for legal staff permanently based in its own offices and in these circumstances assistance was invited from the Treasury Solicitor, London. The Treasury Solicitor readily agreed, on the basis that successive pairs of legally qualified and executive staff would be loaned for periods of about a fortnight. They carried out such tasks as the preparation of initial summaries of events and the drafting of adverse allegations to be served on potential witnesses. They were also responsible for all contacts with the Army, and with London based Government Departments and potential witnesses. In addition they provided an invaluable source of strength to the Tribunal and its officers. Their function gradually became less essential and it became possible to dispense with their assistance in June 1970, except for any enquiries which had to be made in Great Britain.

c. Archivists. Archivists and staff from the Public Record Office were attached to the Tribunal to assist in cataloguing, collating and indexing the vast amount of written evidence submitted.

d. Shorthand Writers. A team of London shorthand writers was employed to produce daily a typed copy of the evidence in court. This was then photocopied to provide copy transcripts for the Inquiry before the commencement of the next day's hearing.

e. Expert Advisers. Assistance was also received from the Northern Ireland Department of Industrial and Forensic Science and from a Home Office ballistics expert. Other Northern Ireland Government Departments supplied the services of architects, surveyors, mappers, etc., to provide the wide variety of information and material required by the Tribunal.

f. Office Staff. Clerical staff and shorthand typists were seconded to the Tribunal from existing Northern Ireland Government Departments.

FS 1. 374

Her Majesty's Stationery Office provided machinists to photocopy the large number of transcripts and documents required.

2 Division of Secretariat Functions

So far as possible the Secretary gave priority to consideration of the written and oral evidence received by the Tribunal. One of his main functions was examination of the vast volume of evidence and preparation of working documents for the Tribunal. In this work he was joined by the Law Commission Legal Assistant. The Assistant Secretary was responsible mainly for office management and document control.

3 Processing of Evidence and Documents

Although the procedure for handling written evidence was settled early on in the Inquiry changes naturally evolved and the procedure set out here is that which was in operation towards the end of the Inquiry.

Initially all evidence went to the Assistant Secretary who, if it was of immediate revelance to evidence being heard in court at that time, brought it to the attention of Counsel. Otherwise it was put on a file created for the person or body submitting the statement and each file was given a consecutive number. An alphabetical index was then created and all material was widely cross referenced. Each reference was indexed separately and inserted on a small ring binder book for ease of handling and to ensure that index pages were not misplaced or lost.

A typed copy of the original statement was made where necessary and both the original and copy were placed on the file. To each of the members of the Tribunal, Tribunal Counsel and Solicitor and Secretary typed copies of the evidence were distributed. This circulation of evidence took place within one day of receipt, although early on in the Inquiry it sometimes took longer due to the volume of material being processed and due to the Tribunal sitting in Londonderry, 80 miles away from its main offices. During the Londonderry sittings a daily courier service operated between Belfast and Londonderry for Tribunal papers.

A copy of each statement was also furnished to the archivist whose staff indexed and collated copies of the statement on special files on certain persons, particular events or special locations decided upon by Counsel. On these files relevant newspaper cutttings were also placed. These files contained all the material available to the Tribunal on particular persons, locations or subjects.

An acknowledgment of evidence was sent in each case accompanied by a copy of the statement. The acknowledgment not only informed the recipient that his evidence had arrived safely with the Tribunal but that it was being considered by it and should the Tribunal decide that it would require further information, either oral or written, it would contact the recipient again. Numerous statements received special drafted acknowledgments where the standard acknowledgment was not applicable.

4 Accommodation and Equipment

Adequate accommodation was always a problem and requirements were initially underestimated, but, understandably so, in so far as the first estimate of the volume of evidence to be heard and the ultimate length of the Inquiry were only a fraction of the actual evidence received and time taken. But for the consideration and generosity of individuals and departments in making space available to the Tribunal to their own inconvenience the task of the Tribunal would have been much more difficult.

Attention had to be given not only to the provision of headed stationery, desks, equipment, etc., but also to such varied matters as additional telephones for the press and loud speaker systems in courts.

In view of the confidential nature of many of the statements and records and the possibility of disturbances in court, careful consideration was given to security. Court security was placed in the hands of the police and military. Locked steel presses and a safe combined with careful surveillance provided the security required for the Tribunal papers. All confidential papers no longer required were destroyed by burning under supervision.

5 Publicity

In so far as the Tribunal hearings were in public and dealt with matters of public interest publicity did not need to be sought except at the beginning of the Inquiry. Press notices were inserted in local newspapers requesting written evidence and bringing the public notice to the commencement of sittings or changes of venue. Counsel and solicitors were also kept informed of the witnesses to be heard in court and the future sitting timetable by sending notices to the individual solicitors involved or by posting notices in the Bar Library and the offices of the Law Society.

6 Summoning and Swearing of Witnesses

Initially witness summonses were served by registered AR post but this was found to be unsatisfactory and the method eventually adopted was for a member of the Tribunal staff to serve summonses personally.

The summonses were prepared in duplicate and signed by one of the three Tribunal members. The form of summons was:

TRIBUNAL OF INQUIRY (EVIDENCE) ACT 1921

Tribunal of Inquiry constituted to Inquire into certain acts of violence and civil disorders which occurred in the months of March, April, July and August 1969 at various places in Northern Ireland

FS/1/325

To

I HEREBY SUMMON you to attend at the Royal Courts of Justice, Chichester Street, Belfast, at the Sitting of the Tribunal on the day of 19 at the hour of 10.30 o'clock in the forenoon and so on from day to day until you are released from attendance by the Tribunal, to give evidence on any matter material to the Inquiry and also to bring with you and to produce at the time and place aforesaid all relevant documents.

Dated day of 19

.....

Tribunal of Inquiry
Chichester Street BELFAST
BT1 3JE

Having successfully served the summons it was appropriately endorsed by the server to prove service and then filed.

Loss of earnings, travelling expenses and subsistence were provided where necessary. The normal form of procedure for the swearing of witnesses in a court of law was used.

7 Notices of Allegations

Persons against whom allegations had been made in written statements submitted to the Tribunal were served with a document, drafted by the solicitors to the Tribunal, giving details of the allegations. This document did not, however, identify the maker of the statement. A copy was also sent to the solicitor of the person but if he was not represented his notice stated:

i. when the evidence contained in the allegation would be given,

ii. that he was entitled to attend the hearing, and

iii. that he might consider it advisable to consult a solicitor.

Copies of the allegations were always kept available in court.

8 Court Sitting Files

The Inquiry was divided into phases roughly based on the different locations and events set out in the terms of reference. For each of these phases a list of possible witnesses to be summoned was furnished by the Tribunal's counsel to the secretariat so as to arrange for the service of summons, issue of notices of allegations, notification to solicitors and counsel of lists of witnesses and the preparation of evidence material relevant to the witnesses being called. This evidence material was put together in the form of a sitting file suitably indexed and composed of the statements made by witnesses and any other relevant material available concerning them. Each member of the Tribunal, the Secretary, Tribunal Counsel and solicitors were supplied with a copy of this file.

9 Exhibits

Since documents, photographs and objects handed into court as exhibits were constantly referred to in court and with the transcript formed the evidence on which the Report of the Inquiry was based, careful attention was paid to the custody and indexing of this material.

Each exhibit on being handed into the Tribunal was given a consecutive number and was labelled with an appropriate description. The number and description of the exhibit was also noted in a register. The original exhibits were kept available in court while copies of exhibit documents and photographs were distributed to counsel and solicitors engaged in the Inquiry. An index of exhibits was also provided.

10 Transcripts

A special team of shorthand writers was engaged to prepare a typed copy of each day's evidence which was then photocopied and bound ready for distribution the next morning to the Tribunal, counsel and solicitors. Each transcript contained an index of that day's witnesses and a cumulative index of all the previous witnesses. For ease of reference each page was numbered consecutively and had down the side of the page the letters of the alphabet at spaces of one inch.

A further index composed of the references to certain persons, places and events was prepared from the transcripts for the Tribunal's own use.

Transcripts were supplied free of charge to counsel and solicitors engaged in the Inquiry. Copies were made available for sale to the public at a price approximating the cost of production.

11 Legal Representation

On the first day's sitting it was announced that "Those persons who have successfully applied to be legally represented will be paid their reasonable costs unless the Tribunal recommends to the contrary. The amount of such costs will be as agreed or as ascertained by taxation on a solicitor and client basis. The Tribunal is now prepared to hear applications for legal representations. Before any application is made let me say that each applicant for legal representation should ensure that the secretary to the Tribunal has in writing the name of the counsel and the name of solicitors who are intended to represent the applicant, and also the address and name of the client." To simplify the furnishing of this, application forms were supplied to persons intending to make application for representation. The complete form was brought to the attention of the Tribunal before the formal application was made in court.

A record of all attendances of counsel, solicitors and witnesses was kept and on the basis of this record the secretariat authorised the payment of fees and witnesses' expenses, including loss of earnings. The fees paid to counsel and solicitors were based on the scales agreed by the Attorney General for Northern Ireland.

12 Staff

A considerable number of staff were involved in the administrative work of the Tribunal. Some only remained for a relatively short period but long service was given by Mr. B. Barr (Court Officer), Mr. A. Millar (Exhibits Officer), Mrs. McGartland and Miss J. McQuade. Mr. B. G. Hutton and Mr. S. C. McMenamin (Archivists from the Public Record Office) also assisted in the work of the Tribunal.

Notes: (1) The witness figures are calculated area by area. Some witnesses gave evidence more than once, since their evidence covered more than one area. Such witnesses are counted as separate witnesses for each area so as to give the total number of witnesses for each area. It therefore follows that the totals are greater than the actual number of witnesses called: e.g. the figure 440 represents accurately the number of witnesses called area by area and includes witnesses who gave evidence more than once but for different areas. The actual number of individual witnesses called was 428.

(2) Daily transcripts numbered 172 but there was no hearing on day number 8 and days numbered 1, 2 and 171 were formal and no witnesses examined. The Shorland hearing has been numbered day 172 and counted as one court day.

(3) These figures are given as a guide to the representativeness of the witnesses. The terms Protestant and Catholic are used sociologically and are indications of the communities to which from the evidence available to the Tribunal the witnesses appear to belong.

PRESS RELEASE

SPEECH BY THE PRIME MINISTER, MAJOR THE RT. HON. J. D. CHICHESTER-CLARK, D.L., M.P., IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS ON THURSDAY, 14TH AUGUST 1969.

This debate will test to the full our ability to rise to the level of events. Are we, in this House, prepared to lead the community back to peace? Or are we simply going to re-echo, for the benefit of a watching and critical world, all the fears, hatreds and animosities which have been running riot in our streets? The people of Ulster, weary of strife, yearning for peace, fearful for their future, await our answer. For myself I will seek to be factual. I must apportion blame where I believe it to lie. But I will not seek to inflame feeling or to inflict any needless wounds. I would ask all hon. Members who follow me to be moderate, tolerant and positive.

Since this House last met for regular debate, we have had three separate series of incidents of grave civil disorder. First of all, in Londonderry and Dungiven on 12th/13th July, there was widespread and unforgivable vandalism. These incidents followed the Annual Orange demonstrations on 12th July, but there is no evidence whatever that they arose out of those demonstrations. There is not a shred of evidence that these demonstrations, conducted on the same basis as for many years past, were in any way offensive either in intent or in practice. They were made an occasion for mindless and reckless hooliganism, destructive, irresponsible and anti-social by those of an opposite point of view.

Then on 2nd August, the situation deteriorated with very serious rioting, looting and vandalism in Belfast. It appears to have originated in a widely-circulated rumour that a Junior Orange parade had been attacked at Unity Walk. By whom that rumour was originated, how it was circulated and to what end I do not know. But it served to inflame feeling in the Protestant Shankill Road district of Belfast very rapidly. The police had to intervene to avert a direct sectarian conflict. I may say, in view of the usual reckless allegations of police partiality, that the first baton charge of the day was made against a Protestant crowd. Further trouble broke out in the Roman Catholic Hooker Street area, and the resources of the police were very fully stretched to contain it. When, on 5th August, the disturbances finally died down, the City was left in an uneasy and disturbed state. The significance of these events was that for the immediate future, considerable numbers of police would obviously have to be reserved in the capital, thereby making it difficult to supplement forces in other towns if trouble arose there.

This is the background against which we had to consider the Apprentice Boys' parade in Londonderry on 12th August. We had suggestions from various quarters that we should restrict it in some way. But what were the facts we had to consider? The demonstration had been held annually for many, many years and been generally accepted on that basis even by those of opposing views. There was no evidence whatever that those in the parade intended to act in any way irresponsibly. Nor was there any evidence of an organised plan to interfere with them. Indeed, the indications were that every responsible organisation in the City was directing its efforts to keeping the peace. The hon. Member for Foyle very consistently defended the right of peaceful demonstration within the law. We also had to take into account that if a disciplined and orderly parade was banned, a right to parade on that day exercised over countless years might be asserted by other and less well-disciplined elements. These grave decisions seem so easy to outsiders. But in practice they are always a weighing up of various factors. On balance we decided it was right to give those who had talked so much of peace, a chance to live up to it.

We all know what occurred when the parade took place. Its members were peaceful, orderly and disciplined. They were abused; they were pelted with missiles. And when the police moved in—as they had to do—to cope with these hooligans, many of them only juveniles, they encountered the force of a carefully-prepared and calculated resistance. What sinister forces had been at work in Londonderry, and for how long, to have this arsenal of petrol bombs and other weapons prepared? This was no onrush of sudden indignation. It was a direct and calculated affront to the forces of law and responsible government in this country.

Since then, disorder in Londonderry has continued almost without interruption. There has been very widespread damage to property, both public and private, and a mounting toll of injuries. In order to contain the situation, the police, with the specific approval of the Minister of Home Affairs, have been using in suitable circumstances CS tear smoke. This was not a step taken lightly. Indeer my rt. hon. and learned Friend, before it was ever used, considered it his duty to arrange for a demonstration at which he subjected himself to a concentration. That, if I may say so, is typical of the conscientious way in which he has tackled his onerous duties over these difficult days. CS is the most modern form of tear smoke. It is unpleasant—indeed it would be ineffective if it was not unpleasant—but it is both a more efficient and a more humane method of riot control than (say) repeated baton charges.

Let me make it very clear, because of outrageous comments— which I will come to in a moment—that the police are "attacking" the Bogside, that what in fact they have been doing is to prevent a spread of violence and vandalism to the very heart of the city. At the same time, every attempt has been made both by the Government and the police, through every channel open to us, to make the residents understand that these police activities will cease at once if the conditions of riot are brought to an end. Unfortunately, many of those concerned seem to be either leaderless or subject to extremely malign influences.

Of course all this is a tragedy for the City of Londonderry. What the rioters are tearing down is not merely the existing bricks and mortar of their own city, but its hopes of progress and development in time to come. How is the Londonderry Commission expected to bring in the jobs the area so badly needs when this is the image of the city flashed to every television screen in the world?

The unsettled conditions produced throughout Northern Ireland by these continuing clashes have been reflected in widely-scattered incidents at other places throughout the country, and a menacing aspect has been a growing use of firearms.

I am convinced that in these circumstances it was the right decision to ban all parades and meetings for the rest of this month, and this prohibition may very well have to be extended. I am sorry indeed that we have had to interfere with plans of responsible and well-conducted organisations such as the Royal Black Preceptories and the Ancient Order of Hibernians; but it is surely now crystal clear to everyone that demonstrations can be made the occasion for riot and bloodshed, however inoffensive in themselves.

We are also bound to strengthen the hands of the hard-pressed police. As usual it is they who have been bearing the main brunt. Let any hon. Member who continues to talk about "peaceful protest" contemplate the burns of a policeman who has been deliberately set on fire. Police casualties have been very heavy. Their courage has been beyond all praise.

The Government would have been failing in its clear duty if it had not acted to strengthen the hand of the R.U.C. County Inspectors now have a discretion to call out the Special Constabulary to support the police as appears necessary. I would add that any criticism of this deployment in the present grave circumstances is the sheerest irresponsibility. Let no one imagine that this Government will allow a collapse of law and order without calling in every available force—I repeat every available force—which is needed to prevent such a situation from arising.

But the people in Britain and elsewhere who are watching these events should waken up to the reality of what is happening here. This is not the agitation of a minority seeking by lawful means the assertion of political rights. It is the conspiracy of forces seeking to overthrow a Government democratically elected by a large majority. What the teenage hooligans seek beyond cheap "kicks" I do not know. But of this I am quite certain—they are being manipulated and encouraged by those who seek to discredit and overthrow this Government. Those who cry so loudly for "British intervention" see it as a half-way house to the long-sought goal of an Irish Republic.

Last week my rt. hon. Friend the Minister of Home Affairs and I sought an interview with the Home Secretary. We were given his complete and unqualified assurance that the position of Northern Ireland as an integral part of the United Kingdom is not now in question, nor will it be brought into question. And I want to make it very clear that no considerations of any sort or kind will deter us from taking such steps as are necessary to restore law and order. Already we have had to authorise extensive use of tear smoke to cope with these riotous crowds. We will not shrink from any other measure the situation may require.

We are all travelling together in this vessel called Northern Ireland. Some people seem to be trying to scuttle because they don't like those who are on the bridge. If we all drown together, what satisfaction is there in that? We are all Ulstermen, whether Protestant or Catholic, rich or poor, Unionist or Nationalist. No one outside Ulster is going to find for us solutions we cannot find for ourselves.

In this context, a very serious new dimension was imported into these events—most unnecessarily and most irresponsibly—by the remarks of Mr. Lynch. History will record in how responsible and neighbourly a way we have tried to conduct our relationships with the Irish Republic. All that has been brought to an end by this intervention. We must and we will treat the Government which seeks to wound us in our darkest hour as an unfriendly and implacable Government, dedicated to overthrow by any means the status which enjoys the support of a majority of our electorate. I am sure many hon. Members who heard Mr. Lynch's remarks will have shared my intense anger and resentment at their tone and content. This talk of the police "attacking" the people of Londonderry, and of injured, reluctant to use Northern Ireland hospitals, is not statesmanship but the effusions of a hostile propaganda. As for the graver part of his remarks, let me reiterate that there will be no change in the position of Northern Ireland as an integral part of the United Kingdom. The Government in London re-affirm that no such change could be contemplated without our consent, and we do not consent, nor will we consent in the future. As for United Nations intervention, this absurd suggestion entirely ignores the fact that this is not an international situation, but an internal one.

This is the situation as I see it today.

Let me assure hon. Members that this Government is determined to leave no stone unturned to protect the security of Northern Ireland. We will not shrink from taking whatever action is needed to achieve that end.

However, I promise to listen to positive suggestions from any quarter of this House. Let us all think of the people we represent, who look to us for a new start—for a way out of this morass into which we are sinking. Let us, Mr. Speaker, act like honourable Members.

PRESS RELEASE

STATEMENT BY THE PRIME MINISTER OF NORTHERN IRELAND (MAJOR THE RT. HON. J. D. CHICHESTER-CLARK, D.L., M.P.) FROM STORMONT CASTLE TODAY.

My colleagues on the Security Committee—that is to say the Ministers of Home Affairs, Education and Development—have been in almost constant session with me over the past days.

Today we of course have been considering the tragic situation in Belfast. Evidence available to us makes it very clear that subversive Republican elements were to the fore in the events of last evening. Well-disciplined and ruthless men, working to an evident plan, attacked the police at a number of points in the city. The police were of course obliged to return that fire, and in the subsequent exchanges a large number of injuries—some of them fatal—occurred.

I repeat what I said yesterday in Parliament. Quite clearly we confront here a deliberate conspiracy to subvert a democratically-elected Government. The disorder which is being created in our capital city cannot and will not be tolerated. The police forces, dealing as they are with armed conspiracy, evidently require reinforcement. The Inspector General has therefore requested the deployment of troops in the city, and the G.O.C. has assented to this, with of course the knowledge and agreement of both Governments.

A considerable number of persons suspected of subversive activities are being held by the police for interrogation.

We have gratefully accepted an offer from the Home Secretary to make available to the R.U.C. the services of two very senior and experienced police officers from Great Britain, who will be available for liaison and consultation as required. They are expected to arrive this evening.

The Cabinet have decided to set up a Public Information Centre under the direction of the Minister of Finance, to keep the public informed and counter malicious rumour. Bulletins will be issued at regular intervals through the Press and broadcasting media. Further details of this will be given shortly.

We ask all sensible people to keep off the streets. It is intolerable that the work of the forces of law and order should be impeded, as it was at times last night, by irresponsible sight-seers. Parents should make sure that their children, out of natural curiosity, do not expose themselves to needless risks.

I am in no doubt that Ulster faces today the most serious and malevolent threat in its history. We will resist it by every means in our power. If every responsible person keeps off the streets and lets us isolate and deal with the real trouble-makers, the job will be greatly simplified. But let me make this clear. The United Kingdom and Northern Ireland Governments stand together in their complete determination that we will not be forced out of the United Kingdom against our will. In the last resort our enemies face not only the determination of Ulster but the might of Britain. All they can hope to achieve is a tragic and unnecessary loss of life, and the gravest damage to all our people, Protestant and Roman Catholic alike.

15th August 1969.

PRESS RELEASE

SPEECH BY THE PRIME MINISTER, MAJOR THE RT. HON. J. D. CHICHESTER-CLARK, D.L., M.P., AT A PRESS CONFERENCE IN STORMONT CASTLE TODAY, SUNDAY, 17TH AUGUST, 1969.

We have, of course, been doing what we can to provide you all with a regular and accurate supply of information on the public order situation in Belfast and elsewhere in Northern Ireland. I have, however, invited you to come here today so that my colleagues and I may put before you, and through you to the public, our views on some of the wider issues involved. This is vitally necessary in view of a great deal of speculation, much of it wide of the mark.

I want to deal first of all with the nature and origins of the disturbances which began in Londonderry and subsequently spread to Belfast and other centres. It has been widely suggested that these stemmed from two courses. First of all, in Londonderry, it has been said that the disorders arose from the decision of the Northern Ireland Government to allow the Apprentice Boys' March to proceed there on 12th August. It has been suggested, with the benefit of hind-sight, that this was an irresponsible decision, taken in the face of pressures to which we ought not to have yielded.

The fact of the matter, however, is that although various people expressed some anxiety about the proposed march, absolutely no evidence came to hand of plans either to behave violently on the march or to mount violent opposition to it. Over the days leading up to it, we discussed the situation with a considerable number of representative bodies. None of them suggested a ban; indeed their concern was to find ways in which they could contribute to a peaceful outcome. In a striking demonstration of the community's desire for peace, representatives of the Bogside area met representatives of the Apprentice Boys. The clear message coming to us out of Londonderry was that every responsible element in the City wanted to achieve a day free from any sort of disorder.

It is so easy to be wise after the event. Had we known that, behind this peaceful facade, extreme militant elements were secretly making careful preparations for trouble, we might have arrived at a different decision. But those who were so violent in their words and actions over the days following 12th August were very careful to conceal these preparation before the event. And what you have got to remember is that the law permits a parade to proceed unless serious public disorder is anticipated. The cancellation of an annual demonstration which had always been orderly and well-conducted could only have been justified by positive evidence of serious trouble brewing. I repeat, we did not have such evidence.

So much for the alleged specific cause of trouble in Londonderry. But we have also seen it argued that a more general cause of the disorders, both there and in Belfast, has been the slowing-down or reversal of reforms to which my predecessor's Government was committed.

That is absolutely and monstrously untrue. On 21st May with my colleagues I went to see Harold Wilson, and I outlined to him in precise detail our intentions in relation to reform, giving the precise time-table we intended to follow, including the enactment of various major pieces of legislation in the present Session of Parliament. The Prime Minister and the Home Secretary accepted the content and the pace of this programme as completely satisfactory. Here is what Mr. Wilson said at Westminster on 22nd May, 1969 (Hansard, column 669):–

> "What we are appealing for . . . . is an attempt to stop the feeling that reforms are more likely to be achieved by rioting in the streets or blowing up installations than by getting decisions in the Stormont Parliament, which is the legitimate place for them."

What a tragedy that his appeal went unheeded! And he continued:–

> "We shall of course . . . . press the Stormont Government to get on with these Measures. After yesterday's report, I am satisfied that they are determined to do so."

Since then we have not withdrawn or postponed a single proposal. Indeed, the only departure from our time-table has been to bring out in July proposals for local government reform which were originally not due until the Autumn. At my last meeting with the Home Secretary I again said that I trusted the content and pace of our reform programme remained satisfactory to the United Kingdom Government. He confirmed that this was so.

I ask myself why, in these circumstances, it should be put about that we are seeing here an uprising against an unjust and intransigent Government. I repudiate this utterly. It is said solely as part of a deliberate campaign to discredit and subvert this Government, whose basis, I would remaind you, is a parliamentary majority elected on "one man, one vote," just as at Westminster. The real cause of the disorder is to be found in the activities of extreme Republican elements and others determined to overthrow our State. That is why we have found it necessary to detain a considerable number of known and dangerous agitators.

The Chief of Staff of the I.R.A. has admitted that his organisation has been "giving leadership, helping with stones, petrol bombs and 'mark the words' other traditional methods of defence." I must say that attempting to set people and property on fire hardly strikes me as a defensive technique, and I would remind you again that the trouble in Belfast began with firing upon the police at widely-scattered locations within a short period of time. We have too open attempts to recruit Republican forces in the South for intervention here.

In this grave situation, the behaviour of the Dublin Government has been deplorable, and tailor-made to inflame opinion on both sides. The moving of Army units, the calling-up of reserves, the absurd approaches for United Nations intervention have all been moves of almost incredible clumsiness and ineptitude. I am glad to say that Dr. Hillery returned to his Department in Dublin from his visit to the Foreign Office after what he himself described as a polite but very firm brush-off. These manoeuvres in ordinary circumstances would be merely comic, but in the present inflamed atmosphere they represent a gamble with people's lives. I think that this is a very squalid business, and all that the Dublin Government has done is to convince us for all time that we must look elsewhere for our friends. We held out our hand to them as good neighbours. They have behaved much like those hooligans who have used the present troubles as an excuse to burn their neighbours out.

So much for the causes of disorders. I now turn to the methods by which we are coping with the situation, and the political and other implications of these methods. On 14th August, as you all know, we asked all available Special Constables to report to police stations. I have seen much criticism of our use of these police reserves. I ask you to put yourselves for a moment into the shoes of this Government. Disorder was mounting riots had taken place in ten different towns the night before; great damage was being done, lives were clearly at risk; the regular police forces were at the point of exhaustion. How could we have faced our consciences had we allowed such a situation to persist without calling in rapidly such reserves as were available to us?

There remained, of course, the Army. But the civil power has a clear duty to try to cope with a situation itself by all possible means before summoning military aid. To ask for military help is an extreme step, and it involves troops in the most disagreeable of tasks. Nevertheless, once the situation clearly deteriorated to the point where the civil power required assistance, we did not hesitate to seek it, and the response of the United Kingdom Government was swift and decisive. They have demonstrated, as we knew they would, that citizens in this part of the United Kingdom are entitled to no whit less protection than their fellow-citizens in Great Britain.

I would now like to say something about the deployment and management of troops in this situation. At least one newspaper today spoke of "muddle" in this context. There is no such muddle. Let me outline the arrangements operating. Starting yesterday morning representatives of the Army are meeting daily with representatives of the police and of the civil power. On the basis of intelligence reports the situation prevailing and anticipated is very fully assessed. Any evidence of likely disorder in any particular area is fed into the assessment. It is on this basis that the deployment of troops for the following 24 hours is decided. Their actual management within that role is of course a matter for their own commanders. If at any time the position revealed is one beyond the joint capacity of police and the Army at existing strength, machinery exists for the very rapid consideration of possible reinforcement. Let me make this very clear. The Army is here to assist the civil authority. The civil authority is not concealing anything from the Army nor is it taking any unilateral decisions about their deployment. The best joint use of troops and police is decided in full and regular consultation, on the best information about the overall situation available to both civil and military authorities. One saw this position operating yesterday in relation to the Ardoyne area of Belfast. Information about the situation in that area was fully considered within the joint machinery, and troops deployed yesterday evening.

Finally, let me deal with some of the consequences and implications of the of the situation. Here, too, there has been much comment and speculation. I have seen fairly widespread reports that we might be asked to consider a broadly-based coalition government here. First of all, no such suggestion has come to us from the United Kingdom Authorities, nor indeed could it come with any propriety. But let me deal with the suggestion at all events. In grave emergencies such as a state of war communities often draw together in a political coalition because the community of interest transcends ordinary divisions. There is, however, one absolutely essential prerequisite if a coalition is to succeed. However divided on means, its members must agree about vital ends. Otherwise it is likely to be a mere forum for wrangling and the reverse of firm or effective government. Here in Northern Ireland the position is that most of the political Opposition are opposed to the Government party on the most fundamental of all issues—the very existence of the State itself. How can one coalesce with people who one week demand a recall of Parliament and the next week, when it is recalled, stage an apparently carefully-prepared walkout? Government cannot ally itself with disruption.

I would emphasize that in ruling out a political coalition I am not rejecting other means of achieving a broadly-based support for a return to peace and a resumption of progress. Indeed we clearly must find means to bridge the divisions between moderate and responsible people of different outlook, if we are to cope effectively with extremists and irresponsibles of all kinds.

Secondly, I have seen speculation about serious constitutional consequences stemming from the deployment of troops in Northern Ireland. Now of course the committal here of forces which are responsible to the United Kingdom Government means that the normal consultation between the two Governments must become even more constant and intimate. This is already being done. We fully appreciate that the United Kingdom Government and the Westminster Parliament must be satisfied that troops are involved only in a setting about which they can be confident and that the situation had arisen through no failure or error of this Government. But some of the speculation goes further than this. It suggests that the United Kingdom Government should seek to involve itself deeply and directly in the affairs which are at the moment our primary concern. No one here would dispute the sovereign authority of Westminster to secure its will, but my colleagues and I believe that the existence of a responsible Government in this part of the United Kingdom is, not only, the course which most commends itself to a majority of Ulster people, but also the course which prevents Westminster becoming involved in a situation of which it was glad to be relieved almost 50 years ago.

Press release, 14 August 1969

Cardinal Conway returned to Armagh from holiday last night and immediately issued the following statement:

"In the present serious situation I appeal to every Catholic to do everything he can to avoid a further escalation of violence.

An extension of the present trouble would play straight into the hands of those—and of course they are a minority—who resent the very presence of Catholics in the community.

I appeal to Catholics not to allow themselves to be swept away by emotion—however natural and understandable such emotion may be—but to keep cool heads and realize that a general eruption of violence would seriously weaken the civil rights movement.

I appeal to those civil rights leaders who have striven long and hard to prevent an eruption of violence not to weary in their efforts. There is still an enormous amount of good will for the cause of non-violence among their supporters.

This is not the time to apportion precise responsibility for what has happened but certainly a heavy burden rests on those who remained silent for over forty years in the face of manifest injustice.

I feel bound to say also that I cannot understand why a parade—lasting five or six hours and accompanied by dancing women singing party songs and firing off miniature cannon—was allowed to take place last Tuesday in a city which was tinder-dry for an explosion.

Neither can I understand why the police authorities found it necessary to ask their men to force their way into the Bogside area where innocent people had been terrorized by some members of the police force on a number of earlier occasions. It is quite obvious that the memory of those earlier nights of terror is still very much alive and due cognisance should be taken of that fact.

There are many other things which I would like to say but for the present I refrain.

In the name of God who loves all men, Catholic and Protestant, Jew and Gentile, let no more wood be piled on this destructive fire."

Press release, 17 August 1969

Speaking in St. Patrick's Cathedral, Armagh, Cardinal Conway asked the prayers of the congregation for John Gallagher and for his wife, children and parents.

"Terrible things were done in Armagh and Belfast on last Thursday night," said the Cardinal, "and we cannot rest satisfied until the full facts of that 'Black Thursday' are brought into the full light of day.

Nevertheless it is our Christian duty to resist all thoughts of enmity. In the old catechism long ago, after being told that we must love our neighbour, the question was asked 'and who is my neighbour?' and the answer was 'Mankind of every description even those who injure us or differ from us in religion.' It is worth remembering that answer these days.

Moreover we must remember that the great majority of Protestants in Northern Ireland are God-fearing people and a great deal of the tension on their part at the present time comes not from hatred but from fear. The fact that we regard these fears as groundless does not make them any less real for them. Moreover a great many of them are, I believe, basically unaware of what is happening in their midst, unaware of how heartless some of the discrimination can be, unaware of the terror inflicted on innocent people. They read something of this in the newspapers but it is obscured by conflicting reports and unsubstantiated innuendoes. Only when one speaks to people who have direct experience of these things does one realize that it is all true.

At all events it is the clear duty of everyone to do everything possible at the present time to lessen tension, to banish all thoughts of revenge as Our Lord commanded us, to give all possible assistance to the homeless, to pray for the dead and those who mourn, and to pray also that a dawn of peace with justice may come."

Embargo: 12 midnight, Saturday 23 August 1969

The following statement has been issued after a meeting at Ara Coeli, Armagh:

The Cardinal Archbishop of Armagh and the Bishops of Derry, Clogher, Dromore, Kilmore and Down and Connor desire to give expression to their horror at the events which took place in Belfast and in Derry and other places in Northern Ireland last week.

They deeply regret that the true picture of these events has been greatly obscured by official statements and by the character of the coverage given in certain influential news media.

The fact is that on Thursday and Friday of last week the Catholic districts of Falls and Ardoyne were invaded by mobs equipped with machine-guns and other firearms. A community which was virtually defenceless was swept by gunfire and streets of Catholic homes were systematically set on fire.

We entirely reject the hypothesis that the origin of last week's tragedy was an armed insurrection.

We believe that a necessary pre-condition to any restoration of confidence on the part of the Catholic community must be an open recognition of these facts.

In this context we regret that the full evidence available regarding the actions of some members of the police, in the early hours of the morning, in the Bogside area of Derry last January, has never been made public. We are convinced that in the terror evoked in the people of Bogside on that night lies the basic explanation of recent events in Derry.

In this period of crisis we call upon all our people to remain calm and to avoid all words or actions which could in any way increase tension. We ask them not to allow bitterness or hatred to enter into their hearts, to remember that Protestants in general are good Christian people and to commence the re-building of the community relations with Christian faith and hope.

We ask all concerned to realize that among Catholics belief in the impartiality of the Ulster Special Constabulary is virtually non-existent. The future can hold out no hope whatever unless the whole community is able to trust the forces of law and order.

The tragedy of last week will take a long time to efface but it is the Christian duty of all of us to strive to efface it. Above all, we ask our people to pray and to have confidence in God, who is the God of love and peace.

Statement by the Taoiseach, Mr. J. Lynch, Wednesday the 13th August, 1969.

It is with deep sadness that you, Irishmen and women of goodwill and I have learned of the tragic events which have been taking place in Derry and elsewhere in the North in recent days. Irishmen in every part of this island have made known their concern at these events. This concern is heightened by the realisation that the spirit of reform and intercommunal co-operation has given way to the forces of sectarianism and prejudice. All people of goodwill must feel saddened and disappointed at this backward turn in events and must be apprehensive for the future.

The Government fully share these feelings and I wish to repeat that we deplore sectarianism and intolerance in all their forms wherever they occur. The Government have been very patient and have acted with great restraint over several months past. While we made our views known to the British Government on a number of occasions both by direct contact and through our diplomatic representative in London, we were careful to do nothing that would exacerbate the situation. But it is clear now that the present situation cannot be allowed to continue.

It is evident, also, that the Stormont Government is no longer in control of the situation. Indeed the present situation is the inevitable outcome of the policies pursued for decades by successive Stormont Governments. It is clear, also, that the Irish Government can no longer stand by and see innocent people injured and perhaps worse.

It is obvious that the R.U.C. is no longer accepted as an impartial police force. Neither would the employment of British troops be acceptable nor would they be likely to restore peaceful conditions—certainly not in the long term. The Irish Government have, therefore, requested the British Government to apply immediately to the United Nations for the urgent despatch of a Peace-keeping Force to the 6 Counties of Northern Ireland and have instructed the Irish Permanent Representative to the United Nations to inform the Secretary-General of this request. We have also asked the British Government to see to it that police attacks on the people of Derry should cease immediately.

Very many people have been injured and some of them seriously. We know that many of these do not wish to be treated in 6 County hospitals. We have, therefore, directed the Irish Army authorities to have field hospitals established in County Donegal adjacent to Derry and at other points along the border where they may be necessary.

Recognising, however, that the re-unification of the national territory can provide the only permanent solution for the problem, it is our intention to request the British Government to enter into early negotiations with the Irish Government to review the present constitutional position of the 6 Counties of Northern Ireland.

These measures which I have outlined to you seem to the Government to be those most immediaetly and urgently necessary.

All men and women of goodwill will hope and pray that the present deplorable and distressing situation will not further deteriorate but that it will soon be ended firstly by the granting of full equality of citizenship to every man and woman in the 6-County area regardless of class, creed or political persuasion and, eventually, by the restoration of the historic unity of our country.

Copy of the I.R.A. political and military plan

Received by R.U.C. Mid-1968 from A.1 source

1. It is of fundamental importance that the movement assume an organisational form that will attract back people of National outlook in the Trade Union Movement so that their efforts can be co-ordinated.

The Movement needs:

(a) A radical Social and Economic programme.

(b) An organisation of representatives in the Trade Union movement whose function it would be to examine Trade Union Law and structure with a view to making the Trade Unions more revolutionary, and, to draw up directives for Volunteers on the subject of Trade Unionism. This organisation should be in the form of a "staff", not necessarily a branch of G.H.Q., but under the control and direction of the Chief of Staff.

(c) To make the fullest use of experts to lecture to Republicans on Trade Union, Economic and other subjects.

2. Due to the failure of our own organisational structure to cope with the changed environment and strategy, the organisational form whereby agitational work has been carried out has been the 'ad-hoc Committee'. This form of organisation suffers from defects; lack of discipline and lack of co-ordination of effort being the principal ones.

Formal committees should be set up to cover various fields and to work for short term limited objectives. These committees will have terms of reference and will be under the direction of the Army Department.

There should be formal committees dealing with housing questions, Free Trade, co-operativism, etc. These committees will work with other radical-minded groups such as the labour Party people, Trade Union people, etc. These committees to have such an organisational structure to enable them to mobilise the mass of the membership of the Movement in any agitation.

3. SINN FEIN has failed to develop an active local organisational structure and only marginal success has been achieved in attempting to integrate the efforts of S.F. and the Army and Sinn Fein in educational work. The bulk of educational work is now being carried on within the Army framework and is not effectively reaching S.F. people who are non-Army people. The committees mentioned in Paragraph 2 will have as their task the education of Sinn Fein people and Sinn Fein people will be involved on the Committees. It is hoped that the Committees in educating the S.F. people at local level will bring about the desired rejuvenation in Sinn Fein. The Army will backbone this effort and will see that the "push" comes in Sinn Fein from the bottom or from local area level. Sinn Fein as a body will confine itself to Publicity and Election Work.

4. If the minds of the Irish people are to be influenced in any significant numbers towards national objectives, it is going to be necessary to reform the structure of the Movement in order to reach them. This alteration will be effected through the Committees which have been mentioned in previous paragraphs.

5. The present form of recruit training will be changed. This change will replace the emphasis now placed on arms and battle tactics to a secondary position and be replaced by an emphasis on Social and Economic objectives. It is felt that a recruit graduating from recruits class finds that there is a lot of unromantic and possibly boring work to be done before he gets a chance to use his military training. This accounts for the high turnover in membership at present; the recruit having seen emphasis laid on military activity is not prepared for the political activity which must come before it.

The Director of Education will be instructed to re-draft recruits lectures so that the content thereof will reflect more the present goals of the Army. The training will be on the basis of the main task being to back up and consolidate revolutionary action initiated legally, rather than to initiate actions illegally relying on the political organisations to 'explain it away', as has been the case heretofore. Therefore the Army shall develop political activity as much as possible and this will be extended legally as far as possible. Extra-legal should follow only on political activity.

It will be necessary to train some specialist groups in techniques for the harrassment of the military, preferably from areas of likely action so as to make use of local knowledge, the classic guerilla trump card.

ORGANISATIONAL PRINCIPLES

A. The basic movement will be a political national and social-revolutionary organisation with an open membership and legal existence. Recruitment to be to this alone, on the basis of the appeal of the Social and Economic programme and the practical local work to these sections of the people who are most damaged by 'the connection'.

B. The basic Unit of the Movement to be the local Cumann and where possible in industrial areas the factory Cumann. This to meet monthly and to set up within its membership specialist groups of activists devoted to giving leadership to the local people or to the factory workers on issues affecting their interests.

C. Thus, a local Cumann might have a Tenants' Association Group, a youth group, a credit union group, a co-op group, etc. A factory Cumann would have groups oriented towards the shop floor, the administrative staff, the technical staff, etc. These groups would be dynamos generating local and specialised Republican leadership in all areas of the peoples needs. They would equally act as a training ground for revolutionary government. The transition from the gun to politics in the past has omitted this training procedure and has therefore resulted in the Fianna Fail and Clann na Poblachtq processes setting in.

D. These specialised groups would report back to their monthly Cumann meeting, which would be used for co-ordination of local events and educational work in the relationship between the local work and the overall national strategy, so that each Cumann would feel part of a general picture.

E. The groups would have the right to involve non-members in their specialist activity. This would be the basic channel for recruitment.

FS-1 . 395

F. Quarterly regional conferences would enable activity on a national basis to be co-ordinated. Regions with similar problems would be defined, such as the Six Counties and Dublin.

G. An annual National Conference would be the policy deciding body. Quarterly executive meetings would hear reports from the quarterly regional conferences and would formulate short-term policy. A National Standing Committee would meet weekly to give rapid decisions in the light of general policy.

H. The Army to retain its own organisational structure and to function within the revolutionary organisation as a back-bone. Army recruits to be chosen from the best and most conscious members of the organisation. Under no circumstance should the Army recruit from outside on the basis of the emotional appeal of arms. The Army to give leadership within the organisation by the fact of its being composed of the most advanced elements within it, rather than by weight of numbers.

I. The Army Convention to continue as a policy-making body, but this role to be played down in proportion as the basic policy decisions are seen to be made correctly, openly and unity by the National Conference. The current position that the Ard Fheis is a rubber-stamp for the Convention is an imposition on the many sound people in S.F. The role of the Army Convention should evolve towards that of a specialist conference of certain people in the Movement for examining technical problems connected with the military aspect of the revolution. The ARMY COUNCIL will continually review this position.

J. The Constitution to be drafted in such a way as to allow for affiliation of friendly organisations, giving the possibility of having a vast and diversified movement under the Republican umbrella. Affiliations to be accepted from Trade Unions, Felons Clubs, co-operatives, Wolfe Tone Societies and all such bodies with objectives that do not conflict with the objectives of the Movement. Affiliations to be possible both regionally, locally and nationally. Consult with heads of such groups to make their objectives part of national objective.

K. Election contests should be avoided until our people are equipped to give a good account of themselves. This applies to ALL elections. It will be necessary to wait until a basis has been laid on local work to give SUBSTANTIAL support in the first attempt. The timing of this decision to be a policy matter and not one of principle. Selection of areas to be contested and candidates for local elections should be decided on above basis.

L. When our strength is sufficient Dail elections will be contested. Stormont elections should be likewise, the question of the Oath to be considered when necessary.

M. The elected representatives of the people, North and South, will meet and set up a National Parliament.

N. M.Ps. and T.Ds. to meet nationally at a central place during Parliamentary recess and proceed to legislate for the whole country, starting with Laws capable of enforcement by social pressure, recognising that an actual State power was not yet in existence. By degrees a dual government situation would state power. Eventually a law would be passed, [illegible]ly relating to the sequestration of foreign property, which would bring [illegible]wo State structures into head-on conflict. This would be the signal for the completion of the job by military action (e.g., occupying the factory concerned in the name of the Republic).

MILITARY PLAN

Stages:

1. Anti-agent campaign (start immediately).
2. Large stunt-type operations.
3. Escalation.
4. Final phase (Agricultural and Industrial sabotage to take place at this stage).
5. Opportunity to kidnap prominent British Government members should be availed of when it arises. (Publicity).

1. (a) This type of operation not to be done publicly but quietly.
   (b) Commence immediately but to be phased in such a way as not to excite maximum retaliation from the enemy.

The idea is to prepare the way for a compaign, to clear away some of the existing obstacles and to harden our people and organisation to police pressure. To get our people psychologically prepared for future killing.

The victims of this campaign do not have to be Special Branch but may be the ordinary policeman who is active as an agent against us.

THIS STAGE IS ESSENTIAL.

- - - - - - - - - - -

2. This type of operation should not commence until the men we have now are fully trained and evaluated according to their individual abilities.

This type of operation should and must be of a purely 'killing nature' designed to inflict as many fatal casualties on the British as possible. It should be confined completely to British Army personnel.

SETTING UP OF SPECIAL UNIT FOR STUNT . . TYPE OPERATIONS . .

A.

Unit to be composed of specialised sections from different parts of the country, i.e., Thompson Section from Dublin, Rifle Section from Limerick, Bren Section from Dundalk, Engineers from Cork, etc.

B.

Reasons for this regionalisation:

(1) Avoiding the concentration of an elite in one area will circumvent to a great extent the danger of a split.

(2) Also, by spreading the activities of these special sections over the entire country, the danger of police observation will obviate to a great degree.

G-S 1 . 369

drawal [illegible]se men from their areas for the purpose of an operation will not [illegible]y down the attention of the police as would the absence of sixty men from (say) Dublin city.

TRAINING AND ORGANISATION OF SPECIAL UNIT

(1) Selection: Selection for membership of Special Unit will be made after an intensive three week course in basic military skills and requirements. Such a course would consist of (a) Footdrill, (b) Fitness, (c) Weapons and, using a points system, 5 points will be apportioned for fitness, 2½ each for Footdrill and Weapons.

Footdrill: is essential for the development of team-spirit and co-ordination and for the instillation of obedience to orders. Time allotted to this: 48 hours.

Fitness is so much stressed, because it gives a man tremendous self-confidence together with a reliance on himself alone. Time allotted to this – 48 hours.

Weapon training will consist of:

Rifle	–	5 hours
Bren	–	7 hours
Thompson	–	6 hours
Shortarms	–	4 hours
Grenade	–	4 hours

It is recommended that a detailed training schedule on the lines laid down be drawn up and given to carefully selected units in the 26 County area. So that the Special Unit may be assembled at the earliest possible moment, it is recommended that the programme be distributed on a staggered system. On completion of two weeks of the programme, Unit 'a' will be joined by the pre-selected staff of the Special Unit who will take part in the final week of training, during which they will select the men deemed most suitable for further specialist training. By the end of the three week period with Unit 'A', Unit 'B' will have reached the third week of its training and will be joined by the Staff. And so on until the selection process is finished.

- - - - - - - - - - -

ADVANCED TRAINING FOR SELECTED MEN

D.

(1) Weapon training and physical training will be performed in the men's home areas.

(2) H.Q. will be responsible for arranging camps, etc. at which the various sections may be co-ordinated to produce an efficient Unit.

It would be best to divide the 60 man Unit into two Platoons, one for cover, the other assault. This would make for smaller camps with less difficulty in organisation.

An increase in scale and frequency of activities o[illegible]ed in 1 and 2.

(A small outlay of effort in the carrying out of point 1 will show us at relatively little cost in men, what is the real strength of our Northern organisation in terms of determination, and, especially, security.)

Should it happen that the organisation does not stand under pressure, then we will have ascertained this fact without gambling the total organisation. If burned, we can draw back.

ORGANISATION IN SIX COUNTIES

Recognising the fact that our campaign will be fought in the Six-County area, we believe that the structure, organisation and control of the Army in that area is unsound for campaign conditions the nature of which is envisaged.

Due to the limited area of operation, the density and hostility of population, the vast array of police and other parliamentary and military forces under the control of the enemy, we believe that classic guerrilla type operations cannot be successful. Here we must learn from the Cypriots and engage in terror tactics only.

Assuming that terror is to be our weapon, we must create an organisation capable of seeing such a campaign through. Hence, the following recommendations:

SECURITY

If we use terror tactics it seems reasonable to assume that the enemy will not flinch against using torture against a captured Republican or suspected terrorist. To believe that police would maintain ordinary interrogation techniques is unrealistic. The use of torture in interrogation will doubtless result in the police gaining information. It is our business that the greatest number of people have protection in the case of a breakdown. The only way to ensure this is by limiting the circle of knowledge of any Volunteer to the absolute minimum.

As it is envisaged that the type of operation to be carried out will be of an anti-personnel and sabotage nature, it is apparent that the basic unit will consist of not more than four men. This would mean that anyone breaking down under interrogation can only squeal on three men at the worst. The situation which should be aimed at is one in which an area can have a number of such Units. In this way it would be possible to have one in action and the others held in reserve.

CONTROL to be vested in one man, e.g., in Belfast.

Say 32 Units of 4 men in each.

Say 4 such Units based in each postal district in Belfast.

One man to be in charge of each such district.

Each such district leader to be responsible to G.H.Q. Agent in Belfast.

A courier system to be used by Commander for co-ordination of activity in various areas.

It should be ensured that leaders should only be in control of districts within easy reach of where they live and where they are in complete touch and masters of the situation and can move without arousing suspicion (i.e., in their own areas). Units should be organised in factories, jobs, clubs, etc.,

P.R.O. 393

operation is p[illegible]ed men do not have to go about [illegible] holding meeti[illegible]etc.

Because of the nature of operations, weapons necessary would be small arms, Grenades and in certain cases Thompsons. The size of the unit will mean that only a small quantity of such equipment will be needed. Thus the following advantages will apply: easy to store, police can only capture small quantity and cannot make great publicity of it. If, for example, an operation necessitates the use of a grenade: a man can carry it easily to the scene, he can throw it and then walk away. The same would apply to sabotage equipment, gelignite, molotovs, etc. The weapon is carried to the scene and left there.

ORGANISATION OF UNITS

(1) At the initial stage it will be necessary to use known men who can be seen to be capable of being discreet. The present Recruiting Officers to be detailed to hand over lists of recruits to man appointed to organise secret Units. Latter to examine lists and to use Recruits found suitable for secret Units. In this way Recruiting Officer will consider people taken from list to have been found unsuitable. Therefore secrecy will be maintained from the very beginning.

NOTE: Pure border areas, i.e., in Counties in Free State, to be organised in secret Units similar to those in the Six Counties.

Organisation would therefore take the following form:

Six Counties: Secret small Units.

Twenty-six Counties: Provision of Shock Unit for special operations of a purely military character as outlined in Section 2.

REPLIES TO QUESTIONS RAISED

COUP D'ETAT. Not possible because:

1. Loyalty of Officer-class soldiers, who are drawn principally from the lower-middle and middle classes, to the State.
2. The strength of the F.S. Army and Police will always increase in ratio to the strength of the I.R.A.
3. There is no tradition of 'coups d'etat' in this country. Some of the British respect for constitutional institutions has rubbed off.
4. The Church.

COUP D'ETAT. Conditions for:

A. Proper Infiltration of Police and Military.
B. Propaganda aimed at undermining loyalty to state.
C. The developing political situation as outlined in Plan may mean that Coup d'Etat in one of its forms may become necessary.

Security in the case of agitation needing extra-lega... vity to be taken care of by holding a number of men in reserve in each area for such activity.

Assassination

Open assassinations to be performed in situations such as Divis Street riots. Informers also to be assassinated openly. Quiet assassinations for police: silencers, poison darts, etc., can be used with effect here.

Spectacular Kidnaps:

To be used especially to secure hostages in the event of executions of Republicans.

Selective Internment: This cannot be guarded against.

Easter: If North creates another Divis Street.

Retaliatory action to be taken against selected (agent type) R.U.C. men. Military action against the British Army should also be considered.

Full-time men: Unknown men to be maintained in fighting areas to carry out squad type jobs.

Equipment: 10 Ton Plastic Explosive. Timing devices, 5,000 Grenades, 1,000 Shortarms (9 mm. or ·45 automatic). 1,000,000 rounds of revolver ammo. 200 Automatic Rifles (F.N.). 100,000 rounds of Rifle ammo. 300 Bazookas and 3,000 shells.

SCARMAN TRIBUNAL DOCUMENT

"The document presented to the Scarman Tribunal in Belfast on May 21, which was alleged to be an "I.R.A. military plan" was never in fact more than a draft for discussion purposes.

"It was claimed at the Tribunal that it came into the possession of the Stormont regime from an "A.1. source" in mid-1968. The facts are that this document together with a political draft were captured by 26-County police in May 1966, before either document could be discussed, much less adopted as policy.

"The political part was published in the Dublin daily papers by the 26-County government one week subsequent to its seizure. The military part was withheld from publication for "security reasons." Both documents remained drafts; they never became policy.

"The factual position then, is that the document produced at the Scarman Tribunal was never I.R.A. policy. From May 1966 it was in the hands of the 26-County government. It is apparent that Stormont's "A.1. source" is the Dublin Government and that the document was handed over in mid-1966 and not 1968 as claimed."

Copy report dated 18th August from R.U.C. to Ministry of Home Affairs

18th August, 1969.

Dear

You request for the Minister this evening an appreciation of I.R.A. and Republican involvement at this moment of time in our present disorders.

It is impossible to do this properly due to shortage of time and operational interruptions so I am compelled to attach a number of Xerox-copy appendices which I am afraid the Minister will have to peruse himself. Most of it is already in the Ministry. I regret having to put it this way.

It would be absurd to say the present situation has been brought about solely by the machinations of the Movement, but a quick look at some of the appendices will show that the tactics employed over the past year are laid down or find a place in their official documents.

What has happened in fact is that the I.R.A./Republican Movement have infiltrated and been manipulating the Civil Rights organisation with great energy the speed of success of the latter in producing the present conditions in the streets has caught the I.R.A. largely unprepared in the military sense. At this moment of time their Units are on 'active service' and they have been responsible for numerous recent 'actions'. In Belfast and Derry those we failed to collect for internment are inaccessible but armed behind the barricades or otherwise 'on the run'.

A brief historical note is relevant.

In the Autumn of 1965 Johnston's Connollyite/Communist planning policies commenced, culminating in the present "Ireland To-day" which is approaching the finalising stages. Unlike previous I.R.A. campaigns of military action first, political action to follow, Johnston's plans are—political agitation first and when the people are indoctrinated and ready—then military action.

Johnston attended the first Annual General Meeting of Civil Rights in Belfast in February, 1968, when some 30 of an attendance of 70 were known Republicans or I.R.A.

A Republican confidential document of September, 1968 laid down some guide-lines for their participation in Civil Rights. These included Civil Disobedience and the now familiar demonstration tactics. In this, as in "Ireland To-day," we find not only participation from within but an alliance of convenience with all things radical without and contributing to the downfall of the Establishment—but the final solution, politically and militarily, a purely Republican one resulting in a 32-County Socialist Republic in the Connolly tradition.

Portions of the Movement's political plan were actually read out in the Dail but details of the military plan were suppressed. You will, however, find these in the appendices.

At the end of May of this year it was reported to Sinn Fein Headquarters (A.1 source) that members of Republican Clubs now controlled two-thirds of the executives of all local Civil Rights Associations in Northern Ireland. The present executive of the N.I.C.R.A. has a membership of fourteen of whom six are members of the Republican Movement.

The I.R.A. and Sinn Fein openly admit that their role at Civil Rights Demonstrations has been that of stewards and marshals, being particularly suitable for that duty because of their discipline. They have in fact been observed in scores performing those duties.

A more sinister function, Republican inspired and dominated from inception, was the appearance in recent months of Civil Rights vigilante committees and Citizens' Defence committees in Belfast, Londonderry, Newry, Lurgan, etc. These local bodies, as stated, were all Republican and I.R.A. dominated. Their outward and publicly announced policies were "peaceful" and for the "protection" of local communities. We now know, to our cost, vide Derry, that under this cloak of peace they were in fact preparing for war.

We now come to the shootings in Belfast a few nights ago. This commenced in a number of places when police patrols were fired on with machine guns and rifles from Nationalist areas. A number of police were injured and civilians killed. We know this was I.R.A. action, but identification of the Units responsible has not yet been established.

I referred earlier to the I.R.A's unpreparedness for the current situation. Reliable sources report a shortage of arms. Their command system behind the barricades in the City is weak and lacks cohesion due to our swoop and detention of a number of their top men.

I conclude with a paragraph just placed before me from a top reliable source: That 12 I.R.A. (3 from each of the four Northern Commands) attended a training course two weeks ago in Eire on Thompson Machine Guns, short arms, grenades and manufacturing Molotov Cocktails. It is not clear if a similar course for last week-end took place in view of the situation. The same source reports in the past week I.R.A. Units in Belfast, Londonderry and Newry were making hundreds of petrol bombs and a number of home-made grenades. They were also instructing local people in the use of petrol bombs through the Citizens' Defence Committees.

Yours sincerely,

MINUTE OF APPOINTMENT

I hereby appoint:

BARON HUNT, C.B.E., D.S.O., Chairman.

SIR JAMES ROBERTSON, C.B.E.

ROBERT MARK, Esq., Q.P.M.

to be an Advisory Committee to examine the recruitment, organisation, structure and composition of the Royal Ulster Constabulary and the Ulster Special Constabulary and their respective functions and to recommend as necessary what changes are required to provide for the efficient enforcement of law and order in Northern Ireland.

And I further appoint Mr. A. S. Baker, O.B.E., D.F.C., of the Home Office and Mr. J. V. Morrison of the Ministry of Home Affairs to be assessors to the Committee and Mr. A. P. D. Westhead to be Secretary to the Committee.

To THE RIGHT HONOURABLE ROBERT WILSON PORTER, Q.C., M.P., Minister of Home Affairs,
The Government of Northern Ireland.

DEAR MINISTER,

In accordance with your minute of appointment dated 26th August, 1969, we submit our Report on the Royal Ulster Constabulary and the Ulster Special Constabulary. We have completed our mission in the shortest possible time compatible with giving adequate consideration to the principal problems, being conscious of the urgency of clarifying the future pattern for the enforcement of law and order and the responsibility for the protection of the Province, which we regard as an essential step towards resolving the present situation.

Within the limited time available it has not been possible to make as detailed an examination as we would have wished. Indeed, in less serious circumstances we would have preferred to have several months at our disposal. We have, therefore, suggested procedures by which a number of matters which came to our notice and upon which we formed preliminary views may be resolved after further examination.

That the task was possible at all is due in no small measure to the splendid co-operation we have received from your Ministry, from the Inspector-General and all ranks in the Royal Ulster Constabulary and the Ulster Special Constabulary, and the readiness of many others outside the police force to give us the benefit of their views.

We wish to record our deep appreciation of the services to our Committee of our Assessors, Mr. Victor Morrison and Mr. Alec Baker, and our Secretary, Mr. Patrick Westhead. Our two typists, Miss Madeline Thompson and Miss Edna Caldwell, did a magnificent job in typing the many drafts leading to this final Report.

We would emphasize that this Report represents our unanimous opinions. Furthermore it is our conviction that nothing less than the full implementation of the proposals it contains, within the shortest time possible, can suffice to lay a sound foundation for the good order and security of the Province.

It has been a privilege to render this service to Northern Ireland.

Yours sincerely,

John Hunt.

Co. Antrim.

CHAPTER 1

General Considerations about our Mission

Our Mission

1. On Tuesday, 26th August 1969, we were appointed by the Minister of Home Affairs of the Government of Northern Ireland to 'examine the recruitment, organisation, structure and composition of the Royal Ulster Constabulary and the Ulster Special Constabulary and their respective functions and to recommend as necessary what changes are required to provide for the efficient enforcement of law and order in Northern Ireland.'

2. The importance and urgency of this task was impressed upon us in view of the situation following the disorders earlier in the month. After a visit by the Home Secretary of the Government of the United Kingdom on 7th September the hope was expressed that our report might be available in time for it to be discussed with him early in October, when he is to make a second visit to the Province.

3. Both on account of the speed with which so wide-ranging an enquiry had to be completed and of the nature of the task itself, we decided that our enquiries should be informal and confidential, that we should confine ourselves mainly to contacts and visits within the ambit of the Royal Ulster Constabulary and the Ulster Special Constabulary and that we should seek written evidence and opinion outside the police forces privately, rather than invite submissions from all sources. To have done otherwise would certainly have prolonged our mission far beyond the time-table which we have been set, without adding to the technical information upon which we would have to base many of our recommendations.

4. In the course of our examination we paid visits to the Headquarters of the Police Force at Brooklyn, to those at Belfast and Londonderry and in all the Counties. We visited a number of District Headquarters, sub-districts and police stations, including several stations on the border with the Republic of Ireland. We spent a day at the Training Depot in Enniskillen. During these tours we met and held informal discussions with many members of all ranks in the Royal Ulster Constabulary and the Ulster Special Constabulary. We received a memorandum from the Central Representative Body and met representatives of its County Consultative Committees. We had meetings with representatives of the District Commandants of the Ulster Special Constabulary and the Retired Police Officers' Association, with two former Inspectors-General and two former Deputy Inspectors-General. We take this opportunity to record our appreciation of the co-operation which we received from the Inspector-General and all ranks in the police.

5. Among our contacts outside the police force were the G.O.C., Northern Ireland, leaders of the Churches, the Lord Chief Justice and the Attorney General, representatives of the Bar Council and the Incorporated Law Society of Northern Ireland, chairmen and secretaries of the local authority associations, Chairmen of County Councils, Resident Magistrates, the Chairman and General Manager of the Londonderry Development Commission, representatives of the Northern Ireland Committee of the Irish Congress of Trade Unions, proprietors and editors of newspapers, representatives of the B.B.C. and Ulster Television, the Vice-Chancellors of both Universities and a number of other private citizens. We were privileged to be received by His Excellency the Governor and to visit the former Governor, Lord Erskine. Had time permitted, we would have wished to consult many others.

6. The magnitude and complexity of the undertaking, necessarily compressed into so short a period, intensive and concentrated though it has been, has compelled us to limit our studies to certain main questions which seemed to call for immediate decisions; but we have noted many other matters relating to the police forces which merit further consideration and which we believe to require changes and improvements. We have been able only to point to these matters, indicate the nature or direction of change and propose the procedure for further enquiry or action.

7. We have been able to bring to bear on the matters falling within our terms of reference a varied background of experience gained in other police forces in the United Kingdom and India, and during military operations elsewhere in aid of the civil power. But we are well aware that, for historical and other reasons, the particular problems in the enforcement of law and order in Northern Ireland have resulted in differences in the functions, organisation and control of the forces here. These differences have enjoined caution upon us in applying our own experience to the problems in the Province, and we were aware of the danger of drawing conclusions based on 'sand-table' exercises; but we have borne firmly in mind the fact that it is the future which we were invited to consider.

General Considerations

8. It is a truism that the police forces in any country operate within the context and in the climate of the political conditions and stability of that country. Their task of enforcing law and order is inevitably affected by social, economic and other circumstances arising out of these general conditions; it must perforce be more onerous in an unstable situation. We feel it desirable to make this obvious point, in view of the special difficulties under which the police have operated in the past, which may persist in the Province in the future, which are not the making of the police themselves, and which make their task at times both difficult and distasteful.

9. In particular, we would point to the growing cult of violence in society, the increasing tendency of a minority to flout the law, undermine authority and create anarchy. This trend is not peculiar to Northern Ireland, for its instigators latch on to any pretext wherever they can find one to exploit; to some extent it is a symptom of a general malaise among youth. We have taken carefully into account the need to ensure that changes in the police force are made with a view to enabling it the better to perform its duties, in the light not only of those troubles which have been a particular feature in the history of Northern Ireland, but also of the more recent agitations which are more widespread.

10. However, we are convinced that the police force can and should play a leading part, not only in enforcing law and order, but in helping to create a new climate of respect for the law, a new attitude of friendship between its members and the public, and a sense of obligation among all men of goodwill to co-operate with the police in fulfilling their civic duties in the Province, notwithstanding any wider political aspirations which they may have. Our principal recommendations are framed with a view to enabling both the police and the citizens of Ulster to move towards a better relationship with one another in order to achieve this common need and purpose.

11. Our proposals offer a new image of the Royal Ulster Constabulary as a civil police force, which will be in principle and in normal practice an unarmed force, having the advantage of closer relationships with other police forces in Great Britain. Our recommendations further advocate some measures to make the Royal Ulster Constabulary more accountable to the public, and others which should enable it to develop closer relationships with the community. As regards those tasks of a para-military nature which the Royal Ulster Constabulary has shouldered since its inception, we make proposals which would relieve it of this responsibility.

12. In the light of these changes we hope that there will be, in future, many more people in the community, whether they be Catholics, Protestants or of any other faith and denomination, as well as those who hold no religious beliefs, who will now be willing to join in active support of the police in their necessary and difficult job.

13. We have been most concerned by the harm which, during the disturbances in the past twelve months, has been done to the image of the Royal Ulster Constabulary, not only in the Province but in the eyes of the world, resulting in some lowering of morale among members of the force, and loss of public esteem. Allegations against some police officers, albeit mainly in circumstances of severe stress and provocation, at times under attack from that appalling weapon, the petrol bomb, against which they had no defence, are not a matter for comment by ourselves. But we cannot stress too strongly the catastrophe which must befall any society which ceases to respect the rule of law or takes the law into its own hands.

14. We feel bound to deplore the extent to which some press and television coverage of these events has resulted in magnifying, in the minds of readers and viewers, the actual extent of the disorders, in generalising the impression of misconduct by the police and of bad relations between police and public, while sometimes failing correspondingly to illustrate the calm which has prevailed in most parts of Ulster, or the degree of deliberate provocation, the danger and the strain under which the police, frequently and for long periods, tried to do their duty, as well as the fact that the great majority acted not only with courage but with restraint. Such impressions may, as in this instance, do harm to the future maintenance of law and order and the restoration of confidence upon which this so largely rests. We wish to take this opportunity to correct the perspective.

15. We make these observations, not to criticise, but to draw attention to a general matter and its effect on the problem of Northern Ireland. This is the power and the weakness of mass media and modern communications, which rightly focus attention on grave problems, but outside the ambit of those problems, also tend to enlarge and confuse rather than clarify these complex issues in the minds of people the world over, often in an attempt to simplify them. This in turn, has brought pressures to bear on those involved in the problems themselves which may make a solution more difficult. It has happened here.

16. None the less, it is undeniable that important changes are necessary in the police force of the Province and that it is essential to make these quickly. We emphasise the need to make these changes with firm resolve and courage. Some of them will cause breaks to be made with hallowed traditions; others will mean some personal sacrifice and an end to devoted and distinguished service. All the changes will call for a determination to look forward rather than backwards, and to have faith in the future. We believe that nothing less will suffice to make the police acceptable to all but wrongdoers; to help create a better relationship between all sections; to provide a more appropriate system of defending the Province from subversion, as well as for maintaining law and order.

17. We hope and believe that all ranks in the police force will set the example which is inherent in their calling, by co-operating in this difficult task. We feel encouraged by the fact that so many of those whom we met suggested or supported a number of the changes which we now advocate; we think that most of our proposals reflect widely-held views within the force.

18. We also believe that these reforms, while some of them are bound to cause misgivings in some people, will be widely accepted by reasonable men and women in Northern Ireland and we hope that the Government will endorse them accordingly.

19. There is one final point; it is perhaps the most important of all those which we have to make. We believe that the recommendations in this report will call for outstanding qualities of leadership to carry them out. There must be a conviction of the need for the changes and a due sense of urgency. There must also be an ability to appreciate the problems of Northern Ireland and the sensitivities of its people combined with a determination to chart a course towards the future, undeflected by the events of the past.

20. This is a great opportunity in the distinguished history of the Royal Ulster Constabulary to take a big step forward and meet the challenge of these difficult and changing times. We hope and believe that all ranks will seize this opportunity and that the Government of Northern Ireland will provide the essential means to do so.

CHAPTER 2

The Problems of Order and Internal Security

21. The problems of keeping the peace in Northern Ireland are peculiarly difficult because of the deep sectarian divisions of society, the part played over the years by the Irish Republican Army and its various splinter groups, and the militant character of the extreme Protestants. Recently two factors which are the causes of street disorder in other countries have made things yet more difficult: one is the anarchist and other groups of the extreme left, who seek to destroy the existing fabric of society; the other is a resurgence of violent hooliganism in the form of groups or gangs, mostly of youths, who intimidate innocent persons, and fight one another and the police.

22. Historical factors are important. Soon after Northern Ireland came into being it had to deal with rioting, arson and brutal killing on a large scale. For example, in three weeks in February, 1922, 138 casualties were reported—96 among Catholics, 42 among Protestants. The border was also under attack by the I.R.A. For most of 1922 the I.R.A. was fighting also against the Provisional Government in Dublin, in a civil war which lasted until May, 1923; but, for a short period in the Spring of 1922, because of the trouble in Northern Ireland, the I.R.A. was in alliance with the Provisional Government. Set against the I.R.A. were not only the British troops in Northern Ireland, but also the newly-formed Royal Ulster Constabulary and the Ulster Special Constabulary. In the circumstances it was natural that the R.U.C., on its formation from the Royal Irish Constabulary, should continue to be armed, and that the Ulster Special Constabulary should also be a military force.

23. The I.R.A. waged a further campaign of terrorism from 1956 to 1962. But it gained no public support and was defeated. Since then there has been little active terrorism, and the I.R.A. has concentrated on fomenting unrest. A move to the left in its leadership has brought it closer to the anarchist and other groups of the extreme left, working in concert with them in promoting trouble on the streets. These tendencies, allies and activities make the I.R.A. to-day an embarrassment to moderate Roman Catholics both North and South of the border. It is a pity that although the strength and methods of the I.R.A. and conditions North and South of the border have changed greatly since 1922 the memory of the early years is still fresh in many minds.

24. Public meetings and processions, which have a political as well as a religious significance, often provide the occasions when extremists or hooligans are able to provoke disorder and revive old feuds. For example, the serious rioting in Belfast in 1935, in which eleven people died and troops were used, started from a procession of the Orange Order. The more recent occasions are fresh in everyone's mind.

25. To-day the threat to public order arises from sectarian tension, which is fed and used by, on the one side, the Sinn Fein and I.R.A. organisations together with the revolutionary socialists; and, on the other, by t[illegible]rotestant extremists.

26. As to the future, the I.R.A. and the revolutionary socialists, using their position in the Civil Rights Association, seem likely to maintain civil rights pressure; and this will no doubt generate Protestant reaction. If the conflict between these forces, working upon the tensions in society, were again to re-create the explosive atmosphere of last August, and the I.R.A. terrorists were ready to take advantage of it, it is possible that they might resume attacks on police stations and customs posts, R.U.C. and British Army personnel, and key points where it is essential to protect buildings and other installations that are important for general welfare in heavily populated areas. It was noticeable that the I.R.A. were unprepared for such action last August.

27. It should not be inferred, from this assessment of the possible threat from terrorism, that terrorist attacks are likely. Indeed everyone hopes that the reforms already in hand and those still being planned will, by removing the causes of discontent, make it less likely that in the future extremists will be able to provoke disorder and so bring about the conditions in which terrorism can be effective. Moreover a realistic assessment of the capacity of the I.R.A. to mount serious terrorist attacks would probably not rate it very high, particularly as the Government of the Irish Republic has stated publicly that it is opposed to the use of force on the border. Even so, it is necessary to consider the worst that might happen, so that proper precautions can be taken; and although the threat of terrorist attacks may not be great, the fear of them is very real, and public anxiety will not be allayed unless precautions are taken and are seen to be taken.

28. To sum up: precautions against possible terrorist attacks, for the reasons given in this Chapter, must be taken; but the greatest threat to order in Northern Ireland is much more likely to be sectarian strife, stirred up by extremists on both sides.

Description of the Royal Ulster Constabulary

BRIEF HISTORY

29. In the interests of efficiency it was decided in the year 1836 to bring together all the constabulary forces then existing in Ireland and to place them under the control of a single officer with the title of Inspector-General. From that time onwards the country acquired a national force controlled by a single police authority. Local authorities were required to meet one half of the cost of police services but later they were relieved of that responsibility save in special circumstances. The force was called 'The Constabulary of Ireland' but later its title was changed to 'The Royal Irish Constabulary' when Her Majesty, Queen Victoria, honoured it in recognition of good services.

30. Following the passing of the Government of Ireland Act 1920 and the setting up of a separate Parliament for Northern Ireland, a Departmental Committee of Inquiry was set up by the then Minister of Home Affairs, Sir Dawson Bates, to inquire into the existing police organisation and to report on various matters. The Committee recommended that a new police force be established called the Ulster Constabulary, that the approval of His Majesty the King be sought to the use of the prefix 'Royal' in its title and that no attempt be made to organise the force on a local basis but as one force under a single command for the whole of Northern Ireland. It further recommended a strength not exceeding 3,000, one-third of which was to be recruited from the Roman Catholic faith, preference to be given to Roman Catholic members of the Royal Irish Constabulary and the then Special Constabulary Force.

31. Under the Constabulary Act (Northern Ireland) 1922, the Royal Ulster Constabulary was established. Section 1 (3) of that Act provides that existing enactments relating to the Royal Irish Constabulary, as modified by the Act of 1922, are applicable to the R.U.C. Control of the force is vested in the Inspector-General (the original title was retained) who is responsible to the Minister of Home Affairs for the maintenance of law and order in Northern Ireland.

32. The 1922 Act placed a statutory limit of 3,000 on the size of the R.U.C. which was later removed in the Constabulary Act (Northern Ireland) 1963. The size of the force is now determined by the Minister of Home Affairs with the approval of the Minister of Finance.

PRESENT ROLES

33. Like its predecessor the Royal Irish Constabulary, the R.U.C. has had to perform what is in fact a dual role. In addition to carrying out all those duties normally associated in the public mind with police forces elsewhere in the United Kingdom, it is responsible for security duties of a military nature.

RANKS—STRENGTH AND ESTABLISHMENT

34. The ranks in the force are—

Inspector-General
Deputy Inspector-General
Commissioner
County Inspector
District Inspector (of which there are three grades based on seniority)
Head Constable
Sergeant
Constable

35. The authorised establishment of the R.U.C. including women police was recently increased from 3,200 to 3,500. The recruited strength as at the 31st July 1969, was

	I.G.	D.I.G.	Comm.	C.I.	D.I.	H.C.	Sgt.	Con.	Total
Men . .	1	1	1	12	49	102	520	2,305	2,991
Women .	.	.	.	.	1	1	6	53	61
TOTAL .	1	1	1	12	50	103	526	2,358	3,052

These figures take no account of members of the Ulster Special Constabulary who have been mobilised for full-time duty with the R.U.C. These number some 425 men, 125 of whom were embodied during or prior to the period of I.R.A. activity which began in 1956 and have performed ordinary police duties alongside the R.U.C. for ten years or more. The remaining 300 have been mobilised since November 1968 to free members of the R.U.C. for crowd and riot control duties. They are on engagements of varied length up to two years. The distribution of the force is given in Appendix A.

ORGANISATION

36. For policing purposes Northern Ireland is divided into seven areas, the boundaries of which follow, with a few exceptions, the geographical boundaries of each of the six Counties and the County Borough of Belfast. In each County the police are under the command of a County Inspector; in Belfast, a City Commissioner. They are responsible to the Inspector General for the general administration and control of police work in their areas.

37. The areas are divided into Police Districts, each in charge of a District Inspector who, depending upon the size and policing complexities of the area, may have one or more Head Constables to assist him. In addition to being responsible to the County Inspector for the investigation of crime within his District, he also prosecutes on behalf of the Crown in the lower courts.

38. Districts in their turn are divided into Sub-Districts which, in the less populated rural areas, come under the command of a Sergeant but in the cities and surrounding areas and in the larger towns may have a Head Constable in charge. In normal times the complement of Constables in a rural station is three or four but a few two-man stations exist in what are regarded as quiet areas. Under present conditions stations which are considered liable to attack have had their strengths increased in case of such an eventuality.

39. The R.U.C. is controlled and administered from the Inspector General's Headquarters in Belfast at which are located administrative branches each with an overall responsibility on a functional basis.*

Crime Ordinary Branch

40. This Branch is concerned mainly with law enforcement and the investigation of crime.

41. In common with most areas of the United Kingdom, the crime rate in Northern Ireland continues to increase. In 1968 reported indictable crimes rose by 1,890 to 16,294 cases. The detection rate was 58.3 per cent.

42. About 70 per cent of all indictable crimes occur within a radius of twenty miles from the centre of Belfast with the result that police detectives, of whom there are some 150, are concentrated largely in Belfast and the adjacent Police Districts. The remainder are stationed in the city of Londonderry and at each County Headquarters. As far as lies within their power, the local police of the area in which a crime is committed are encouraged to solve it for themselves. If, however, detective or other assistance is needed, it is obtained from the County or Police Headquarters. Serious crimes must be reported at once to Police Headquarters which allocates photographers, fingerprint and forensic science experts to the area concerned.

Crime Special Branch

43. The duties of this Branch include the collection and evaluation of information which will assist in the identification of organisations and persons who may, by acts of sabotage or subversion, threaten the security of Northern Ireland. Until recently the Irish Republican Army and its various splinter groups provided the main threat to peace but since 1966 other elements, including Protestant extremists, have required and been given ever increasing attention.

44. It is the duty of Crime Special Branch to record its information in a form which will assist investigations and the preparation of a plan to counter the threat to security. The Branch is under the charge of a County Inspector and works in liaison with other intelligence agencies, including the Special Branch at New Scotland Yard.

Traffic Branch

45. This Branch consists of a County Inspector, a District Inspector, five Head Constables, twelve Sergeants and one hundred and forty-eight Constables.

46. In Belfast and in each County there is a traffic team under the control of a Head Constable or Sergeant (See Appendix 'A'). They are responsible for all traffic and safety matters in their areas to the City Commissioner or the County Inspector, as the case may be.

*Criminal statistics taken from the Report on the Administration of Home Office Services 1967 (Command 531) are reproduced for convenience in Appendix B.

Head Constable or District Inspector. The Inspector-General does, on occasions, waive the examination requirements when the interests of the Force demand it. A few vacancies in the ranks of Sergeant and Head Constable are filled by men with long service who have shown special proficiency.

63. Eligible members appear before a board for selection for higher rank. Promotions above District Inspector are made by the Inspector-General.

64. We understand that proposals have been made by the Inspector-General to the Minister of Home Affairs for the introduction of a scheme of accelerated promotion in the case of members who graduate whilst serving in the police force, and were told that seven members are currently attending Queen's University as full-time students and a number of others are taking external courses at London University. This year a Sergeant obtained an Honours Degree in Law, another sergeant obtained a degree in Social Science and a Constable was awarded a Diploma in Social Studies.

COMPLAINTS AND DISCIPLINE

65. Complaints against members are investigated if, after preliminary examination, it is considered that they may be well founded. The investigation is carried out by an officer of at least District Inspector rank, the object being to determine whether a breach of discipline has occurred. If it is felt that a statement by the accused member would be likely to throw light on the matter he may be asked to make one under caution.

66. If the complaint or report has been received from or involves a member of the public and preliminary investigations suggest that it is of a serious nature, it is referred to the Inspector-General who may appoint an officer from a different county to look into it.

67. On completion of the investigation the report is submitted, if the accused member holds the rank of District Inspector or above and if there appears to be a charge to answer, to the Deputy Inspector-General whose responsibility it is to set up a Court of Inquiry to hear the charge. If the complaint is against a Head Constable or lower rank the District Inspector will formulate a charge if he considers the evidence sufficient.

68. Minor matters of indiscipline may be disposed of without recourse to disciplinary proceedings by a member holding at least the rank of Sergeant, either by censure or admonition and without recourse to disciplinary proceedings.

69. All breaches of rules and regulations and offences against discipline may be investigated by Disciplinary Courts of Inquiry, but no Disciplinary Court of Inquiry can be held except under the authority of a warrant signed by the Inspector-General. A Court of Inquiry is made up of such officers and such ranks, as the Inspector-General may direct, but in every case the President must be of higher rank than the accused. Where the matter under investigation is of a serious nature and involves a complaint made by or affecting a member of the public, the Inspector-General will request the Attorney General to nominate a Barrister to be an additional member of the Court of Inquiry.

70. Members may, at [illegible] own expense, employ [illegible] their defence.

71. A Court of Inquiry affecting internal discipline is not open to the public unless the Inspector-General so directs. Where a member of the public is affected the Inspector-General must authorise a public hearing unless it is considered undesirable for security reasons. The President of the Court transmits the record of proceedings and the decision to the Inspector-General. The Inspector-General may then impose any of the punishments listed in the Regulations. The member concerned is entitled to appeal to the Minister against both the finding and the punishment of the Court but must submit a concise statement of the grounds on which he desires to appeal and send a copy to the Inspector-General. The Minister may allow the appeal, dismiss it or vary the punishment by substituting some other punishment, whether more or less severe, than that imposed by the Inspector-General.

72. Breaches of the rules and regulations and offences against discipline may also be investigated by other Courts at the instance of the Minister of Home Affairs.

73. In 1967, 1968 and this year to date the number of alleged offences dealt with by disciplinary inquiry were 20, 15 and 25 respectively. In addition three members were charged with criminal offences (other than traffic offences not involving death) in 1968 and two this year up to now.

74. The Constabulary and Police (Ireland) Act 1919 as applied by the Constabulary Act (N.I.) 1922 provides for the establishment of a representative body (or bodies) in accordance with rules made by the Minister of Home Affairs, to consider and bring to the notice of the Inspector-General and the Minister all the matters affecting the members of the Force as regards their welfare and efficiency, other than questions of discipline and promotion affecting individuals.

75. Any body thus formed is empowered to represent all or each of the ranks below that of Deputy Inspector-General provided it consists of representatives, elected by the members of the rank or ranks represented, from amongst their number in the manner prescribed by the rules. Any representative body thus formed is required to be independent of and unconnected with any organisation or person outside the R.U.C.

76. In pursuance of these provisions, rules have been made by the Minister which have resulted in the setting up of:

(a) Consultative Committees in each County and in Belfast, representing the ranks of Constable, Sergeant and Head Constable with the responsibility of—

(i) ascertaining the views of the members they represent on matters prescribed by the Act of 1919;

(ii) deciding what subjects should be brought before the Central Representative Body for discussion;

(iii) electing members to serve on the Central Representative Body;

(iv) considering such matters as may be referred to them by the Inspector-General.

G5-1 · 412

(b) a Central Representative Body made up of representatives of ranks up to and including County Inspector. The County and District Inspector on this body are elected by members of their respective ranks; the Head Constables, Sergeants and Constables are selected from members of the Consultative Boards mentioned at (a) above.

77. The Central Representative Body has taken the power provided in the rules to form itself into separate representative bodies known as the Men's Representative Body (for Constables, Sergeants and Head Constables) and an Officers' Representative Body.

78. The Act of 1919 requires that the draft of any Order relating to pay, pensions and allowances of the Force shall be submitted to the representative body or bodies whose members are affected and that the Minister shall consider any representations made by the body or bodies affected.

79. As from 1st September 1969 provision has been made for the appointment of a full-time Secretary (a serving member of the Force) to the Central Representative Body and the making of rules which will permit, as in the case of the Police Federations in England and Wales and in Scotland, the collection of voluntary subscriptions to be used and accounted for in a manner to be approved by the Ministry of Home Affairs.

CHAPTER 4

Proposed Changes in the Role and Organisation of the Royal Ulster Constabulary

ROLE

80. The most striking difference between the Royal Ulster Constabulary and the police forces elsewhere in the United Kingdom is that it fulfils a military as well as a civilian role. The traditional duties of the mainland are the prevention and detection of crime, the control of traffic and the maintenance of public order. In Northern Ireland the military role has understandably been regarded as of first importance, and has played a significant part in the training, equipment and traditions of the force. The impression of a military force is strengthened by the close association of the force with the Ulster Special Constabulary which, at least in the rural areas of the Province, is almost wholly devoted to security duties of a military kind.

81. Policing in a free society depends on a wide measure of public approval and consent. This has never been obtained in the long term by military or paramilitary means. We believe that any police force, military in appearance and equipment, is less acceptable to minority and moderate opinion than if it is clearly civilian in character, particularly now that better education and improved communications have spread awareness of the rights of civilians. We accept that, in view of the threat to security discussed in Chapter 2, there is, and may remain for some time, a continuing need to guard against the incidence of armed guerilla-type attacks or incursions of the type which have occurred in the past. We consider that this is a task which, by its nature and under the Constitution, should be the responsibility of the Government at Westminster. We discuss this matter in Chapters 9 and 10.

82. We therefore recommend that the R.U.C. be relieved of all duties of a military nature as soon as possible and that its contribution to the security of the State from subversion be limited to the gathering of intelligence, the protection of important persons and the enforcement of the relevant laws.

83. On the basis of this recommendation, it becomes necessary to consider measures likely to improve the acceptability and effectiveness of the R.U.C. in its new role as a civil police force. These measures include a change in the relationship between the force and the Central Government, and reviews of organisation and authorised establishment, of equipment, manpower, accommodation and of the policy governing the use of firearms.

ACCOUNTABILITY TO THE PUBLIC

84. The law about the relationship between the Government of Northern Ireland and the Royal Ulster Constabulary is described on pages 102-104 of the Report on the Disturbances in Northern Ireland (the Cameron Report, Cmd. 532). The law defines the relationship in a vague and unsatisfactory way, [illegible] but that the Inspector-General is responsible for [illegible] operational control and for the enforcement of the law. In fact, the Inspector [illegible]neral is not accountable to anyone for his operational policies; yet he and his force are held by many to be closely associated with the Government, which has since the setting up of the Government of Northern Ireland been formed from the same party. This position is unsatisfactory on both grounds, besides making it difficult to refute allegations of partiality.

85. We are entirely in favour of the idea that the Inspector-General and the force should not be subject to political pressures; yet we believe that it is equally important that there should be some body, representative of the community as a whole, to which he can be accountable, and through which the wishes and fears of the community can be expressed. It would be best if this body could consist of elected representatives; but in the political circumstances of Northern Ireland such a body would not, at present, adequately represent the minority parties and communities.

86. We consider that this difficulty could be overcome if some of the members were chosen by representative bodies and if some were nominated by His Excellency the Governor of Northern Ireland in such a way as to ensure that the membership reflected the proportions of different groups including, in particular, Roman Catholics in the community.

87. We therefore recommend that a Police Authority for Northern Ireland be created by statute and that its membership should be as follows:

Association of County Councils	3
County Borough of Belfast	2
County Borough of Londonderry*	1
Queen's University, Belfast	1
New University of Ulster	1
Incorporated Law Society of Northern Ireland	1
Resident Magistracy	1
Northern Ireland Committee of the Irish Congress of Trade Unions	2
Chambers of Commerce	2
Ministry of Home Affairs	1

88. Four additional members, of whom one would be the Chairman, should be nominated by His Excellency the Governor of Northern Ireland.

89. We recommend that the Police Authority should be responsible, subject to the authority of the Minister of Home Affairs, for:

(a) the establishment and maintenance of an adequate and efficient police force for Northern Ireland;

(b) the appointment of the chief officer of police, his deputy and assistant chief officers, (i.e. officers of the rank of County Inspector or above) and the determination of the number of persons of each rank in the force;

*For the time being the nomination to be made by the Londonderry Development Commission.

(c) the provision and maintenance of buildings, structures and premises for police purposes;

(d) the provision and maintenance of such vehicles, apparatus, clothing and other articles as may be required for police purposes.

90. We recommend that the Authority should have a particular duty to keep itself informed as to the manner in which complaints against the police are dealt with.

91. We also suggest that, as a matter of practice, the Minister of Home Affairs should exercise the power conferred upon him by the Public Order Act (Northern Ireland) 1951 to prohibit processions and meetings only after consulting the chief officer of police and the Police Authority or a committee of the Authority constituted for that purpose.

92. We further recommend that the Minister of Home Affairs should be empowered to:

(a) require the chief officer of police to submit an Annual Report on the policing of the Province to him and the Police Authority;

(b) require the chief officer of police to submit to him a report on any matter connected with the policing of the area;

(c) call upon the Police Authority to require a chief officer* to retire in the interests of efficiency, subject to the safeguarding of his right to make representations and to an inquiry.

Inspection

93. We consider that it is a disadvantage that the Minister of Home Affairs at present lacks the means to undertake an impartial and professionally competent assessment of the force. In order to provide for this we recommend that the Minister should be empowered to require that the force should be inspected as he may direct, but in any case not less than once a year, by Her Majesty's Inspectorate of Constabulary. We suggest that one of Her Majesty's Inspectors should have a special responsibility for Northern Ireland.

Police Advisory Board

94. In order to ensure good communication between the Minister, the Police Authority, the chief officer and other members of the force we recommend that an advisory board, representative of all members in the force, should be established. It should be presided over by the Minister of Home Affairs; the chief officer of the force should be a member of the board and the Police Authority should be represented on it. The board should have a right to be consulted about all regulations with regard to any matter affecting the force, except for pay, pensions, allowances and hours of service. Any constituent member of the board should be entitled to place on the agenda any matter within the board's responsibility.

ORGANISATION

Separate forces for Belfast and Londonderry

95. It was suggested to us that it might be advantageous to establish separate police forces for Belfast and the city of Londonderry. After careful consideraon grounds of efficiency and that it would lessen the likelihood of uniformity in matters of policy requiring sensitive but strong central direction. We recognise the particular need, however, for the police in the city of Londonderry to establish a much closer relationship with the community and we suggest in paragraph 139 a means by which we hope this can be achieved.

*A chief officer means any officer of the rank of County Inspector or above.

Border Stations

96. We formed the impression that some of the stations near the border serve no useful purpose and impose unsatisfactory conditions on their occupants. The manning of some of the border stations induces a defensive or 'block house' attitude, immobilises valuable manpower to no good effect, provides a ready and vulnerable target for dissident elements seeking to achieve a cheap propaganda victory and retains for the border a dramatic significance at present unjustified. The increased mobility of the force ought to allow adequate policing of border areas without any of these disadvantages. We recommend that the chief officer of police should review the need to retain these stations.

Rank Structure

97. The present rank structure is not appropriate to the new role of the force. The essential function of inspection can in our view be better discharged by an experienced and senior official not involved in the command and administration of the force and our recommendation to achieve that end is given in paragraph 93. To underline the simplification of the role of those in command we recommend that consideration should be given by the Police Authority in consultation with the Police Advisory Board to the adoption of the ranks: commissioner, superintendent, inspector, sergeant and constable and such intermediate ranks as may be thought appropriate, subject to approval by the Minister.

Crime

98. The achievements of the force in dealing with crime, although apparently satisfactory, are difficult to assess because the system of recording indictable offences could be improved. We did not have the time to examine this in depth, but were satisfied that this should be done as soon as conveniently possible. We suggest this should be undertaken by H.M. Inspectorate of Constabulary.

Traffic

99. Time did not allow us to examine the Traffic Branch in detail, but from the information made available to us we formed the view that it was discharging its important duties well. It occurred to us that the time might be opportune for the Branch to assume a rather more distinctive character in view of the growing need for specialisation. This is, however, a matter which will no doubt be considered in due course by the Police Authority and we do not feel in the circumstances that any recommendation from us is necessary.

The Reserve Force

100. We were impressed by the standard and morale of the Reserve Force who have borne the brunt of physical violence and a great deal of criticism. It is not generally understood that members of this reserve are ordinarily dangerous task should be undertaken in turn by as many members of the force as possible, in order to avoid the criticism that a body of limited membership is different in its character or in the attitudes of its personnel from those of the force as a whole. In particular we recommend that—

CS 1 · 415

(a) one-third of the Reserve Force be replaced at yearly intervals and that command should not be exercised by the same officer for longer than three years.

(b) deployment of this force for crowd control should constitute a special occasion calling, where appropriate, for overtime payment at the appropriate rates for all ranks.

(c) the Reserve Force be renamed the Special Patrol Group, to make it clear that it fulfils a role not at all different from that undertaken by similar bodies found wholly acceptable by the public elsewhere.

In this connection we suggest more training in crowd control throughout the uniformed branch.

Welfare

101. It was represented to us that a civilian welfare officer (preferably with experience in the armed forces) should be appointed. From our own experience we know how useful such an officer can be; and we recommend that one should be appointed.

Firearms

102. We recommend that the present policy of general issue and carrying of arms should be phased out as soon as possible and, in our view, this can begin immediately in most areas of the Province. The extent to which firearms are available and issued to members of the Royal Ulster Constabulary is inappropriate to its role as a civil police force. We recommend that—

(a) all automatic weapons, self-loading rifles and revolvers of a calibre larger than .38 mm should cease to be part of the equipment of the R.U.C.;

(b) the only firearms retained should be revolvers of a calibre no larger than .38 mm, .303 mm rifles and gas pistols or gas grenades. These should be available under strict security conditions at selected police stations for issue as required.

103. It would be for the chief officer of police and the Police Authority to consider the principles governing the use of firearms. We think it may be helpful to make it clear that they should ordinarily be restricted to personnel on mobile or detective duties or the protection of police stations. Firearms ought, in our view, rarely to be visible as an article of police equipment. We believe that the policy and principles recommended above would be appropriate in civil disorders of the kind experienced in recent months.

MANPOWER

Strength and Establishment

104. The recently approved increase in the authorised establishment of the force to 3,500 has led to the creation of about 460 vacancies, of which some 125 are filled by mobilised special constables. We consider it of the greatest importance that the vacancies should be filled as quickly as possible. One of the first duties of the Police Authority, in consultation with the chief officer of police, and Her Majesty's Inspectorate, should be to make proposals to the Minister on a realistic establishment for the force. But since there are at present many vacancies, we see little merit in proposing an arbitrary establishment which might have to be revised at an early date. In consequence we recommend that the Police Authority should, as a first priority, concentrate on increasing the effective strength of the force.

Women Police

105. The establishment of women police appeared to us to be rather small. We are convinced that policewomen have not only a high professional value, but can play an invaluable part in enhancing the relationship of the force with the public. We recommend that the new Police Authority should consider this matter, seeking advice as necessary from H.M. Inspectorate of Constabulary.

A reserve of manpower—a volunteer reserve

106. The need for a reserve of manpower to perform duties locally and voluntarily in aid of the regular police has long been recognised. The Royal Commission on the Police in England and Wales and Scotland in their final report stressed the value of such a reserve in promoting relations between police and public and expressed the view that the valuable reserve of manpower which they provided ought not to be regarded as for use only in times of emergency. The Police Act 1964 provided for such special constables to be attached to regular police forces in England and Wales, to be appointed by the chief officer of police and to be subject to his direction, control and dismissal. The Home Secretary has made regulations regarding the government, administration and conditions of service of special constables under Section 34 of the Act.

107. There is general agreement on the continuing need for a reserve of this kind to assist the regular police in times of emergency, but that it must be regarded as supplementary to, and not as a substitute for, an adequate establishment of regular police. Such a reserve should be confined to ordinary police duties in the area in which its members live. They should be given sufficient and recurrent training locally to ensure an adequate performance of duty. They should wear a uniform closely resembling that of the regular police. They should not receive any form of payment other than reimbursement of out-of-pocket expenses, as is the case in Great Britain. They should neither be issued with firearms nor undergo any training in their use.

108. It has been suggested to us that such a reserve in Northern Ireland should have a name other than that of Special Constabulary, because of the hostility and criticism which the Ulster Special Constabulary arouses in certain quarters. We feel that this matter is best resolved by those who have a longer acquaintance with the Province and a deeper awareness of its susceptibilities than ourselves. Whatever name is decided upon we would hope that members of all sections of local communities would volunteer to serve in such a reserve and that special efforts should be made to achieve the participation of members of minority groups.

109. We therefore recommend that a volunteer reserve police force be recruited for service in Belfast, Londonderry and each of the six counties of the Province. We suggest that it be governed by regulations made by the Minister of Home Affairs, and that it be commanded and administered by the chief officer of police. We think it will be helpful if the uniform badges and buttons of the members of the volunteer reserve identify them with the area in which they serve.

Cadet Corps

110. We have considered the extent to which the system of police cadet corps on the mainland has increasingly afforded opportunities for boys to begin a police career on leaving school and to involve themselves and their parent force in social work and with youth organisations. We think this has proved of great benefit as a means of ensuring a continuous supply of recruits of good quality, of affording them a valuable opportunity to serve others whilst undergoing training for their future and of enhancing the relationship between the force and the community.

111. We recommend that the Police Authority consider the establishment of such a corps, subject to the approval of the Minister, and express the hope that in that event the curriculum will be devoted largely to educational, social and physical activities designed to equip young men for a police career. We realise that the task of acquiring suitable accommodation may make this recommendation difficult to implement in the near future and we suggest exploration of the possibility of training a number of cadets under existing arrangements in Great Britain as a temporary expedient. The size of such a corps is, of course, for consideration by the Police Authority, but it may be helpful to mention that we have in mind an experimental target of 75.

Civilians, equipment and extraneous duties

112. It became quickly apparent during our enquiry that there was a need for assessment of the extent to which civilians could release police officers from a variety of duties for which their physique, training and powers are unnecessary. The administration of pay, allowances and accounts for example is still done manually by police officers. Clerical and even typing duties are also being done by police officers. There were complaints of lack of modern equipment, including copying and photographic machines. We recommend that O. and M. studies of these matters should be undertaken.

113. We also recommend that there should be an early review of the extent to which the police are engaged on extraneous duties and, without charge, by private employers, including the promoters of football matches.

COMMUNICATIONS—VEHICLES AND WIRELESS

114. We found the force vehicle fleet to be adequate and wireless communications to be developing satisfactorily. There will no doubt be an increasing need for both as the strength of the force grows. But certain vehicles of a warlike character are inappropriate to a civil police role. We recommend that the armoured cars now in use should cease to be part of police equipment. Armoured personnel carriers and jeeps should be retained, but not replaced, until experience shows the extent to which they are likely to be required in future.

[illegible] for command purposes in an emergency. We suggest that it should be [illegible]ed or replaced so as to allow greater use of visual aids and for possible experiments with closed circuit television for crowd control. Similar facilities are required urgently for Londonderry.

BUILDINGS

116. A fresh study should be carried out to determine whether the present distribution of police stations, both in terms of location and type, is correct. An attempt has clearly been made in recent years to improve the standard of police buildings but many are unsatisfactory and much remains to be done. Too many stations are inappropriate to the needs of a modern police force. The Depot at Enniskillen was built to house the soldiery of George III, and its amenities appear to have improved little since then; in view of its importance to the force its redevelopment or replacement is urgently necessary.

117. We recommend that a detailed forward plan of building and adaptation of existing buildings already in being should be reviewed by the Police Authority, with a view to seeking Ministerial approval for any changes.

118. As recommended in paragraph 96, we consider that the chief officer of police should review the need to retain some border stations.

PS 1 . 412

CHAPTER 5

Proposed Changes in Recruitment, Training and Promotion Procedures

RECRUITMENT

119. Recruitment is important to any police force, but especially so to the R.U.C., firstly in view of its effect on the composition of the force, and secondly in the light of our recommendation at paragraph 104 that the rate of recruitment should be increased.

120. In Chapter 3 we referred to the fact that the Departmental Committee appointed by Sir Dawson Bates had recommended in 1922 that one-third of the regular force should be recruited from members of the Roman Catholic faith, preference to be given to Roman Catholic members of the Royal Irish Constabulary and the then Special Constabulary Force. Unfortunately this objective has not been attained and, at present, Roman Catholics only constitute approximately 11% of the members of the R.U.C. and of this percentage the great majority are probably men whose fathers had served in the police. The net percentage of Roman Catholic recruits from outside these sources is thus very small indeed.

121. We accept that genuine efforts have been made to recruit a greater number of Roman Catholics so as to achieve a better proportion in relation to the population, and we consider that the reasons for the present imbalance lie deep and reflect the long-standing divisions in the community. In short, it is not the case that Roman Catholics who are suitably qualified are not or have not been welcome to join, but rather that for various reasons they have not come forward in sufficient numbers.

122. Many reasons were advanced for this reluctance amongst the Roman Catholic section of the community to join the R.U.C. Some suggested to us that R.U.C. recruiting officers were not always made welcome at Roman Catholic secondary schools; that some newspapers refused to carry recruiting advertisements; that a Roman Catholic joining the R.U.C. might incur the social disapproval of his neighbours, friends and even his own family; that a Roman Catholic member of the R.U.C. might be discriminated against in regard to promotion; and that the R.U.C. was possibly over-cautious in considering the security background of recruits.

123. Without expressing any opinion upon the validity of each of these alleged obstacles, we wish at this stage to record that as part of our enquiries we interviewed a number of Roman Catholics of all ranks and heard no evidence of discrimination on religious grounds with regard to promotion within the R.U.C. It was, moreover, evident that the Roman Catholic members of the Force share warmly the feeling of comradeship within the R.U.C.

124. We think the reservation of a proportion of vacancies in the force for Roman Catholics amounts to reverse discrimination. We recommend that it be discontinued. Nonetheless we consider it essential to the acc[illegible] of the Force that it must not only be impartial but be seen to be impartial in all its aspects and that fresh and vigorous efforts should be made to increase the number of Roman Catholic entrants and we recommend accordingly.

125. We hope that the recommendations made in this chapter and elsewhere in this Report will create conditions which will encourage all suitably qualified persons, irrespective of religion, to look upon the police service as a worthwhile career. We would express the hope also that the leaders of the Roman Catholic Church will feel able so to regard it and play their essential part in encouraging recruitment.

126. The present arrangements for recruitment described in Chapter 3, in our opinion, leave much to be desired. We accordingly recommend that the new Police Authority and the chief officer of police consider:

(a) the establishment of a Central Recruiting Office at Police Headquarters in Belfast to ensure the consistent application of selection standards. Such an office should be staffed mainly by suitably trained civilians. A similar but smaller organization might be established in Londonderry, perhaps on a part-time basis;

(b) the nomination at each County Headquarters of a senior officer to be charged with responsibility for recruitment;

(c) the setting up of a mobile recruiting team to tour the country areas and perhaps Great Britain;

(d) providing simplified application forms to join the force at all police stations, and abandoning the requirement that recruits must disclose their religion;

(e) extending the regular programme of 'talks to sixth-formers', supported by such aids as a short film of the R.U.C. at work. In this connection, the Cadet Corps suggested in paragraph 111 would doubtless be of particular relevance and interest;

(f) the use of other publicity media including the possibility of sharing in the British national advertising campaigns promoted by the Home Office.

TRAINING

127. Almost all training is carried out at the Depot at Enniskillen. It might be cheaper and more convenient to acquire a new depot than to modify the existing one, which is old and needs major renovations. There is a clear need for greatly improved accommodation for training purposes which we recognise may be difficult to acquire at short notice. The need could be aggravated if our proposals for increased recruitment are successful.

128. We recommend, therefore, that the Police Authority and the chief officer of police should, subject to the approval of the Minister, explore the possibility of acquiring accommodation at a District Training Centre in England or Scotland on a temporary basis. We have in mind that a wing of such a centre could be devoted to R.U.C. recruit training, as necessary.

129. The proposed change in the role of the Force will affect the training syllabus appreciably and there seems to us to be a need for an extension of training, particularly those selected for promotion or likely to benefit from higher training, for which Northern Ireland has no facilities. We think there is a need for a study in depth of the training requirements, and suggest that Her Majesty's Inspectorate should be invited to undertake this.

130. We understand that the force already experiences some difficulty in getting as many places as it needs on courses of higher training in Great Britain. We recommend that the Home Office and the Scottish Home and Health Department should be asked to consider sympathetically any applications from Northern Ireland during the next few years.

PROMOTION PROCEDURES

131. We share the view of the Central Representative Body that consideration should be given by the Minister to approving the system of qualification outlined in the Police (Promotion) Regulations 1968 for England and Wales with such local adaptations as may be necessary for promotion to the ranks of sergeant and head constable (or inspector). The present system of selection for higher ranks seems to us acceptable, but we think that the long incremental scale in the rank of District Inspector throws too much emphasis on seniority. Adoption of United Kingdom ranks, as recommended in paragraph 97, would encourage flexibility in the selection for senior posts. A degree of conformity to mainland procedure is desirable if the force is to achieve the interchange of officers at intermediate rank which we consider would be of benefit to both. This is, no doubt, a matter on which H.M. Inspectorate of Constabulary entrusted with the review of training would be glad of the opportunity to offer advice.

CHAPTER 6

Relations with the Public and the Law

132. A good relationship between police and public is vital if a police force is to be effective. At one time this could be achieved almost entirely through personal contacts. But this is no longer enough. On the one hand the police nowadays tend to be remote from ordinary people except when there is trouble; and on the other hand the press, radio and television, particularly the last, bring into almost every home pictures and accounts of spectacular and newsworthy events with an immediacy and power to mould public opinion that is quite new. Moreover, the leaders of the extreme left deliberately seek to discredit the police, as part of their campaign to destroy the existing fabric of society. It is, as a result, in the interests, not only of the police, but of all who value law and order that a balanced picture of the police should be presented to the public. This requires professional skill, a realisation by the whole force of the part that they can play, and an involvement of the force with those organisations which seek to encourage good relationships within the community.

Complaints against the police and discipline

133. In our view, however, there is one essential condition to the improvement of relations between the R.U.C. and the public: this is a better method of dealing with complaints against the police. The Royal Commission devoted much care to this subject, and emphasised that the way in which complaints were dealt with should ensure that the interests of the public were protected and that justice should be seen to be done. The present procedure in the R.U.C., which is described in paragraphs 65–73, is defective because it contains no provisions to ensure that complaints are properly recorded or that they are not suppressed by the immediate superiors of the officers complained of. We ought to add that although we have studied the principles of the way in which complaints are investigated, it was not within our terms of reference to investigate actual cases, and we have not done so. We recommend that the procedure introduced in England and Wales by the Police Act 1964 and by the Police Discipline Regulations should be introduced, subject to any local variations that may be necessary. Under this procedure it would be prescribed that every complaint (unless it alleges a criminal offence with which a member of the force has already been charged) should be recorded forthwith, and investigated by an officer from another district or county. Unless the report discloses that there is no evidence that a criminal offence has been committed, it should be submitted to an independent legal officer, such as the Chief Crown Solicitor. The Police Authority is required to keep itself informed as to the manner in which complaints are dealt with, as we recommend in paragraph 90. In addition, so that members of the public may get redress in the civil courts if they suffer from the wrongful acts of the police, we recommend that the chief officer of police should be made vicariously liable for wrongful acts committed by constables under his control.

Community and Youth Relations

134. We were informed of the work already being done in the form of visits to business premises and of displays at exhibitions to promote crime prevention, and of visits to schools both for recruiting purposes and to give talks on road safety. We recommend that these activities should be stepped up, particularly the talks on road safety, which, besides being valuable on their own account, enable the police to demonstrate the contribution they make to the community as a whole. In connection with this, we believe that the introduction, which we recommend in paragraph 111, of a cadet corps, should lead to improved relations with schools, and the activities of the cadets themselves should also help.

135. We noted that members of the force already undertake a certain amount of activity in the matters of youth and community relations. We recommend that this too should be stepped up.

Press Relations

136. As to relations with the press, radio and television, we learned that a press officer with a staff of two has recently been appointed to the Headquarters of the force. Although he has been greatly overworked during the disturbances he has been able to provide a great deal of information about the police, including, on many occasions, corrections of wrong statements.

Future arrangements for Public and Community Relations

137. We consider that the efforts of the force in the field of community and public relations should be increased generally and properly co-ordinated. A possible arrangement would be for a public relations adviser to be established at Headquarters, and for a senior police officer at County Headquarters to be charged with co-ordinating the work in his county. We recommend that the Police Authority should seek the advice of public relations consultants about the organisation that is required.

138. We earnestly hope that the recommendations that we have made for improving the relationship of the police with the community will meet a response from Roman Catholics, and that in future the police will be more welcome to visit Roman Catholic schools and institutions than is sometimes now the case.

Londonderry

139. We considered the special problem of Londonderry, and found that the representatives of moderate opinion were anxious that a proper relationship between police and public should be created there. We consider, and in this we have been supported by local opinion, that the setting up of a Londonderry police liaison committee would do much to help. This committee, which should be appointed by the Londonderry Development Commission, would bring together all shades of opinion in Londonderry and the chief police officer in the City should be a member of it. We recommend that a police liaison committee on these lines should be set up.

Re-opening of some local police stations

140. In several areas, in particular in the Bogside district of Londonderry and in Cullingtree Road, Belfast, we were told that the closing of local police stations had led to a virtual severance of contact between police and public. In the Bogside the closing of the station has been regretted by the residents, has since come about. We recognise the difficulties of entering [illegible]ide again, although we hope that the measures we have proposed will help [illegible]nake this possible, but we recommend that the decision to close small stations, in rural as well as urban areas, be reconsidered, particularly with regard to stations in difficult areas. In this connection, we recognise that the whole of the system called 'unit beat policing' may not, without modification, be applicable to Northern Ireland; but we recommend that the police should consider adopting one feature of the system known as 'resident constables.'

Uniform and Name

141. We have consulted most shades of opinion about the desirability of changing the uniform and the name of the force. As to the uniform, we recommend a change, to blue, as the symbol most likely to convince the public that the role of the force has been changed. This would also make exchanges with forces in Great Britain easier. We recommend that constables and sergeants throughout the force should wear numbers on their uniforms as they already do in Belfast and Londonderry. With regard to the name, different opinions were expressed to us. There are objections to all the alternatives we have heard and there is no certainty that a change would succeed in creating additional support for the force. To make one would be a blow to the morale of many members of the force, and would be unpopular with many of its supporters. We therefore recommend no change.

Prosecutions

142. It is the practice in Northern Ireland that prosecutions in the lower courts are undertaken by police officers and that the police decide, sometimes after taking legal advice, when prosecutions should be undertaken. While it is the unmistakable duty of the police to make offenders amenable to the law, the impartiality of the police may be questioned if they are responsible for deciding who shall be prosecuted and thereafter for acting in court as prosecutor. This practice can result also in a mistaken impression of the relationship between the courts and the police. We therefore recommend that the Scottish system of independent public prosecutors should be adopted; under this the police are responsible only for the collection of information about offences, all subsequent action with regard to prosecution being undertaken by a solicitor in the public service. In Northern Ireland this might be the Chief Crown Solicitor, but further study than we have been able to give would be needed before the procedure could be precisely settled. Although our principal reason for proposing this change is the improvement of relations with the public, there would be a substantial secondary benefit in that a great deal of the time of District Inspectors and Head Constables is now taken up with court work, and this time could profitably be devoted to the leadership and administration of the police in their districts and to the development of good relations with the community.

The 'Special Powers Act'

143. We considered also the position with regard to the Civil Authorities (Special Powers) Acts (Northern Ireland) 1922-1943 and regulations made under the Acts. The common name, which we shall use, for the Acts and regulations is the 'Special Powers Act.' There has been much criticism of the Acts, and on more than or[illegible]asion the Government has considered repeal; but on each occasion fresh acts o[illegible]lence have occurred, leading to pressure for retention of the Acts. A numbe[illegible] of police officers with first-hand experience of dealing with riots and extremists, told us that they considered that the powers given to them under the Acts were unnecessary, and that the relationship between police and public would be improved if the Acts were repealed.

144. Some of the regulations made under the Acts, for example those dealing with explosives, may well be necessary, but could be covered by ordinary legislation. We consider that the task of the police would be made easier if the few essential provisions were provided for under ordinary legislation and the Acts were repealed.

Membership of certain organisations

145. Our investigations into the present composition of the Royal Ulster Constabulary and the attitude with which its members approach their duties has led us to the conclusion that, despite the adverse publicity they have received, their best endeavours are directed towards ensuring fair treatment of all citizens under the law. We recognise however, as did those members with whom we discussed the question of public acceptability, that the failure even of a few to act and to be seen to act impartially, all too readily reflects adversely on the good name of the Force as a whole.

146. This has caused us to question whether membership of certain organisations such as the Orange Order or the Ancient Order of Hibernians which, justified or not, tend to be linked in the public mind to political parties, can be held to be compatible with membership of a police force, particularly when the latter is regularly called upon to perform duties at demonstrations organised by the bodies referred to.

147. Whilst we are prepared to accept that it should be possible to be a member, both of such an organisation and a police force, and to act at all times with complete impartiality, many would be sceptical of such a view and without wishing to reflect on the organisations we have in mind we are of the opinion that the task of demonstrating complete impartiality at all times is difficult enough without complicating it further.

CHAPTER 7

Association of the Royal Ulster Constabulary with other Police Forces in the United Kingdom

148. Many members of the R.U.C., besides a number of responsible laymen and officials, have emphasised to us that the R.U.C. ought to be much more closely linked with police forces in Great Britain. There are several reasons for this:

First: a closer association with forces in Great Britain would be of mutual benefit. It would widen the horizons of members of the R.U.C. and enable them to profit from the experience of forces in Great Britain.

Second: much thought is being given in Great Britain to the roles and functions of the police in a changing society and extensive research is being carried out into methods of policing and new types of equipment. In addition the Home Office and forces in Great Britain continue to study developments abroad so that the lessons learnt there can, if appropriate, be applied at home. Members of the R.U.C. told us that they would like to profit by and participate in these studies and experiments.

Third: we formed the impression that the R.U.C. felt isolated from other police forces; the morale of the force would be raised if there were links at all levels with forces on the mainland. We know from our own experience that the forces on the mainland would welcome this.

Fourth: the machinery for consultation in Great Britain ensures good communication between the Home Departments, chief officers of police and other members of the service, and ensures also that the views of the service as a whole are taken into account when decisions are taken. The Central Representative Body feels strongly that similar consultative machinery to that in Great Britain should be set up in Northern Ireland, and that at all levels this machinery should be associated with that on the mainland.

Fifth: there are arrangements in Great Britain under which forces can reinforce one another in emergencies. If similar arrangements were extended to Northern Ireland it would be possible to provide a considerable number of reinforcements from Great Britain when the need for them was foreseen, for example on the occasion of meetings and processions.

149. Some of the measures which we have commended elsewhere in this Report, for example the inspection of the force by Her Majesty's Inspectorate, the provision of more places on training courses and of accommodation for training, and the changes in uniform and rank structure, should strengthen the links with the police in Great Britain; in addition we recommend that the Home Office should be invited to take the special needs of the R.U.C. into account when planning the work of the Police Research and Development Branch; and should invite the R.U.C. to second an officer to the Branch.

150. We recom... ...at the Police Authority, in consultation with the Police Advisory Board, ...ould consider the following measures:—

(a) the interchange of personnel between the R.U.C. and forces on the mainland by means of attachments or secondments;

(b) members of the R.U.C. to be encouraged to apply for posts in forces on the mainland, and members of forces on the mainland to be invited, by means of advertisement, to apply for posts with the R.U.C. At some time it might be possible to apply the requirement that in order to qualify for appointment as a chief officer of police a candidate must have served for a time in another force;

(c) the Central Representative Body to be given a statutory right to take part in negotiations about pay, pensions, allowances and hours of work. This entails a re-organisation of the Central Representative Body and its association with the police representative organisations in Great Britain.

HS 1 . 421

CHAPTER 8

Description of the Ulster Special Constabulary

BRIEF HISTORY

151. A force of Special Constabulary was first raised in Ireland under the Special Constables (Ireland) Act of 1823. It came under the authority of the Imperial Government and the Chief Secretary for Ireland.

152. Recruiting for the Ulster Special Constabulary opened on the 1st November 1920, during a period of grave unrest which preceded the setting up of the Government of Northern Ireland. Enlistment was possible into any one of three classes. Class A involved a willingness to perform full-time duty, Class B part-time duty and Class C provided a reserve register of volunteers made up of men who, because of business commitments or age, were not readily available for training or for duty but were prepared to be called up in the event of a grave emergency.

153. Class A platoons could be posted for duty anywhere in Northern Ireland; Class B platoons being only concerned with providing local protection for the area in which they resided. Within a year of the opening of recruiting over 8,000 men had joined the Class A Constabulary and 25,000 the Class B. At the end of 1921 a further branch was authorised, the C.1 Class. It was organised on semi-military lines with an establishment of 405 officers and 10,562 other ranks. As with Class B, the service requirements were part-time in nature but subject to call-up for full-time duty if the need arose.

154. The Royal Irish Constabulary remained in being in Northern Ireland, gradually decreasing in numbers, until in 1922 it was disbanded. The Royal Ulster Constabulary came into existence in June 1922 and during what proved to be an extremely difficult period of transition and reorganisation, the U.S.C. bore a heavy responsibility for the preservation of law and order in the Province.

155. Conditions gradually returned to normal, and Class A, apart from a small number of men employed on special duties, and Class C.1 were stood down; later the maintenance of a Class C register was discontinued. Class B was retained against the risk of further outbreaks of subversive activity and continued to train throughout the 1930's. As a result, on the outbreak of war in 1939 there was a ready-made force of some 13,000 men available to undertake home guard duties. Constitutional considerations prevented the setting up of a Home Guard unit in Northern Ireland as an auxiliary of the military forces so the problem was met by forming a second section of the U.S.C. By November 1940 the combined strengths of the two sections exceeded 40,000. With the exception of some 1,500 of the original Special Constabulary in Belfast who continued to be employed only on civil duties, all were armed, trained and equipped for defence duties. Their conditions of service required that in the event of a proclamation of a state of emergency by His Excellency the Governor for all purposes.

156. After the war the U.S.C. reverted to its former role and its strength was reduced to about 10,000. Towards the end of 1956 the I.R.A. began a prolonged campaign of violence including attacks on R.U.C. stations, Customs posts, Crown buildings and key installations, which made it essential to increase, as a matter of great urgency, the strength of the regular police force. Over 1,700 members of the U.S.C. were mobilised for full-time duty, 125 of whom remain embodied to this day. These men are also referred to in Chapters 3 and 9. The rest of the auxiliary police force, reinforced by further enlistments and operating on a part-time basis, maintained a network of patrols in what were regarded as potentially vulnerable areas.

157. The role and the training of the U.S.C. member, both past and at present, depends upon whether he is a member of a City or a County force. If the former, he is employed mainly on routine police duties and works with, and under the command of the R.U.C. He may, however, also be required to mount armed guard at key installations and police stations in his area. In Belfast where there is a force of 650, there is a long tradition of service in a civil police role. If he is a member of a County force, his main duties are likely to be concerned with road checks and the guarding of installations as directed by the R.U.C. The requirement to perform ordinary police duty is rarely placed upon him and his training and equipment, including the types of firearms with which he is issued, is primarily of a military nature and not designed for the ordinary police role.

ESTABLISHMENT

158. Several years of peace and an ever increasing need to economise generally in the field of public expenditure resulted, early in 1968, in a decision to reduce the number of part-time members to 8,000 and at the same time effect improvements in both training and equipment designed to secure higher overall efficiency and effectiveness. On the 1st August 1969, the strength (both full and part-time) was as set out in Appendix C. The reduction in the size of the force, which still continues, was achieved largely by the imposition of an age limit and by stopping recruitment except in those areas where recruited strengths had fallen seriously short of approved establishment.

ORGANISATION

159. The Inspector-General exercises command through the Staff Officer at Police Headquarters who is assisted in his duties by an Assistant Staff Officer.

160. There are eight command areas, the County Borough of Belfast, where the command structure is fully integrated with that of the R.U.C., and the senior U.S.C. officer, a Deputy City Commandant, is responsible to the City Commissioner of the regular police force; the County Borough of Londonderry, where a City Commandant is in charge, and in each county where a County Commandant is in charge. The command areas are divided into Districts which are related as closely as possible to police districts with District Commandants in charge. Districts in their turn are broken down into Sub-Districts, under Sub-District Commandants, the boundaries of which largely coincide with police sub-districts.

ably, in general it comprises a Platoon Sergeant, four Section Sergeants and 26 Special Constables.

RECRUITMENT

162. Before being accepted for the U.S.C. an applicant must be recommended by both the Sub-District and District Commandants of the area in which he hopes to join and approved by the local District Inspector of the Royal Ulster Constabulary. He is required to furnish particulars regarding age, occupation, marital status, religion, etc. Final acceptance rests with the County Commandant.

163. Whilst there is no law or official rule that precludes any person, whatever his religion, from joining the U.S.C., the fact remains that for a variety of reasons no Roman Catholic is a member.

164. Full-time and permanent appointments (see Appendix D) are made by the Minister of Home Affairs on the recommendation of selection boards comprising senior officers of the U.S.C. County Commandants are selected by a board made up of the Inspector General or his Deputy, the Staff Officer of the Ulster Special Constabulary and a representative of the Ministry of Home Affairs. Their appointment is subject to the approval of the Minister of Home Affairs.

165. Full-time, permanent and mobilized members must all undergo medical examination before they can be accepted. Members mobilized to assist the R.U.C. on duties other than guard duties are required to undergo an educational test. No educational or medical tests are required in the case of part-time members. The pay and conditions of part-time members are set out in Appendix E.

CHAPTER 9

The Future of the Ulster Special Constabulary

166. In Chapter 4 we recommended that the Royal Ulster Constabulary should be relieved of its para-military duties and assume the character and sole function of a civil police force. We established the principle that the former role should not rest with the police. We now turn to the question of what arrangements are necessary to fulfil the military tasks and how these arrangements should be made.

167. For the reasons stated in Chapter 2 we believe that it will be necessary for some time to come to protect key installations and to undertake such other tasks as may be necessary to guard against the threat of armed guerilla-type attacks. We consider that all threats to the security of Northern Ireland from armed incursions and attacks, from whatever quarter and whatever form they may take, are a proper military responsibility and should rest with the Government at Westminster. It is, however, self-evident that the Government of Northern Ireland has a vital interest in the defence of the Province which must continue to be recognised, and appropriate arrangements should be made to that end. Furthermore, we see great merit in the continuing presence of a local force, with local knowledge, capable of being at instant readiness to deal with such threats in the first instance.

168. Having established the principle of where responsibility should lie for local defence and having given our general view on the type of force required to supplement the regular armed forces stationed in Northern Ireland, we now turn to consider the future of the Ulster Special Constabulary.

169. Except in the city of Belfast, the U.S.C. have been employed on armed duties in relation to the guarding of key points as well as the patrolling of the border, including the establishment of road checks and road blocks, to deal with the types of threat to which we have referred. It is, however, in name a police force operating under the Government of Northern Ireland, controlled by the Inspector-General and, when its services are required, coming under command of the Royal Ulster Constabulary, mainly in its military role.

170. We know that to a man, members of the U.S.C. are devoted to the cause of Ulster and that they and their forbears have done gallant service and we recognise the value of the anti-guerilla patrols and armed guard duties they have carried out, particularly in times of emergency. We consider however that the protection of the border and the State against armed attacks is not a role which should have to be undertaken by the police, whether they be regular or special.

171. To undertake such a role we recommend that—

(a) a locally recruited part-time force, under the command of the G.O.C., Northern Ireland, should be raised as soon as possible for such duties

Her Majesty's Government at Westminster, in consult... ...h the Government of Northern Ireland;

(c) the policy for the use of the force should be decided by the G.O.C., Northern Ireland, in close consultation with the Government of Northern Ireland. Such consultation, we suggest, could best be achieved by the appointment of a Security Committee under the Chairmanship of the Minister of Home Affairs;

(d) the new force, together with the police volunteer reserve, should replace the Ulster Special Constabulary.

172. We believe that the recommendation we have made at (a) and the tting up of the police volunteer reserve we recommended in Chapter 4 ıould provide full opportunity for all sections of the community—not least ose members of the U.S.C. who are both physically and educationally quali-:d to do so—to serve the community in whichever of the two roles they efer.

173. The recommendation at (d) above should not be taken as one which, hen implemented, would so operate as to terminate the services of those embers of the U.S.C. who, for over ten years, have been mobilised for full-ne duty and whose continued embodiment is essential to the regular police rce; nor does it affect members recently mobilised on a short-service basis hose services should be continued until their existing contracts have expired.

174. In conclusion, we would refer to the excellent services rendered to the lster Special Constabulary and the community at large by the permanent and ll-time officers and members of that Force and express the hope that they ll find it possible to continue in office for as long as their services are required. hen that is no longer the case, we would expect that the question of compensa-ın for loss of office, where appropriate, will be given urgent and sympathetic nsideration.

CJ 1 424

Conclusions and Recommendations

175. Before bringing together the recommendations and suggestions for changes in the R.U.C. and for the creation of two separate forces to perform those duties at present carried out by the U.S.C. which we consider will still have to be performed, we would like to preface them by setting out what we regard as the most important considerations upon which efficient enforcement of law and order depends.

176. One of the most important of these must be that the control and administration of any police force should be vested in such manner as will ensure that it will not only be, but will be seen to be, impartial in every sense and that it should be accountable to the public for its actions. Furthermore, in the eyes of the public it must be seen to be civilian in nature and to achieve this it is in our opinion essential that individual police officers should perform their duties without carrying firearms other than for a particular purpose, at a particular time and in a particular locality.

177. Another consideration is that the authorised establishment of any police force should be sufficient to enable it to perform its duties effectively and efficiently. The R.U.C. is, in our view, seriously below effective strength and we regard it as essential that it be brought to full establishment as soon as possible.

178. It is a truism that the morale of a force plays an important part in its general effectiveness and that isolation, even the feeling of isolation, from other forces can have harmful results. Close association with other police forces at all levels is to our mind essential, not only as a means of ensuring that experiences encountered and methods adopted elsewhere can be brought to bear on local problems but also during periods of extreme difficulty of the kind experienced by the R.U.C. in recent months, when the helpful advice and encouragement of fellow police officers in the rest of the United Kingdom would have proved invaluable.

179. We have therefore made a number of recommendations which are designed to bring the R.U.C. into full partnership with their colleagues in Great Britain without in any way shifting the responsibility for law and order in the Province from the Government of Northern Ireland.

180. But close comradeship with other forces is not enough. Public confidence must also be established if morale is to be maintained at a sufficiently high level. We believe that implementation of the recommendations and the suggestions which follow should provide the opportunity for closer and more informal contacts to be established between the R.U.C. and the community. We also believe their implementation should make possible a high degree of co-operation between police and public in the task of maintaining law and order, each becoming equally identified in a common need.

re also envisage.

182. As regards those tasks of a military character which have hitherto been arried out by the Royal Ulster Constabulary and the Ulster Special Constabulary and which are concerned with the protection of the Province from rmed attacks from within or outside its borders, we consider that in principle nd in practice this responsibility should properly rest with Her Majesty's overnment at Westminster.

SUMMARY OF RECOMMENDATIONS

183.

(1) The R.U.C. should be relieved of all duties of a military nature as soon as possible and its contribution to the security of Northern Ireland from subversion should be limited to the gathering of intelligence, the protection of important persons and the enforcement of the relevant laws (paragraph 82).

(2) There should be a Police Authority for Northern Ireland, whose membership should reflect the proportions of different groups in the community (paragraphs 87,88).

(3) The Police Authority should be responsible, subject to the authority of the Minister of Home Affairs, for the establishment and maintenance of an adequate and efficient police force, for the appointment of the chief officer of police and certain senior officers, for buildings, vehicles and clothing (paragraph 89).

(4) The Police Authority should have a particular duty to keep itself informed as to the manner in which complaints against the police are dealt with (paragraph 90).

(5) The chief officer of police should submit an annual report to the Minister of Home Affairs and to the Police Authority (paragraph 92).

(6) The chief officer of police should submit a report on any matter when required to do so by the Minister (paragraph 92).

(7) The Police Authority may require chief officers to retire in the interests of efficiency, subject to certain safeguards (paragraph 92).

(8) The R.U.C. should be subject to inspection by Her Majesty's Inspectorate of Constabulary (paragraph 93).

(9) A Police Advisory Board should be established for consultation between the Minister, the Police Authority, and all ranks of the force (paragraph 94).

(10) The need to retain some police stations in border areas should be reviewed (paragraph 96).

(11) The rank structure should be reviewed (paragraph 97).

(12) The maximum term of duty in the Reserve Force should be three years (paragraph 100).

(13) When the Reserve Force has to be deployed for crowd control, overtime should be payable where appropriate to all ranks (paragraph 100).

HS1 · 425

(16) The present po[illegible] for the general issue and carrying of firearms should be phased out as soon as possible (paragraph 102).

(17) Certain weapons should be no longer part of the equipment of the R.U.C. (paragraph 102).

(18) The effective strength of the force should be increased as a first priority (paragraph 104).

(19) The establishment of women police should be reviewed (paragraph 105).

(20) A volunteer reserve police force should be set up (paragraph 109).

(21) The establishment of a Cadet Corps should be considered (paragraph 111).

(22) There should be O. & M. studies of the administrative process so as to reduce the time spent by members of the force on duties which could be done by civilians, or where modern equipment would help (paragraph 112).

(23) The extent to which the police are engaged on extraneous duties or by private employers should be examined (paragraph 113).

(24) Armoured cars should cease to be part of the equipment of the R.U.C. (paragraph 114).

(25) The building programme should be reviewed (paragraph 117).

(26) The practice of reserving a specific proportion of vacancies in the force for Roman Catholics should be discontinued (paragraph 124).

(27) Vigorous efforts should be made to increase the number of Roman Catholic entrants into the force (paragraph 124).

(28) The establishment of a central recruiting office at Police Headquarters, with a branch at Londonderry, and supported by nominated officers at County Headquarters and mobile touring teams, should be considered (paragraph 126).

(29) Simplified application forms should be available at all police stations; in particular, applicants should not be required to disclose their religion on their initial applications (paragraph 126).

(30) The programme of talks to sixth-formers should be extended and use should be made of other publicity media (paragraph 126).

(31) The possibility of acquiring accommodation for training in Great Britain should be examined (paragraph 128).

(32) The Home Office and the Scottish Home and Health Department should be asked to consider sympathetically any applications for places on courses of higher training (paragraph 130).

(33) The procedure for dealing with complaints against the police should be changed (paragraph 133).

(34) The chief officer of police should be made vicariously liable for wrongful acts committed by members of the force (paragraph 133).

improve public relations (paragraph 137).

(37) A police liaison committee should be set up in Londonderry (paragraph 139).

(38) The closure of certain small stations in difficult urban areas and in some rural areas should be reconsidered (paragraph 140).

(39) The colour of the uniform should be changed to blue (paragraph 141).

(40) Sergeants and constables throughout the force should wear numbers on their uniforms, as is already the practice in Belfast and Londonderry (paragraph 141).

(41) The name of the force should not be changed (paragraph 141).

(42) The Scottish system of independent public prosecutors should be adopted (paragraph 142).

(43) There should be closer co-operation between the R.U.C. and the Home Office Police Research and Development Branch (paragraph 149).

(44) Arrangements should be made for interchanges of personnel between the R.U.C. and forces on the mainland (paragraph 150).

(45) Members of the R.U.C. should be encouraged to apply for posts with mainland forces, and vice versa (paragraph 150).

(46) The Central Representative Body should be reorganised and associated with the representative organisations in Great Britain, so that members of the force can have the same right to be consulted about their pay, etc., as members of police forces in Great Britain (paragraph 150).

(47) A locally recruited part-time force, under the control of the G.O.C., Northern Ireland, should be raised as soon as possible for such duties as may be laid upon it. The force, together with the police volunteer reserve, should replace the Ulster Special Constabulary (paragraph 171).

SUGGESTIONS

184.

(a) The power of the Minister of Home Affairs to prohibit processions and meetings should be exercised in consultation with the chief officer of police and the Police Authority (paragraph 91).

(b) The Crime Branches should be examined (paragraph 98).

(c) Training in crowd control should be given throughout the force (paragraph 100).

(d) The control rooms at Belfast and Londonderry should be adapted or replaced (paragraph 115).

(e) The adoption of the system of qualification for promotion used in England and Wales should be considered (paragraph 131).

COMMUNIQUE

A meeting was held at No. 10 Downing Street this evening between the Prime Minister, Mr. Harold Wilson, the Foreign and Commonwealth Secretary, Mr. Michael Stewart, the Home Secretary, Mr. James Callaghan, the Secretary of State for Defence, Mr. Denis Healey, and the Minister of State at the Home Office, Lord Stonham, and the Prime Minister of Northern Ireland, Major Chichester-Clark, the Deputy Prime Minister, Mr. J. L. 0. Andrews, the Minister of Home Affairs, Mr. R. W. Porter, and the Minister of Development, Mr. Brian Faulkner.

In a six-hour discussion the whole situation in Northern Ireland was reviewed. It was agreed that the GOC Northern Ireland will with immediate effect assume overall responsibility for security operations. He will continue to be responsible directly to the Ministry of Defence but will work in the closest co-operation with the Northern Ireland Government and the Inspector-General of the Royal Ulster Constabulary. For all security operations the GOC will have full control of the deployment and tasks of the Royal Ulster Constabulary. For normal police duties outside the field of security the Royal Ulster Constabulary will remain answerable to the Inspector-General who will be responsible to the Northern Ireland Government.

The GOC will assume full command and control of the Ulster Special Constabulary for all purposes including their organisation, deployment, tasks and arms. Their employment by the Northern Ireland Government in riot and crowd control was always envisaged as a purely temporary measure. With the increased deployment of the Army and the assumption by the GOC of operational control of all the security forces, it will be possible for the Special Constabulary to be progressively and rapidly relieved of these temporary duties at his discretion, starting in the cities. The question of the custody of Special Constabulary arms will similarly be within his discretion. Consideration will be given to the problem of country areas and the defence of vital public service installations.

The Northern Ireland Ministers agreed that an appeal should be made to all members of the public to hand in unauthorised weapons under an amnesty.

FS-1 · 430

In order that British troops can be withdrawn from the internal security role at the earliest possible moment the two Governments will discuss as a matter of urgency the future of the civilian security services of Northern Ireland which will take over when the troops withdraw.

Major Chichester-Clark said that it was the intention of the Northern Ireland Government to set up forthwith an impartial investigation into the recent grave public disorders. Further details will be announced very shortly by the Northern Ireland Minister of Home Affairs.

The United Kingdom Ministers proposed and the Northern Ireland Ministers readily agreed that two senior civil servants from London should be temporarily stationed with the Northern Ireland Government in Belfast to represent the increased concern which the United Kingdom Government had necessarily acquired in Northern Ireland affairs through the commitment of the Armed Forces in the present conditions.

The question of detainees was discussed.

The two Governments agreed to a joint Declaration on the principles which should govern their future actions.

The Ministers agreed to meet again early in September.

10 Downing Street, S.W.1,
19th August, 1969.

DECLARATION

(1) The United Kingdom Government re-affirm that nothing which has happened in recent weeks in Northern Ireland derogates from the clear pledges made by successive United Kingdom Governments that Northern Ireland should not cease to be a part of the United Kingdom without the consent of the people of Northern Ireland or from the provision in Section I of the Ireland Act 1949 that in no event will Northern Ireland or any part thereof cease to be part of the United Kingdom without the consent of the Parliament of Northern Ireland. The Border is not an issue.

(2) The United Kingdom Government again affirm that responsibility for affairs in Northern Ireland is entirely a matter of domestic jurisdiction. The United Kingdom Government will take full responsibility for asserting this principle in all international relationships.

(3) The United Kingdom Government have ultimate responsibility for the protection of those who live in Northern Ireland when, as in the past week, a breakdown of law and order has occurred. In this spirit, the United Kingdom Government responded to the requests of the Northern Ireland Government for military assistance in Londonderry and Belfast in order to restore law and order. They emphasise again that troops will be withdrawn when law and order has been restored.

(4) The Northern Ireland Government have been informed that troops have been provided on a temporary basis in accordance with the United Kingdom's ultimate responsibility. In the context of the commitment of these troops, the Northern Ireland Government have re-affirmed their intention to take into the fullest account at all times the views of Her Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom, especially in relation to matters affecting the status of citizens of that part of the United Kingdom and their equal rights and protection under the law.

(5) The United Kingdom Government have welcomed the decisions of the Northern Ireland Government in relation to Local Government franchise, the revision of Local Government areas, the allocation of houses, the creation of a Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration in Northern Ireland and machinery to consider citizens' grievances against other public authorities which the, Prime Minister reported to the House of Commons at Westminster following his meeting with Northern Ireland Ministers on May 21 [1969] as demonstrating the determination of the Northern Ireland Government that there shall be full equality of treatment for all citizens. Both Governments have agreed that it is vital that the momentum of internal reform should be maintained.

(6) The two Governments at their meeting at 10 Downing Street today [19 August 1969] have re-affirmed that in all legislation and executive decisions of Government every citizen of Northern Ireland is entitled to the same equality of treatment and freedom from discrimination as obtains in the rest of the United Kingdom irrespective of political views or religion. In their further meetings the two Governments will be guided by these mutually accepted principles.

(7) Finally, both Governments are determined to take all possible steps to restore normality to the Northern Ireland community so that economic development can proceed at the faster rate which is vital for social stability.

November O'Neill, under pressure from the publicity surrounding the October march, announced a reform programme which included proroguing the Londonderry Corporation; a Development Commission was appointed to run the City. In December O'Neill successfully appealed for calm (see Chapter 5) and was supported by the Nationalist Party, the DCAC and other 'moderates' in the civil rights movement. At the end of 1968 the DCAC had been largely successful in policing and organising demonstrations, but in 1969 its grip weakened as the conflict took on a more sectarian tone.

In January 1969 a small left-wing student group, the People's Democracy, defied a NICRA moratorium and organised a march from Belfast to Derry. The march was attacked repeatedly and at Burntollet was ambushed by loyalists with clubs; approximately half of these were off-duty members of the B Specials (a part-time overwhelming Protestant force with a reputation for sectarianism). The violence which met the Burntollet marchers in January 1969 reinforced the shifting focus of debate in Northern Ireland from political and economic issues to the more sensitive issue of reform of the state's security apparatus (Bew and Patterson 1985 pp. 16–18). Following police violence republicans established 'Free Derry' by organising local vigilante committees and barricades to keep out the RUC. The DCAC were appalled by this, 'But blood was up and there was nothing they could do about it' (McCann 1974 p. 53). By early 1969 republicans could see the advantage of Catholic mobilisation for achieving Irish unity (Ó Dochartaigh 1997 pp. 46–7).

Marches were continuing but were provoking serious confrontations with the RUC and getting out of control of the DCAC. In April 1969 Samuel Devenney was beaten by police and later died. After April it was difficult 'to organize a demonstration which did not end in riot', but 'by ending the demonstrations the moderates took away from the youth any channel for expression other than riot. The rage and frustration which lay just beneath the surface of life in the Bogside could no longer be contained within the thin shell of the [D]CAC's timid respectability' (McCann 1974 pp. 57–8). The agenda was shifting away from civil rights towards RUC brutality and the need to defend nationalist areas. Young rioters now ignored the persuasion of moderates or republicans to desist from attacks on the RUC (McCann 1974, Ó Dochartaigh 1997 pp. 40–1, 53, 115).

The hope of republicans and socialists that confrontation with the Stormont Government would produce a united working-class movement of Protestants and Catholics quickly appeared to be

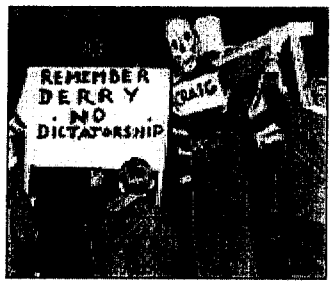
EARLY DAYS

For the first 18 months of its existence NICRA was nothing more than a pressure group. Its main activity was writing letters to the Government, mainly to Bill Craig as Minister of Home Affairs, complaining about harassment of political and social dissidents ranging from Republicans to itinerants. But it rarely went beyond the stage of dignified written protest. The Government's reply - when it came - was usually one of denying that a particular abuse had occurred and suggesting that even if the NICRA allegation was true, there was probably a very good reason for the abuse.

It was a time of frustration for NICRA. O'Neill, by polishing civic weeks to a fine art, had pushed discrimination to a high degree of sophistication.

FIRST A.G.M.

NICRA's most important advance in the period was to hold its first annual general meeting in February 1968, which produced a few new faces, but little in the way of a concerted civil rights campaign. The new faces were John McAnerney [Campaign for Social Justice], Frank Campbell [Republican], Peter Morris [no affiliation], Jim Quinn [no affiliation], Frank Gogarty [Wolfe Tone Society], and Rebecca McGlade [Republican]. They replaced Bennett, Harris, Banks, O'Brien, Dolley and Devlin. Robin Cole [Unionist] was re-elected with the highest number of votes but he later resigned from the executive. Betty Sinclair became the new chairman. But a change of executive brought little initial change to a political situation in which the Government carried on with its "not an inch" policy.



1968. Dublin demonstration against brutality on October 5th in Derry at Civil Rights March.

The situation would have probably continued to the present day had the decision to take the struggle to the streets not been made. Street violence was nothing new in Northern Ireland, but street politics were. Marching was something which both Orange and Republican organisations indulged in. Government Ministers often took part in the former and usually banned the latter.

In April 1968, for example, the Annual Republican Easter Parade in Armagh was banned, the excuse being that a Paisley prayer meeting was planned for the same day along the route.

Marches were therefore a physical manifestation of Northern Ireland politics and the recognised territorial divisions of the two sectarian groups meant that marching had become a form of sectarian one-up-man-ship. That NICRA should take to the streets was a proposal to consider seriously.

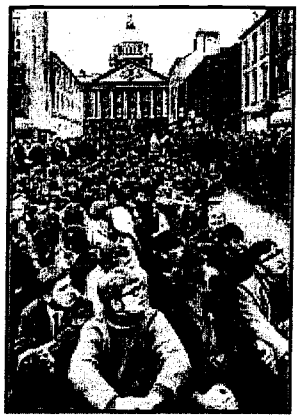
It was the Government's ban on marches which forced NICRA into holding street demonstrations. After the ban on the Easter Parade in Armagh NICRA attended a Republican organised Rally Saturday after Easter [April 20] to protest against the ban on parades and a week later there was another meeting at the same spot to protest against the ban on Republican Clubs. Speakers at this meeting included Rev. Albert McElroy, leader of the Liberal Party, Eddie McAteer, leader of the Nationalist Party, and Austin Currie MP. NICRA was slowly coming to realise that a ban on street demonstrations was an effective Government weapon against political protest, and that although letter writing to Stormont was a fine form of occupational therapy, it was unlikely to bring any worthwhile results.

THE CALEDON SQUAT

Direct action in politics had begun. In June, members of the Brantry Republican Club and Austin Currie squatted in a house in Caledon, Co. Tyrone, which they believed had been unfairly allocated. Since there was no impartial administrative mechanism by which house allocation could be made, and since there was no method of appeal against administrative malpractice, the only course open to those wishing to object to a Government policy was direct action. In July members of the Derry Housing Action Committee continued the campaign for impartial house allocation by blocking Craigavon Bridge and 17 of them were arrested. The time for NICRA's direct action had come.



9th October, 1968. Students from Queens University Belfast hold a 3½ hour sit-down' protest against police brutality in Derry on October 5th during civil rights march. After their protest delegation was allowed to see members of the Cabinet. They presented them with the following demands: one man, one role, repeal of the Special Powers Act, the Public Order Act and the Flags and Emblems Act, the introduction of a Parliamentary Commissioner, a Human Rights Bill to be made law, the introduction of a points system for housing allocation, electoral boundaries to be re-drawn fairly, an impartial inquiry into police brutality in Derry on October 5th, and jobs to be allocated on the basis of ability.

from Queens University picketing the home of William Craig, the Minister of Home Affairs who banned the October 5th March in Derry and ordered the police baton charges.

The first civil rights march took place from Coalisland to Dungannon on Saturday August 14, 1968. It was organised to protest against housing allocation in the area and it was supported by more than 2,000 people. NICRA's march was faced with over 1,000 supporters of an organisation known as the Protestant Volunteers, a group politically inspired by Ian Paisley and para-militarily groomed by Major Ronald Bunting.

The police protected the civil rights marchers with minimum cover and denied them access to the town square. A few of the marchers were injured. Gerry Fitt and Austin Currie were present and Fitt later made a special report to the Prime Minister, Harold Wilson, in which he complained about the role of the police. The marchers sang "We shall Overcome" before they broke up.

As a march the Coalisland to Dungannon journey was nothing more than another one in Northern Ireland's lengthy list of marches, but as a political event this march can be firmly marked as an historical occasion which was to shape the future political development of Northern Ireland. On the day it achieved little, but in retrospect it was the signal for the beginning of the biggest mass movement seen in Ireland this century. On Monday September 2nd NICRA announced that a march would be held in Derry at some time in the future to protest about the housing situation in the city, unemployment, local government reform and the right of free speech and assembly. The march was eventually planned for October 5th, and it came as no surprise to anyone when the Apprentice Boys of Derry gave notice of a ceremony which they intended to hold on the same day along the same route. Bill Craig banned both and NICRA decided to go ahead.

FIRST BLOOD IS SHED

October 5 in Derry witnessed the first bloodshed in the present violence in Northern Ireland. The blood was that of many of the 2,000 marchers who defied Craig's ban. It was spilled by RUC batons and among those injured was Gerry Fitt. Three other Westminster MPs, Russel Kerr, Ann Kerr and John Ryan witnessed the events. They saw the police baton the leading marchers in Duke Street and they saw that as the marchers turned to go back down the street they were ambushed by another company of police. Although only 2,000 people were present, the film of the brutality taken by an RTE cameraman flashed around the living rooms of Northern Ireland and the political upheaval feared by Unionists for fifty years had begun.

Prior to the Derry march the civil rights campaign had attracted the support only of the politically conscious. It was not a mass movement in the sense that it attracted massive support. Its non-violent methods and its refusal to equate civil rights with Irish nationalism made it virtually an unknown quantity in politics. But Bill Craig's police force stamped the authenticity of NICRA as a broad movement on the heads of the people in Duke Street and on the hearts of the television public. The Government's political justification for the Duke Street police ambush was that NICRA was a subversive organisation intent on destroying the state.

It was the traditional Unionist response to any attempt at democratic progress but with NICRA's demands sticking rigidly to a policy of political reform and ignoring completely the issue of the state's existence, the Stormont Government had made its first wrong move in retaining power in nearly 50 years. Nothing would ever be the same again. Almost 90 people were treated in hospital for injuries sustained at the hands of the police and the first minor riots in Derry began over the week-end. In the political field events moved fast.

NICRA BEGINS TO GROW

In Derry a Citizens Action Committee was formed with Ivan Cooper as chairman and John Hume as vice-chairman. Although the nucleus of the Derry Committee had been involved in the planning of the Derry march, much of the support for the new organisation was based on a reaction to the police violence. Elsewhere in the province local civil rights groups sprang up in solidarity with NICRA and although they gave the NICRA executive some headaches through the holding of unauthorised street activities, they were a welcome illustration of the upsurge in popular support. In Queen's Univerity the Derry violence had coincided with the relaxed atmosphere at the beginning of the first term and, shocked by what they had seen on television, many of the students joined in a spontaneous march from the University to the City Hall in protest against police brutality in Derry. The march ended with a sit-down in Linenhall Street at the back of the City Hall and the afternoon 's events gave rise to an informal organisation in the University. It was called the People's Democracy (PD).

16th November, 1968. Second Civil Rights March held in Derry City. 15,000 people attended the march which halted at the police barriers at the entrance to the Walls. Later a "token" walk through was staged by one or two members at the barriers. No incidents occurred and the entire crowd walked individually to the "Diamond" where a "sit-down" was staged.

Although essentially a product of the civil rights campaign, the PD was made up of politically naive students who eventually found leadership in the politically aware personalities of Michael Farrell, Kevin Boyle, Cyril Toman and Bernadette Devlin.

Although PD grew out of a genuine desire for civil rights by a broad section of the student population, its leadership aimed it in the general direction of a socialist political philosophy and away from what they regarded as reformism. In the whale's belly that was Queen's, cut off from the outside world, the students were easily led from reform to revolution in a matter of weeks and PD declined into a narrow, politically sectarian organisation united only by the politics of impatience. Initiated into politics by the need for civil rights they decided that only socialism could provide such rights and immediately demanded socialism. Like the Nationalist Party they confused the demand for civil rights in the existing state with a demand for a specific form of government which only the abolition of the state could provide.

But in the political atmosphere in the autumn of 1968 the umbrella demand was civil rights. Several groups sprang up throughout the country and the support for NICRA's campaign was expressed at another march in Derry on November 16. The RUC's use of batons against the 2,000 in October produced a massive turn-out of 20,000 in November, especially in view of Craig's banning the march. A new demand was now chanted at civil rights marches: "Craig Out".

UNIONISTS IN RETREAT

The Unionist Government was in retreat. O'Neill was in trouble on several fronts. Inside the Cabinet there was opposition to Craig's heavy handed tactics in dealing with the first Derry march, an opposition not based on humanitarian grounds, but founded rather on the adverse publicity which the incidents received. O'Neill was also in trouble with the extreme right wing of his own party in Stormont, which was expressed on the streets in the form of Paisley and his mobs. Relations between the Catholic community and O'Neill were also in decline and the RUC had destroyed in ten minutes what years of civic weeks had built up. But the most important front on which O'Neill was in difficulties was in his relations with Westminster. The Campaign for Democracy in Ulster had prepared the groundwork for concern about civil rights in Northern Ireland and the cut on Gerry Fitt's head brought the issue into the House of Commons. Westminster was concerned that peace was not being maintained and on November 4, Prime Minister Harold Wilson summoned O'Neill to London.

With O'Neill went Craig and Faulkner - Craig because he was the Minister for Home Affairs, Faulkner because he was the brightest boy in O'Neill's Stormont class. As Wilson later said in the Commons he thought that political reform in Northern Ireland had been "a bit too moderate so far", but in a five point plan of reform sent to O'Neill on November 21, Wilson proved that he too was moderate on the issue. The "reforms" included the abolition of the company vote in local government elections, the appointment of an Ombudsman at some future date, re-organisation of local government by 1971, a recommendation -nothing stronger - to local authorities to reform their housing allocation procedures and the establishment of a commission to run Derry in place of the Corporation. It was an empty gesture by Wilson. Derry had gone from "One Man, One Vote" to "One Man, No Vote" with the abolition of the Corporation, the Ombudsman might never come and although the company vote had been abolished, the property qualification had not. One man could still have more than one vote. Wilson's concern for Civil rights proved as strong as that of O'Neill.

Meanwhile back on the streets NICRA continued to march. Despite a take-over of Armagh city centre by Paisley and his followers in the early hours of November 30, a civil rights march planned for the city that day went ahead. Its route was blocked and a meeting was held at the RUC barrier. A lawful march had been halted by an illegal meeting and the RUC - the para-military arm of the Unionist Government - was either unwilling or unable to do anything about it. Things were rapidly coming to a head in politics. Craig had become isolated in the Cabinet. In December he said "When you have a Roman Catholic majority, you have a lesser standard of democracy", and O'Neill effectively decided to remove him from office. Before doing so he made his famous "Ulster at the Crossroads" speech on television on December 9. Armed with an upswing in public support he had the confidence to sack Craig two days later. There were two reactions to the speech and the sacking. The PD decided to form a number of extra-mural branches as soon as the reforms were announced and the following day, for example, they held a meeting in Dungannon to gloat at Craig's sacking. The reaction of NICRA was much different. They decided to give O'Neill one last chance and they declared a "truce" for one month without marches or demonstrations.

TO DEFUSE SECTARIANISM

The NICRA decision was arrived at after much discussion on the Executive Committee. The course of action was finally agreed upon for two reasons:

1. the promised reforms must be given a chance to work, both for their own sake and for the credibility of the whole principle of civil rights demands, and

2. the chances of sectarian violence were growing by the day and anything which might defuse the situation would be welcome.

The year ended peacefully. In the period from August to December the civil rights campaign had managed to split the Unionist cabinet, arouse concern at British cabinet level, bring thousands of people demanding civil rights on to the streets and produce a general public awareness of the lack of democracy and a political programme for its introduction. On the negative side it had aroused extreme Protestant reaction as a result not only of the marches but also of the Government's political reactions and it had given rise to an impatient group of students seeking instant revolution in a text book society. In the light of the influence of the organisation since its beginnings, this four month period put NICRA in the vanguard of the struggle for civil and human rights in N. Ireland. But there was still a long way to go.

down by high emigration. Under present conditions, however, emigration is no longer necessarily an option. The economic crisis is now international and there are fewer jobs available in Britain and elsewhere for would-be emigrants. So, many Catholics who would otherwise have left, have remained at home to swell the ranks of the unemployed.

The spectacular loss of jobs in the mainly Protestant industries, such as engineering and artificial fibres, has been accompanied by massive losses of Catholic jobs in such industries as clothing and construction. 7. POLITICAL CONTEXT

7.1.1. The political context within which decisions were taken in advance of Bloody Sunday was defined and governed by a number of relationships and dynamics. Primarily in the frame were the British government in London, the Northern Ireland government in Belfast, and the British Army. The interaction between these entities, the individuals who led them and the pressures exerted by and on them shaped the background to the events of Bloody Sunday

7.1.2. As has been seen, the British government, despite having ultimate responsibility for what took place in Northern Ireland preferred, by and large, to take a "hands-off" approach and leave the governing of that jurisdiction to the Northern Ireland government. During the period at issue for this Tribunal however, the escalating crisis in Northern Ireland was the subject of much international concern and required the commitment of a large number of troops. The British Government could therefore no longer ignore it. By 1971 the British Government had become directly involved in attempts to find a political solution to Northern Ireland's problems, while at the same time attempting to avoid the imposition of direct rule and maintain its distance from the actual government of Northern Ireland.

7.1.3. The British Government's objective was therefore to maintain the devolved system of government in Northern Ireland by the agreement of a political initiative that was acceptable to both the majority and minority communities. This objective was frustrated by a number of factors including

(i) The intransigence of the ruling Ulster Unionist party;
(ii) The opposition to reform within the unionist community generally and;
(iii)The impact of the deteriorating security situation.

7.1.4. In these circumstances and taking into account their overall objective of maintaining the devolved administration at Stormont the British Government

i) Failed to give any or adequate political direction to the Army;
ii) Failed to clarify the source of the Army's political direction;
iii) Allowed a situation to develop where, because of the lack of clarity in relation to the Army's political direction, the Northern Ireland Government had direct access to the Army and applied pressure for its own political ends;
iv) Appeased and bolstered the Northern Ireland government by agreeing to measures such as the introduction of internment;
v) Showed unwavering support for the Army in the face of allegations of brutality and murder.

7.1.5. As a result the army was susceptible to the pressures applied to them by the Northern Ireland Government. The failure of the British Government to respond (i) appropriately to the demands of the Northern Ireland government and (ii) in circumstances where the actions of the army were a matter of grave concern, created a climate where both parties had the freedom to act with a certain amount of latitude and according to their own agendas.

7.1.6. This section provides an outline of the political background to the events of Bloody Sunday and an analysis of the context within which the decisions relating to that march were taken. The extent of the governments' knowledge of the plans for Operation Forecast and the decisions taken by them in relation to that operation are discussed in Section twelve.

7.2. The Objectives of the British Government

7.2.1. What is abundantly clear from the material before the Tribunal is that the British Government's objective was to ensure that Northern Ireland continued to be governed by its own administration from Stormont[1].

7.2.2. This objective would only be achieved by securing Brian Faulkner's position and avoiding the need for direct rule to be imposed. Direct rule, once imposed, would be indefinite and would mean a huge military and financial commitment for the British, not to mention the time and effort that would be necessary to govern Northern Ireland. In a situation where soldiers had become targets and precious military resources were being diverted to Northern Ireland the British government also sought to ensure the speedy withdrawal of the army[2].

7.2.3. If, however, direct rule was to be imposed (and as time went on it seemed inevitable) then the British Government's wish was that it be imposed under conditions which were most favourable to them. They feared that the imposition of direct rule, or some action short of direct rule, would provoke a Protestant backlash, that the support of police and civil servants would be lost and that the British Army and government would assume responsibility for Northern Ireland in circumstances where they would, politically and militarily, be fighting a war on two fronts. They therefore had to attempt to find a solution to the problems in Northern Ireland while all the time keeping the unionist population placated to ensure that the conditions for direct rule, should it become necessary, were as favourable as possible.

7.2.4. Despite the Government's objectives however it is clear that, from an early stage, direct rule was a distinct possibility. Many appeared to see it as the logical next step after the deployment of the army on the streets in

[1] Giving evidence Dr Robert Ramsay indicated that he believed that at that stage the British Government had not yet come "to the unspoken, unwritten, underlying policy assumption, which a future senior official of the Northern Ireland office described to me as being a policy of 'incremental disengagement'" Day 215/30/9 to Day 215/30/20

[2] When Anthony Stephens gave evidence to the Tribunal he said "whether or not they kept Mr Faulkner in power, it would be a useful thing, to put it mildly, if the involvement of the Army were to some extent reduced" Day 273/53/25 to Day 273/54/3

Northern Ireland. Indeed the CGS himself suggested that responsibility for security policy should be transferred to Westminster[3]. With this in mind therefore, the British Government was making contingency plans for direct rule from as early as September 1969 (the month after troops were deployed). By the end of 1971 a fairly advanced plan was in place Day 271/80/19.[4]

7.2.5. Given that Brian Faulkner was seen to be the last Prime Minister standing between Northern Ireland and direct rule the British government had no choice but to work closely with him. Some within the government had serious reservations about his ability to deliver progress. Reporting in June 1971 to the Home Secretary Reginald Maudling the UK Representative in Northern Ireland, Howard Smith, expressed the view that Brian Faulkner was not trusted, by Catholics because of his political background or by Unionists because they feared his ambition would lead to a betrayal of their interests Report from H Smith to the Home Secretary. 10 June 1971 G1AA.19.1.1 to G1AA.19.1.10 at G1AA.19.1.1.

7.2.6. Expressing his own reservations, Smith indicated that he believed Faulkner overemphasised the issue of security to the near exclusion of reform and that he saw the problem as essentially, a security one. This overemphasis of the security issue, led, in turn to dissatisfaction among many within Unionism who, the more the issue was emphasised, the more discontented they became with progress on that front. Report from H Smith to the Home Secretary. 10 June 1971 G1AA.19.1.1 to G1AA.19.1.10 at G1AA.19.1.2.

[3] Minute of meeting of the Northern Ireland Policy Group 22 December 1971 G44B.282.4 to G44B.282.9 at G44B.282.4

[4] For example, at the GEN 47 meeting of 29th October 1971 Sir Phillip Allen reported that "...he had set up a new division in the Home Office whose main task would be to handle contingency planning for direct rule and to engage in long term political planning" G22C.163.5 to G22C.163.8 at G22C.163.8

"Whether or not Mr Faulkner is up to scratch we have to make the best we can of him, and I think he can be got to do a tolerable job if we handle him right. The heart of the matter is his assessment of the pressures, which bear upon him and his resolution in pursuing a policy appropriate to the problem of Northern Ireland and acceptable to the United Kingdom government. He is a short term thinker and if he assumes, as I think he does, that the problem of the minority is first and foremost a problem of weeding out the violent elements, that is to say it is...primarily a security problem, the main political pressure which he feels is the threat to his position from the extremists in his own party and from Mr Paisley. He is therefore tempted to see his policy in terms of countering this political threat and in this lies the danger that he will fall down on reform." Report from H Smith to the Home Secretary. 10 June 1971 G1AA.19.1.1 to G1AA.19.1.10 at G1AA.19.1.7 (emphasis added)

7.2.8. There were also concerns among the British establishment about those working with Mr Faulkner. Mr Smith also commented,

"I suspect that Mr Faulkner could be more efficiently served by parts of his own Governmental machine and I have already indicated that some of his Ministers are not sufficiently house trained. Report from H Smith to the Home Secretary. 10 June 1971 G1AA.19.1.1 to G1AA.19.1.10 at G1AA.19.1.7

7.2.9. In addition, the GOC had his own concerns

"General Tuzo said that Commander Anderson was proving an embarrassment. His appointment had been made without any consultation or prior discussion with the army. He saw himself as a kind of Inspector-General of the UDR and if given access to members of the force would undoubtedly try to make mischief. He was both foolish and reactionary." Note of the Home Secretary's Meeting with GOC & other senior officers at Lisburn. 14 December 1971 G40.259 to G40.261 at G40.261.[5]

7.2.9.1. Despite these reservations, however, the British government worked with Brian Faulkner and, publicly at least, presented a united front with him. In turn Faulkner was relying on the British Government's fears that he was their last hope and their reluctance to assume responsibility for Northern Ireland to ensure that he was in a position to steer Government policy in whatever direction he chose.

"He may have calculated that the United Kingdom Government is anxious at all costs to keep him in office and will not press him very strongly to get ahead with putting the reform legislation into practice. If that is his conclusion and if it is not corrected, the joint declaration of the 19th August 1969 may become a dead letter. If that were to happen the consequences not least for Mr Faulkner himself do not need spelling out." Report from H Smith to the Home Secretary. 10 June 1971 G1AA.19.1.1 to G1AA.19.1.10 at G1AA.19.1.7

7.2.10. Realistically, the only means of avoiding the imposition of direct rule or imposing direct rule in the most favourable conditions and ensuring the early withdrawal of troops was for the British Government to use its position to work towards a political settlement which had the agreement of the majority and minority communities in Northern Ireland. Sir Arthur Hockaday agreed when giving evidence that in the lead up to Bloody Sunday the British Government's favoured plan for Northern Ireland was to keep Brian Faulkner in power which, they recognised, would require

[5]Giving evidence Lord Kilclooney remarked on the GOC's comments "...he was getting rather personal there. Commander Anderson, I knew him quite well, he was a Member of Parliament for this city; he obviously had been – he was an ex-serviceman and a real gentleman and I was sorry to see these somewhat slighting comments about him" Day 196/57/7 to Day 196/57/12

some kind of political initiative to deal with the grievances of the Catholic and nationalist population. Day 271/80/12 [6]

7.2.11. By 5th October 1971 however, it appeared clear that at least some in Government were resigned to direct rule, as a memo emanating from the Ministry of Defence makes clear

> "S of S may wish to suggest that the undesirability of direct rule should be given more weight than hitherto as a factor in deciding policy. The Home Office incline to think that direct rule is inevitable, and that it is more important to seek the most favourable time for imposing it." Memorandum from AUS(GS) on meeting with Prime Minister of Northern Ireland 5 October 1971 G14C.86.16 to G14C.86.19 at G14C.86.19

7.3. Protestant Backlash?

7.3.1 Whether the British government achieved its preferred option of the maintenance of devolved government in Northern Ireland or had to settle for the imposition of direct rule, the success of either option depended on avoiding a "Protestant backlash" Day 271/81/13.

7.3.1. The "Protestant backlash" theory appears to have been based on the potential for an adverse reaction by the unionist community in Northern Ireland to action taken by the governments towards political change. The fear was that the police, civil service and prison staff, amongst others, could take action in the form of non co-operation or that violent action could be taken by loyalist paramilitaries.

[6] Anthony Stephens called the government's introduction of political reforms in tandem with its objective of maintaining devolved government in Northern Ireland an attempt to "fine tune" the status quo Day 273/27/6 to Day 273/27/7

7.3.2. The British assessment was that the potential for a Protestant backlash existed in relation to both the actions of the Northern Ireland government and the British government.

7.3.3. In relation to the Northern Ireland government, opposition was primarily expected, and materialised, in respect of two issues – security and reform. Lack of improvement in the security situation brought warnings that unionists would be forced to take the law into their own hands. The forming of a third force was threatened, as to which see Section 7.7 below.

7.3.4. Secondly the question of political reform was not well received by the unionist population. Particularly in the context of an IRA campaign, proposals for reform were seen as capitulation to the IRA and their supporters, the enemies of Ulster.

7.3.5. In relation to the actions of the British Government however, it was expected that the worst possible reaction would come if direct rule was imposed,

> "in the event of Direct Rule the co-operation to be expected from the Civil Service, the public utility services etc., would be less than has hitherto been assumed in London. This renders the Direct Rule option even less palatable than we have hitherto supposed. Moreover it is at least possible that a situation in which the Army was either fighting both sides in the middle of a civil war, or (with whatever help was available from GB police, prison service etc.) having virtually to run Northern Ireland would, quite apart from its military implications, be very difficult to sustain in British political terms. From his assessment of the possible implications of direct Rule SoS is even more impressed than before with the importance of keeping Mr Faulkner in power as the only apparent alternative to Direct Rule." Memorandum from AUS

(GS) on meeting with Prime Minster of Northern Ireland G14C.86.016 to G14C.86.019 at G14C.86.018.

7.3.6. The possibility of a Protestant backlash would present serious problems for the British Government, whether direct rule had been imposed or not, in the form of commitment of larger numbers of troops and resources to Northern Ireland. It is clear however that for the Secretary of State for Defence at least, direct rule was seen to be the worst of all options

> "....(2)Direct Rule would represent an even more appalling strain on our resources than we have hitherto been prepared to contemplate.
> (3)We must therefore redouble our efforts to ensure that Mr Faulkner remains in power." Memorandum from Sir Burke Trend to the Prime Minister. 5th October 1971. G14D.86.20 to G14D.86.23 at G14D.86.20

7.3.7. This can also be seen from Sir Arthur Hockaday's paper of 31st December 1971 where he notes

> "The question of the "Protestant backlash" is perennial; and many political decisions, from non-implementation of Home Rule in 1914 through partition in 1921 to internment in 1971, have been taken primarily to satisfy Protestant opinion. The restraint of the Protestant community has been notable while the security forces have been operating mainly in Catholic areas: would it last if Westminster decided to bring the present Stormont system to an end?...the possibility of armed Protestant resistance cannot be excluded". Memorandum from AUS(GS) enclosing draft minutes and brief for Secretary of State, 31 December 1971 G45A.285.1 to G45A.285.16 at G45A.284.13. (emphasis added)

7.3.8. While this was the British assessment of the position it is not clear that in fact a "Protestant backlash" on the scale feared was ever a realistic possibility. Giving evidence to the Tribunal Dr Robert Ramsay, when asked about the possibility of a Protestant backlash in relation to the policing of the march on Bloody Sunday, said "I mean that was always threatened because – the threat was always there for political reasons and sometimes it materialised and sometimes it did not." Day 215/39/21 to Day 215/39/24.

7.3.9. Lord Kilclooney, when asked about the possibility that the Northern Ireland civil service might have refused to co-operate under direct rule, said,

> "I heard that but never any evidence of it, and of course it was not correct, the Northern Ireland Civil Service remained totally impartial and loyal to whoever was the Government" Day 196/124/7 to Day 196/124/14

7.4. The Proposed Political Initiative

7.4.1. In order therefore to achieve the balance needed to reach their desired political outcome the British Government had to

(i) Keep the unionist population on board by ensuring that NI remained part of the UK and not diluting the commitment to that;
(ii) Keep the unionist population on board by ensuring that proposals for reform were not such as to alienate them from the process and;
(iii) Keep the nationalist population on board by producing proposals that would satisfy them and allow them to feel they had some input into the governance of NI.[7]

7.4.2. In addition it was felt that progress towards a political initiative would only really take root if there were a reduction in the incidents of bombing and shooting by the IRA. Giving evidence, Anthony Stephens agreed that the timing and viability of any political initiative in Northern Ireland was

[7] See, for example the evidence of Lord Carrington Day 280/1/22 to Day 280/2/6 and Anthony Stephens Day 273/62/7 to Day 273/62/15 and also Day 273/69/10 to Day 273/69/21

"heavily dependent on the security situation" Day 273/27/18 to Day 273/27/21 (emphasis added).

7.4.3. The problems involved were numerous. The attempts to keep unionists on board were hampered by the deteriorating security situation. Most among the unionist fraternity wanted the IRA crushed and would accept nothing less than a corresponding escalation of security measures. In addition, suggestions of reform did not receive popular support. Unionists were certainly not prepared to share power with those they saw as being subversives and hooligans and their supporters. Giving evidence Sir Arthur Hockaday agreed that Faulkner and the Unionists generally did not want to make significant reforms Day 271/87/1. It was noted at a meeting of the Official Advisory Committee at Stormont on 4th December 1971 that > "The Government needed to decide upon its basic philosophy in relation to the minority. Did it consider itself at war with the minority or did it believe in treating it fairly, firmly and openly? At present the Government's attitude was not clear" OS1.529

7.4.4. On the nationalist side, the escalation of army operations over the previous two years meant that the initially warm welcome for the army had evaporated. In addition, the years of unionist rule had taken their toll and the proposals for reform now put forward by the Northern Ireland government were not accepted as far reaching enough. There was a feeling that no one among the Catholic population supported the retention of the Stormont regime[8].

[8] As to which see Sir Arthur Hockaday's memo of 31st December 1971 where he stated "You are aware that official thinking within the Ministry of Defence has been coming more and more to the conclusion that the Stormont system, whatever its value, must be modified, and that we cannot support it indefinitely. The basic reasons for our misgivings regarding the continuance of the Stormont regime are:-
Political, in that it must be extremely doubtful whether any significant section of the Roman Catholic community will ever again co-operate in the government and administration of Northern Ireland in its present form; Memorandum from AUS(GS) enclosing draft minutes and brief for Secretary of State, 31 December 1971 G45A.285.1 to G45A.285.16 at G45A.285.

7.4.5. Despite these problems, however, there appeared to be some cause for optimism at the beginning of July 1971. At the Cabinet Ministerial Meeting on Northern Ireland held on 6th July 1971 it was noted that Mr Faulkner had made several proposals for reform including the formation of Committees in the Northern Ireland Parliament and the setting up of a directorate for public prosecutions and that these proposals had "received cautious acceptance from the Opposition in Stormont". Minutes of a Cabinet Ministerial Committee on Northern Ireland. 6 July 1971 G2AA.23.1.1 to G2AA.23.1.5 at G2AA.23.1.2 the Committee also "welcomed signs of improvement in the security situation as compared with that of last year." Minutes of a Cabinet Ministerial Committee on Northern Ireland. 6 July 1971 G2AA.23.1.1 to G2AA.23.1.5 at G2AA.23.1.4

7.4.7. However it was noted by the Prime Minister that "while there had been some overall improvement in the last year the situation remained intractable; 14 battalions were committed in Northern Ireland and that no political solution was yet in sight." Minutes of a Cabinet Ministerial Committee on Northern Ireland. 6 July 1971 G2AA.23.1.1 to G2AA.23.1.5 at G2AA.23.1.5

7.4.8. Within a matter of days, however, the situation was to deteriorate rapidly when the opposition SDLP withdrew from Stormont in protest at the government's refusal to hold an inquiry into the shooting of Desmond Beattie and Seamus Cusack by the Army in Derry.

7.4.9. Later in July it was noted by the Home Secretary that "the dominant factor in Northern Ireland affairs was public security....there was little room at this juncture for any fresh political initiative within the Province." Minutes of meeting of Cabinet Ministerial Committee on Northern Ireland 29 July 1971 G3BC.48.13.7 to G3BC.48.13.11 at G3BC.48.13.7

7.4.10. Discussions between the Prime Ministers of Ireland, the UK and Northern Ireland in late September 1971, while a breakthrough in themselves, proved fruitless. There was little if any agreement on the main issues and even the statement to be issued at the end of the discussions could not be agreed without some discussion. Record of meetings held at Chequers during the visit of the Prime Ministers of the Irish Republic and Northern Ireland 26-28 September 1971 G14AC.86.1.13 to G14AC.86.1.50 at G14AC.86.1.39 to G14AC.86.1.45.

7.4.11. It was perhaps this lack of progress that led Prime Minister Heath to take a rather more robust attitude to the situation in Northern Ireland thereafter. On 30th September 1971 he requested from the Ministry of Defence "a fully documented and argued appreciation of what measures the Army would propose, if they were instructed that the primary objective was to bring terrorism in Northern Ireland to an end at the earliest possible moment, without regard to the inconveniences caused to the civilian population, and what forces they would require to carry these measures out." Letter from Robert Armstrong to R.J. Andrew Ministry of Defence 30th September 1971 G14AAA.86.9.

7.4.12. Continuing in this vein, at the next meeting of GEN 47 it was clear that the Prime Minister was frustrated at the lack of progress on Northern Ireland

> "the crisis in Northern Ireland continued to overshadow the work of the Government in many fields and threatened to jeopardise the success of the economic and defence policies and the approach to Europe. A concerted Northern Ireland policy, with its objects clearly defined in an order of priority, was now needed, based on the best reconciliation that could be made between conflicting considerations. Probably Mr Faulkner embodied the last prospect of maintaining an independent Government at Stormont. If he fell direct rule would be a virtual certainty and in the worst case the transfer to direct rule could take place in a situation in which the machinery of administration in Northern Ireland had virtually collapsed. Taking full account of the political dangers of further alienating the minority population in Northern Ireland and of the risks of strain on our relations with Dublin, [the Prime Minister] believed that the first priority should be the defeat of the gunmen using military means and that in achieving this we should have to accept whatever political penalties were inevitable." Minutes of a Meeting held at 10 Downing Street, Wednesday 6 October 1971 at 10.30am G15.87 to G15.91 at G15.88

7.4.13. These minutes appear to foreshadow the beginning of a much tougher policy towards the IRA by the British Government. When asked about this Lord Carrington said "...I think that the – what we felt was, that it was still necessary to keep Mr Faulkner in power. Therefore we had somehow to satisfy him and the Protestants that we were not being too feeble in our attitude towards the gunmen. I think that is what that means." Day 280/20/6 to Day 280/6/11. Of course Lord Carver's written evidence to this Tribunal would appear to chime with this when he says, "Edward Heath was very good to deal with. He would listen to what you had to say, not comment much but then ask questions and make up his own mind. He was influenced by his military background and wanted to solve problems by the use of military means." KC8.11 paragraph 28

7.4.14. Also at that meeting there was a recognition that the government had to define its Northern Ireland policy. Minutes of a Meeting held at 10 Downing Street on Wednesday 6 October 1971 at 10.30am G15.87 to G15.91 at G15.88. Also at that meeting Ministers considered that direct rule could prove to be inevitable. Minutes of a Meeting held at 10 Downing Street on Wednesday 6 October 1971 at 10.30am G15.87 to G15.91 at G15.89.

7.4.15. When Mr Heath met Mr Faulkner on 7th October it was clear that Faulkner's proposals for political reform on their own were not seen to be far reaching enough to provide the impetus for a breakthrough as to which see Brief for Prime Minister's meeting with Mr Faulkner 7 October 1971 G16.92 to G16.118 at G16.94, G16.95.

7.4.16. In addition some of the proposals put forward by Mr Faulkner to deal with other problems were deemed unacceptable. For example, the Draft Bill to compulsorily gather money owed as a result of the ongoing civil disobedience campaign by methods such as attachment of earnings and withholding family allowance payments was said to "present difficulties" Brief for Prime Minister's meeting with Mr Faulkner 7 October 1971 G16.92 to G16.118 at G16.94, G16.101 and other measures were described as "unnecessarily vindictive" and "harsh" Brief for Prime Minister's meeting with Mr Faulkner 7 October 1971 G16.92 to G16.118 at G16.94, G16.101.

7.4.17. At his meeting with Mr Faulkner on 7th October Prime Minister Heath indicated that > "It was necessary, not merely to exchange views, but to co-ordinate their policies in every field so that they presented a united front to public opinion and to the Opposition parties on both sides of the Irish Sea. They could no longer risk giving the impression of being borne along by events; the situation was now grave socially, economically and politically, and the British government could not continue to support Stormont unless public opinion at home was behind it. Furthermore, the Government's policies in other fields were being jeopardised. The situation was one of danger for both Governments." Record of a Discussion with the Prime Minister of Northern Ireland held at 10 Downing Street on Thursday 7 October 1972 G17.119 to G17.132 at G17.120

7.4.18. While it appears therefore that at this stage Prime Minister Heath was prepared to tackle the problem head on it also became clear that the British and Northern Ireland governments still assessed the situation differently. It was abundantly clear that the approach being taken by the governments was not working.

7.4.19. Mr Faulkner indicated that he had "no doubt that a solution of the security problem was the key to progress elsewhere....Furthermore without an immediate breakthrough in dealing with the terrorists the administration of government would shortly become impossible" Record of a Discussion with the Prime Minister of Northern Ireland held at 10 Downing Street on Thursday 7 October 1972 G17.119 to G17.132 at G17.121[9].

7.4.20. Mr Heath on the other hand spoke of the need for a political settlement and indicated that political opinion in Britain would be satisfied with nothing less. "It was thus essential that any immediate increase in the military effort should be accompanied by parallel political moves." Record of a Discussion with the Prime Minister of Northern Ireland held at 10 Downing Street on Thursday 7 October 1972 G17.119 to G17.132 at G17.121

7.4.21. While Mr Faulkner seemed to think his green paper would solve the problems the Home Secretary said the green paper dealt largely with changes in the size and composition of the Parliament and asked how far Mr Faulkner was prepared to go in broadening the base of the Ministry to include Minority representatives. Record of a Discussion with the Prime

[9] That this was the view of the Ulster Unionist party as a whole was made clear by Lord Kilclooney who, when giving evidence agreed that he believed that the emphasis on reforms was misplaced "that you could not proceed with reforms and gain the electoral support of the people unless you had peace in the land" Day 196/106/18 to Day 196/106/24

Minister of Northern Ireland held at 10 Downing Street on Thursday 7 October 1972 G17.119 to G17.132 at G17.122

7.4.22. At this point Mr Faulkner delivered a thinly veiled threat by saying that "he could not contemplate leading or serving in a Government of Northern Ireland which included Republicans, whether or not they eschewed the use of violence in bringing about a unified Ireland. Nor would he serve in a Ministry composed according to proportional principles. In neither case could a workable Government be formed since its component parts would be too disparate....If the British Government had it in mind to propose the inclusion of the Republicans in the Government he would have to tell his colleagues forthwith and they would act accordingly. On the other hand, there were prominent Catholics who took a constitutionalist view." Record of a Discussion with the Prime Minister of Northern Ireland held at 10 Downing Street on Thursday 7 October 1972 G17.119 to G17.132 at G17.122[10]

7.4.23. After that date it appears that British government activity on NI was stepped up. The Prime Minister announced that there was to be a meeting of the cabinet committee on Northern Ireland at least once a week, more if required. Minutes of meeting of cabinet sub-committee on Northern Ireland 29 October 1971 G22C.163.5 to G22C.163.8 at G22C.163.6.

7.4.24. At the same meeting the Home Secretary, who was holding discussions with the parties in Northern Ireland about possible reform, indicated that,

> "So far as his own consultations over giving the minority a guaranteed place in administration were concerned, the main stumbling block was Mr Faulkner's refusal to contemplate the inclusion in his Government of anyone who held the Republican viewpoint over the constitution of Northern

[10] Giving evidence to this Tribunal Dr Robert Ramsay did not accept that there was a major discrepancy between what Brian Faulkner was offering in terms of reform and what the Westminster Government was seeking Day 215/69/14 to Day 215/69/25

> Ireland, however such a person might be prepared to subordinate his views to the general public interest in the current situation. Reform of Northern Ireland institutions, to be effective, had to be centred on the structure of central Government, Parliamentary reforms would not be enough." Minutes of meeting of cabinet sub-committee on Northern Ireland 29 October 1971 G22C.163.5 to G22C.163.8 at G22C.163.7

7.4.25. At this time, however, the security situation appeared to be showing some improvement. During November the Chief of the General Staff's situation reports were positive[11] and after a visit to NI in November 1971 the leader of the opposition, Harold Wilson, met with the Prime Minister, Mr Heath and Mr Maudling and Lord Carrington on 22nd November 1971 where he reported that

> "General Tuzo had expressed to him in his briefing a qualified optimism about the security situation and prospects. Mr Wilson thought that optimism justified, though the problem of dealing with Derry might well be more difficult than that of dealing with Belfast...." Note of meeting between Harold Wilson and United Kingdom government ministers 22 November 1971 G32A.233.1 to G32A.233.6 at G32A.233.2

7.4.26. The note later records

> "Turning to what should now be done, Mr Wilson said that he thought that there could be no solution until the gunmen had been extirpated. But a political solution ought to be discussed before then, in order to try to win over the support of as many as possible of those who were now supporting the IRA." Note

[11] Minutes of a Meeting held at 10 Downing Street on Tuesday 16th November 1971 at 11.30am G30.225 to G30.226 at G30.226; Minutes of a Meeting held at 10 Downing Street on Monday 22 November 1971 at 11.00am G32.231 to G32.233 at G32.233; Minutes of a Meeting held at 10 Downing Street on Friday 26 November 1971 at 11.00am G34.237 to G34.238 at G34.238

of meeting between Harold Wilson and United Kingdom government ministers 22 November 1971 G32A.233.1 to G32A.233.6 at G32A.233.3

7.4.27. As to what this political solution should be it appears that Mr Wilson was not in a position to assist the government materially. He did indicate that the contents of Mr Faulkner's Green Paper would not be acceptable to the SDLP who were still refusing to talk to the Home Secretary while internment continued. Note of meeting between Harold Wilson and United Kingdom government ministers 22 November 1971 G32A.233.1 to G32A.233.6 at G32A.233.4

7.4.28. So the position in November was that, while there was an improvement in the security situation there did not appear to be any concrete proposals for political agreement on the table or any indication that the conditions for agreeing such a political initiative could be achieved.

7.4.29. There was some increase in "security incidents" at the end of November 1971 and into December 1972 Minutes of a Meeting held at 10 Downing Street on Monday 29 November 1971 G35.239 to G35.240 at G35.240; Minutes of a Meeting held at 10 Downing Street on Monday 13 December 1971 G38.253 to G38.254 at G38.254.

7.4.30. However, General Carver (CGS) visited Northern Ireland between 15 and 17 December 1971. His report to the Defence Secretary is at G44.281 to G44.282.1. In it, and in his report to the MoD's NI Policy Group at its meeting on 22nd December 1971 G44B.282.4 to G44B.282.9 at G44B.282.4, Carver expressed the view that the government should aim at a positive political initiative about February. He indicated that there would only be a short time available for such a move before any hardening of attitudes or backlash set in. He suggested that the initiative should have 3 parts:

(i) Transfer of responsibility for law and order to Westminster;

(ii) Transferring all areas of governmental activity which were subject to inter-sectarian strife (e.g. education and housing) to public boards;

(iii) To enquire into and reorganise representation at Stormont.

7.4.31. He had his first opportunity after his visit to report this to GEN 47 on 11th January 1971. Minutes of a Meeting held at 10 Downing Street, Tuesday 11 January 1972 G50.307 to G50.309 at G50.307. At that meeting Ministers wondered if "the relatively lower number of violent incidents since Christmas gave rise to the question whether the present level of violence in Belfast was as low as could be reasonably expected there short of a deliberate decision by the IRA to reduce dramatically or to call off its campaign". Minutes of a meeting held at 10 Downing Street on Tuesday 11 January 1972 G50.307 to G50.309 at G50.308. The Prime Minister indicated that "the relative quietness of the security situation in Belfast underlined the importance of the search for a political initiative" Minutes of a meeting held at 10 Downing Street on Tuesday 11 January 1972 G50.307 to G50.309 at G50.309

7.4.32. Indeed on 31st December 1971 it appeared that all options for political reform were still open. In his memo of that date Sir Arthur Hockaday acknowledged that there are "a range of possibilities for a political initiative designed to clear the way forward" which, at that stage, "starting with the least radical" seemed to be:-

(a) The transfer to the GOC of operational control of the RUC for security operations (as in August – October 1969)

(b) As at a. plus some modification of the Stormont structure in the direction of proportional representation, "community" or coalition government, and blocking provisions, but no change in the powers of the Northern Ireland Parliament and Government...

(c) With greater or less modification of the structure of Stormont, transfer to Westminster of responsibility for the whole apparatus of law and order comprising not only security operations but complete responsibility for the RUC, the prison services, the internment policy, and the administration of justice

(d) Direct Rule.

Memorandum from AUS(GS) enclosing draft minutes and brief for Secretary of State, 31 December 1971 G45A.285.1 to G45A.285.16 at G45A.285.9.

7.4.33. His own comments on these options (also at G45A.285.9) were

> "As to the relationship between "security operations", "law and order" and "direct Rule", the firebreak appears to be between (b) and (c) above rather than between (c) and (d). To stop at course (b) would not involve Westminster in a mass of miscellaneous areas of direct administration, and would probably be as much as Mr Faulkner could swallow. On the other hand, it is doubtful whether course (b) would have sufficient political impact in Ireland to break the present log-jam"

7.4.34. He also indicated that > "There is every reason for satisfaction with the amount of pressure which the Army is now exerting on the terrorists; but it is increasingly becoming increasingly clear that there is a distinct limit to how far the terrorists can be rendered ineffective – and, in particular, can be isolated from the Catholic community as a whole, which is crucially important – by military means alone. I am not suggesting that the moment for trying fresh lines of approach had arrived now, but I believe that – at the present rate of attrition on the IRA – it may be reached quite soon: and that, when it is, we shall need to be absolutely ready to take prompt advantage of it if we are to retain the initiative. If the Army create an opportunity for us, then we must be sure of taking it: if we do not take it, my fear is that the Army will be placed in an increasingly impossible position....If fresh approaches may be needed soon, it is clearly not too early to be considering them – and I should accordingly welcome an early opportunity for a discussion of the whole situation". Memorandum from AUS(GS) enclosing draft minutes and brief for Secretary of State, 31 December 1971 G45A.285.1 to G45A.285.16 at G45A.285.4.

7.4.35. At that stage, while the situation in Belfast may have been improving, in Derry the position was such that > "The Defence Secretary had agreed that the Bogside and the Creggan areas should only be entered by troops on specific information and for a minimum of routine patrolling." Cabinet Official Committee on NI: Minutes of Meeting at Cabinet Office Wednesday 5 January 1972 G46.286 to G46.288 at G46.287.

7.4.36. The security situation in Derry in the weeks and months preceding Bloody Sunday is discussed at some length in Section 10.

7.4.37. It is therefore clear that by the end of 1971 there was some cautious optimism, within the British military and governmental establishment at least, in respect of the security situation in Northern Ireland. At the end of 1971 however NICRA decided to increase pressure in its campaign against internment by once again organising a series of marches at a time when the ban on marches that was so reviled by the unionist community was about to be renewed[12].

7.4.38. The first march took place on Christmas Day 1971 with the second shortly afterwards on 2nd January 1972. The renewal of the ban was announced by Mr Faulkner at Stormont on 18th January. In the short space of time between this date and Bloody Sunday it was clear that the renewal of the ban on marches coupled with the failure to ensure that NICRA marchers were prevented from marching at all was further angering Protestants who had "got used to the Roman Catholic bomber/gunman (who they don't see) and are more likely to react increasingly aggressively to the sight of NICRA supporters defying the law". Visit of CDS on 24th January 1972 G70.437 to G70.441 at G70.439

7.4.39. The GOC's attitude to the marchers can also be clearly seen in the note of this visit

> "The attrition operation is going well. It is designed to make the IRA desist and the policy is working but at the price of implacable and growing Roman Catholic hostility, not only to the Protestants but to the Army. This hostility is tending to spread upwards through the middle class, encouraged particularly by some Roman Catholic priests and behind it all stands NICRA, the active ally of the IRA." Visit of CDS on 24th January 1972 G70.437 to G70.441 at G70.437.

7.4.40. Therefore a hardening of attitudes on all sides was apparent. Clearly emerging from the papers however is the insistence that such marches, and those who participate in them, should be firmly dealt with. That this was necessary for both military and political purposes is clear and is addressed in the paper prepared by Colonel Dalzell-Payne on 27th January 1972. As to military concerns

> "There is no doubt that the Force Levels to control urban situations of the sort created by illegal marches are prohibitively high. It could well be claimed that the activities of IRA gunmen/bombers are easier to control than mass civil disobedience of the sort involved in the defiance of the ban on marches." Loose Minute: Northern Ireland Marches in 1972 by Colonel Dalzell-Payne. 27 January 1972 G82.512 to G82.521 at G82.516.

7.4.41. However his paper also addresses the possible political implications of the renewal of the ban and failure to enforce it

> "The extension of the ban has upset the Rev Ian Paisley and his followers who see it as a final surrender to the IRA. The immediate reaction to the announcement in Stormont was that the Loyalist section of the community was going to be outraged and that victory had been given to the IRA who had said that they would put the Orangemen off the street and would certainly prevent the Twelfth of July marches. Even one of the most liberal-minded Stormont MPs, Mrs Anne Dickson, made a strong and reasoned plea to the Government to "rethink" the whole question. She said that the suppression of the normally well-disciplined Loyalist parades, and the continued failure to control the IRA and to prevent the Civil Rights movement from demonstrating publicly, will invite a Protestant backlash.
> The Orange Order, supported by other Loyalist organisations has said that it was not satisfied with the "alleged reasons" for the extension of the ban and in the absence of a clear demonstration of the effectiveness of the ban – a reference to the Civil Rights marches on Christmas Day and 2 Jan 72 and the anti internment demonstrations on 22/23 Jan 72 – the Government could not expect Loyalists to observe it." Loose Minute: Northern Ireland Marches in 1972 by Colonel Dalzell-Payne. 27 January 1972 G82.512 to G82.521 at G82.517 to G82.518

7.4.42. The march on 30th January 1972 was therefore of tremendous political and military significance. This is explored further in Section 10 and Section 12.

7.4.43. Any attempt to progress a political initiative was rendered obsolete by the events of Bloody Sunday[13].

7.4.44. Having provided this outline of the aims of the British Government in respect of Northern Ireland and the progress of the proposed political initiative there it is now appropriate to examine the various other factors that were at work in the political arena in advance of Bloody Sunday. To do so initially requires some outline of the structure within which political decisions were taken and the pressures at work on the relevant actors.

7.5. The Governmental Structure

7.5.1. Even though at this time Northern Ireland still had its own government the UK government had put in place a system which has been called "indirect rule" or "direct rule by proxy"[14].

7.5.2. At the head of the structure stood the Prime Minister, Mr Heath and his cabinet, although most of the business relating to Northern Ireland was discussed at cabinet committee level in GEN 47 and, some time later, GEN 79. Sir Edward Heath (as he now is) has described the GEN 47 committee as a "forum for keeping Ministers updated on Northern Ireland policy

[13] See, for example the evidence of Sir Edward Heath Day 282/118/1 to Day 282/118/3, see also Professor Arthur's report at E6.0040

[14] For further discussion of the constitutional position see Section Eight developments and for collective discussion and decision as required." KH 4.85 paragraph 1(3)

7.5.3. Brian Faulkner was Prime Minister of Northern Ireland and Minister of Home Affairs in the Northern Ireland government. His predecessor, Major Chichester-Clarke had also filled both of these roles before his resignation. This dual role meant that the Prime Minister had complete political control of security issues.

7.5.4. Mr Faulkner presided over the Joint Security Committee. Meetings of this Committee were also attended by; inter alia, the GOC, the Chief Constable of the RUC, the Minister of State at the Department of Home Affairs (now Lord Kilclooney) and the head of the Government Security Unit, Mr Stout.

7.5.5. One of the matters to be agreed in the Downing Street Declaration of August 1969 was that "two senior civil servants from London should be temporarily stationed with the Northern Ireland Government in Belfast". The Home Office therefore had a permanent official, known as the UK Representative ("UK Rep"), stationed in Northern Ireland. At the relevant time Howard Smith held this role, which included attendance at the meetings of the Joint Security Committee at Stormont.

7.5.6. Lord Kilclooney has said that Mr Smith's predecessor, Oliver Wright, was "light heartedly referred to as 'the British spy'!" KK3.2 paragraph 7. Dr Robert Ramsay, who was Principal Private Secretary to Brian Faulkner has indicated that the position was taken more seriously than that and that Brian Faulkner had always resented the setting up of the UK Representative Office....This was a constitutional enormity – an embassy to part of one's own country. This Office played a role roughly akin to that of the Soviet Embassy in the Prague of the same era, reporting secretly to London and sympathetically receiving representations from all manner of disaffected groups, who quickly came to see that they could thus bypass and undermine the devolved governmental structures. KR1.7 paragraph 28[15]

7.5.7. In addition to these arrangements, the civilian and military arms of the military in Northern Ireland reported back to London. The Tribunal has heard that the GOCNI, General Tuzo, had daily contact with Lord Carver Day 254/86/4 to Day 254/86/5. In addition, the Ministry of Defence in London had two divisions dedicated to Northern Ireland, one on the civilian side (Defence Secretariat 10 "DS10") and one on the military side (Military Operations Branch 4 "MO4"). These were headed by Anthony Stephens and Colonel Dalzell-Payne respectively. Mr Stephens worked under the direction of Sir Arthur Hockaday who was at that time Assistant Under Secretary (General Staff) ("AUS(GS)")[16]. Sir Arthur has indicated that,

> "DS10 and I, with help from Civil Advisors in Headquarters Northern Ireland at Lisburn kept generally in touch with what was going on in Northern Ireland, and we were the link between the military staff and the political direction that the government was giving over Northern Ireland. When the Secretary of State needed to be aware of events in Northern Ireland, or of what we thought was round the corner, it was our responsibility to inform him." KH9.1 paragraph 4

7.5.8. General Tuzo (on occasion General Ford deputised) attended meetings of the Joint Security Committee at Stormont with; inter alia, the Chief Constable, the NI Prime Minister, the Minister of State at the Department of Home Affairs and the UK Representative. Lord Carver attended meetings of GEN47 with the Prime Minister, the Home Secretary and the Secretary of State for Defence. He was also a member of the Ministry of

---

[15] Indeed, giving oral evidence Lord Kilclooney confirmed that there was some resentment about the position of UK Rep "it gave people the impression that decisions were being made in London behind our backs that we did not really know about" Day 197/89/10 to Day 197/89/20

[16] Sir Arthur moved to the Cabinet Office in January 1972 and was succeeded as AUS(GS) by Derek Stephen KS4.

Defence's Northern Ireland Policy Group along with the Secretary of State for Defence, the Minster of State for Defence and the Under Secretary of State.

7.5.9. It is not entirely clear what the remit and/or powers of the Joint Security Committee ("JSC") were. Indeed the question of who had responsibility for security in Northern Ireland was a somewhat confused issue. Constitutionally, responsibility for security lay with the Northern Ireland government[17]. However, it is clear that ultimate responsibility for the army could only rest with the government at Westminster[18]. It was also agreed by a number of witnesses that military policy was subordinate to and must follow political policy[19].

7.5.10. In respect of the army's role in Northern Ireland however, there appeared to be what Counsel to the Inquiry Christopher Clarke QC has called "dual control"[20] and it is not at all clear from where the army was to take its political direction.

7.6. The Joint Security Committee

7.6.1. Of the witnesses who have given evidence to the Tribunal, those who were part of the Stormont machinery have been clear in their evidence to this Tribunal that the JSC was little more than a talking shop or a forum for the exchange of ideas between those who had political responsibility and the security forces. In contrast, those involved in government in London appeared to think that the JSC was the forum where the important security decisions were taken.

7.6.2. Lord Kilclooney has said that

> "its functions in the main involved the exchange of views between the politicians (being Brian Faulkner and myself),

[17] See, for example Lord Kilclooney's evidence at Day 196/12/16 to Day 196/12/24
[18] See, for example, Lord Kilclooney's evidence at Day 196/19/14 to Day 196/19/17

[20] Day 196/20/24

and the Chief Constable supported by the GOC. The JSC did not make decisions as such, and certainly made no decisions in relation to the role of the police or the army in relation to security and policing matters. Any decisions on operational matters were for the GOC and Chief Constable of the RUC to decide. They would inform us of decisions that they had made and tell us how they assessed the security situation. For our part, as politicians, we would update them about the political feeling on the ground and give an indication as to what we anticipated political responses would be to events on the ground." KK3.2 paragraph 8[21]

7.6.3. Other Stormont civil servants at the time have made it clear that, while this may be the case in relation to the meetings of the JSC the actual position meant that decisions were taken outside that forum and in private. David Gilliland a former Government Press Officer said

> "I do not think the importance of JSC should be overrated. The GOC and Chief Constable and the Minister of Home Affairs and senior officials and deputies would have regular meetings and decide what was to be done. They would then attend a full committee meeting of JSC and all would proceed as if it was fresh, but in reality many matters had been cleared up behind the scenes." KG2.2 paragraph 9[22]

7.6.4. It appears clear from the evidence that the British had a somewhat different view of the role of the JSC. This is reflected in Lord Crawford's written evidence

[21] See also the evidence of Dr Robert Ramsay KR1.5 paragraphs 17 to 18

[22] See also the evidence of Maurice Harris at KH11.5 paragraph 11. Giving oral evidence Lord Kilclooney confirmed that this was the case Day 197/31/24 to Day 197/32/15 as did Dr Robert Ramsay Day 215/128/10 to Day 215/128/21

Operational matters were decided by a Joint Security Committee which was a committee chaired by the Prime Minister of Northern Ireland and the General Officer Commanding Northern Ireland was a member. KC10.2 paragraph 3

7.6.5. Lord Crawford also said that

On occasion when there were major matters of police and strategy to be decided the JSC would obtain the agreement of British Ministers. One example of this was the introduction of internment. Day to day running of security policy was, however, the province of the JSC. KC10.2 paragraph 4

7.6.6. In a memo dated 26th January 1972 the head of DS 10, Anthony Stephens, stated the position as he understood it

> "It is primarily up to the Joint Security Committee in Northern Ireland to decide on the tactics which the security forces should adopt for dealing with this march. The JSC is due to meet as usual tomorrow morning and we hope to hear the outcome during the afternoon. However we agreed this morning that it would be helpful for members of the Northern Ireland Policy Group to be aware before tomorrow's meetings of the Group and of GEN47, of the line which the GOC and UK Rep propose to take at the JSC meeting."[23] Proposed March in Londonderry – Submission from AW Stephens to Lord Carrington G74.457 to G74.458 at G74.457

7.6.7. When Mr Stephens gave evidence the following exchange took place

[23] Commenting on this Lord Kilclooney said that the actual tactics for the march would certainly not have been decided by the JSC but that "there would have been political advice about what the situation was...and we therefore would have advised it is better that this parade is stopped, but it is up to the Security Forces, in this case it was the Army to decide how they were going to do that." Day 196/87/17 to Day 196/87/23

"Is it right, in your understanding, it was for the JSC to determine, in general terms, the approach that the Security Forces should take?
Yes, I do think so and I have made this point, I think somewhere in my second statement, that it was certainly for the Security Forces to propose, but they did need the concurrence of the other members of the JSC, those representing the Northern Ireland Government, because this was all in the context of a ban on marches in the province which that Government had imposed" Day 273/12/17 to Day 273/13/1

7.6.8. It appears that even the Chief of the General Staff, Lord Carver, was of the view that the Joint Security Committee was "a body where decisions on security were made. I was kept informed of their decisions by Tuzo. The British Government were also kept informed." KC8.7 paragraph 3.

7.6.9. That there was an apparent difference of opinion between Westminster and Stormont over the role of this central and high profile body is clear. That there was further ambiguity over the position of the Army is evident.

7.6.10. Lord Crawford has called the constitutional position "ill-defined" KC10.1 paragraph 2

"Ultimate constitutional responsibility for the army units deployed in Northern Ireland at the time was with the UK government. In practice responsibility for security had been delegated to the Northern Ireland government...as I understand it the Northern Ireland government had the legal responsibility for law and order..." KC10.1 paragraph 2

7.6.11. However, Sir David Ramsbotham, at that time the Military Assistant to the Chief of the General Staff has said

"The problem with Northern Ireland at the time was that political affairs were directed by the Northern Ireland Government, the GOC having to deal with the Prime Minister, to whom the RUC reports. The army came under the Prime Minister in London to whom the CGS reports. Operations were directed from Belfast/Lisburn. Resources were controlled from London. The CGS acted as intermediary. The situation was not resolved until after direct rule. The confusion in Northern Ireland was that you had a situation where the army had been sent in, although it was not clear how they fitted into the picture and who they were properly subordinate to." KR2.2 paragraph 7

7.6.12. Dr Robert Ramsay also gave evidence that Mr Faulkner was concerned that the presence of the army on the streets of Northern Ireland would lead to a "constitutional awkwardness vis-à-vis London" namely "that the Army would be acting in aid of the civil power in the form of the Northern Ireland government, but would ultimately be constitutionally responsible to a different Government, namely the United Kingdom government" Day 215/3/19 to Day 215/4/10.

7.6.13. Indeed Mr Faulkner himself "on the first occasion of [his] appearance at a Joint Security Committee as Prime Minister" sought "to establish beyond question a clear definition both of terms of reference given by the Westminster Government to the GOC in relation to the re-establishment of law and order throughout Northern Ireland and the objectives of the GOC which he plans to pursue to satisfy his remit" TMPD 29.35.

7.6.14. Acknowledging that there had been some confusion about the division of responsibilities for security as between the two Governments and the GOC Mr Faulkner indicated that it was "therefore in the interests of all Sections of our community in Northern Ireland and of the two Governments, that Westminster should state or restate publicly, clearly and unequivocally:-

(a) What are the Terms of Reference from the Westminster Government to the GOC as his remit in Northern Ireland?

(b) What are the objectives and priorities of the GOC and what target times are set for their achievement?

(c) What limitations, if any, exist in so called "No Go" areas to prevent people going about their lawful occasions?" TMPD 29.36

7.6.15. It is not clear that Mr Faulkner ever got any or satisfactory answers to his questions.

7.6.16. The following considerations added further to the difficulties faced by the governments and the army and led to a situation where the army, without any or adequate political direction from London, were subject to and influenced by the pressures exerted on them by the situation in which they found themselves and the views of the Northern Ireland government. In this regard the following factors are of significance

(i) Pressures on Brian Faulkner from his own party and extreme unionists

(ii) Pressure on the army from the Northern Ireland government

(iii) The British government's appeasement of the Northern Ireland government

(iv) The British government's failure to give any or adequate political direction to the army

(v) The British Government's unwavering support for the army

7.7. Pressures on Brian Faulkner

7.7.1. The question of whether Mr Faulkner could keep control of his party in the face of the deteriorating security situation and the move towards reform is a constant and recurring theme among the papers provided to the Inquiry[24]. As early as June 1971, when Faulkner had been in power for a matter of month the UK representative's assessment was

> "I suspect that Mr Faulkner could be more efficiently served by parts of his own Governmental machine and I have already indicated that some of his Ministers are not sufficiently house trained. If this is so it is a reflection on Mr Faulkner himself. It begins to look as if he lacks that authority, combined with a hint of menace, which a leader needs. It suggests that he is not the tough man we hoped to see." Report from H Smith to the Home Secretary. 10 June 1971 G1AA.19.1.1 to G1AA.19.1.10 at G1AA.19.1.7

7.7.2. The pressure being exerted on Faulkner did not just come from Paisleyites and rogue elements of his party. It is clear that attempts to undermine him came from those as highly placed as MP John Taylor, now Lord Kilclooney, but then the Minister of State at the Ministry of Home Affairs (Faulkner's deputy in that department).

7.7.3. During late 1971 Mr Taylor (as he then was) made a speech in his constituency criticising the UK government's failure to provide more troops to the army in Northern Ireland and supporting the creation of a "third force" OS1.418 to OS1.419.

7.7.4. It also appeared from media reports at the time that Mr Taylor was invited to discuss this speech with Prime Minister Faulkner after which a statement was issued indicating that he supported government policy

[24]See also Minutes of meeting of Cabinet Ministerial Committee on Northern Ireland. 6 July 1971 G2AA.23.1.1 to G2AA.23.1.5 at G2AA.23.1.2; Minutes of meeting of Cabinet Ministerial Committee on Northern Ireland. 29 July 1971 G3BC.48.13.7 to G3BC.48.13.11 at G3BC.48.13.7; Agenda and Conclusions of JSC Meeting Thursday 2 September 1971 G11.71 to G11.74 at G11.72

OS1.421. Giving evidence to this Tribunal Lord Kilclooney denied that Mr Faulkner had told him to "toe the party line" and said

> "A. It is one of the realities of politics in Northern Ireland that on that issue, if you read the reports in the Irish nationalist press, like the Irish News or Henry Kelly, who is an United Irelander in the Irish Times, they give a very colourful presentation of what actually happened. In fact I was not carpeted at all by the Prime Minister. We had our normal Cabinet meeting that morning and he and I had a three or four minute chat, at the most, afterwards in which he showed me this document so that the air would be cleared and I made some amendments to it and that was it, because what I had stressed in my speech was that any third force should be under the lawful control of the authorities in Northern Ireland.
> So I was able to comply with this statement to show that we were united, but it was only a three or four minute meeting on the side corridors after the Cabinet meeting." Day 196/50/13 to Day 196/51/5

7.7.5. It is submitted that when assessing the evidence given by Lord Kilclooney, the Tribunal should be alive to his intensely partisan political background. This was illustrated, not only by his public statements in and around 1971 and 1972, but also the evidence he gave to this Tribunal.

7.7.6. One aspect of Lord Kilclooney's evidence is particularly worthy of comment. While giving evidence he claimed that "on the night of the deaths on the Bloody Sunday nationalists were drinking and celebrating because of what had happened because they knew it would bring about the downfall of the Stormont Parliament" Day 196/163/8 to Day 196/163/11.

Lord Kilclooney claimed that he had been given a tape of these celebrations, which took place in Derry, and indicated that he would provide it to the Tribunal Day 197/87/14 to Day 197/87/20. This is the first time our clients had been aware of such a tape, indeed such an allegation. As a result there were very interested to see if Lord Kilclooney would make good his evidence by production of the tape. They were not surprised when he did not.

7.7.7. Lord Kilclooney's undated letter to the Solicitor to the Inquiry appears at KK3.22. In the letter he indicates that despite "exhaustive searches" he has not been able to locate the tape. It is interesting to note that in this letter, for the first time, Lord Kilclooney refers to the tape as a "BBC Radio Tape". This is perhaps a last attempt to give some credibility to what was an otherwise incredible and outrageous tale.

7.7.8. As has been seen above even Mr Faulkner would not accept any political initiative that involved the inclusion of representatives of the minority in the Northern Ireland government if they were in any way committed to the idea of a united Ireland.

7.7.9. Indeed Sir Edward Heath, giving evidence to this Tribunal agreed that even moderate unionists were continually saying that the British Government was not doing enough to strengthen the union Day 289/109/2 to Day 289/109/20.

7.7.10. On the question of security, pressure came in the form of calls for harsher measures, such as internment, to be employed on the security front[25].

7.7.11. During the course of a telephone conversation with Prime Minister Heath on 10th September 1971 on the issue of possible tripartite talks involving them and Taoiseach Jack Lynch, Faulkner said

[25] OP Directive No 3/71 HQ 8th Infantry Brigade Ebrington Barracks 2 July 1971 G1.1 to G1. 19, G1.1 to 2; Report from H Smith to the Home Secretary 10 June 1971 G1AA.19.1.1 to G1AA.19.1. 10 at G1AA.19.1.2; Minutes of meeting of Cabinet Ministerial Committee on Northern Ireland 29 July 1971 G3BC.48.13.7 to G3BC.48.1.3. 10 at G3BC48.13.7

"I really cannot over emphasise the importance of this. Everybody is talking about what the Catholic population is having to put up with, but, my God, it is nothing to what the one million Protestants are putting up with at the moment and I am not talking about the Paisleyites. Every businessman in the country is saying that unless something is done to deal with this bombing we are going to do something ourselves. And there will be no demands at all for a force controlled by the Northern Ireland Government if we can make the UDR an adequate force which it would be if people had the opportunity of more localised service in it." Transcript of telephone conversation between the Prime Minister and the Prime Minister of Northern Ireland 10 September 1971 G12AA.78.1.1 to G12AA.78.1.9 at G12AA.78.1.8

7.7.12. Mr Faulkner therefore came under severe pressure from those inside and outside his own party. As a result and in order to placate his own constituency Mr Faulkner pressed for more and tougher security measures both from the British Government and the Army. From the former he requested internment, increase in membership and localisation of the UDR and other measures such as the cratering of unapproved border roads. From the latter he urged that action be taken to break the no go areas in Derry and that marches held in defiance of the ban be firmly dealt with.

7.8. Pressure on the Army from the Northern Ireland Government

7.8.1. It is clear that the army came under pressure from the Northern Ireland government to increase its efforts to improve the security situation. Giving evidence to this Tribunal Lord Kilclooney agreed that the politicians in the Joint Security Committee sought "as much influence as they could exert" Day 196/21/23 to Day 196/21/25.

7.8.2. This is a matter of some considerable importance in assessing the actions of the army on Bloody Sunday, particularly when one is reminded of the statement made by James Callaghan in the House of Commons on the publication of the Widgery report on 19th April 1972

> "These tragic events belong in the past. They took place when there was divided responsibility for security and when it is fair to say that very heavy pressure was being brought to bear upon the Army commanders to step up their attitude. I do not suppose any of us will ever know whether they were acting on their own judgment or whether they yielded to the judgment of others." V62

7.8.3. Lord Callaghan now says

> "I am sorry to say that with the lapse of time and a memory that is nowadays very imperfect, I am unable to say on what information I relied when I said in the House of Commons that, "very heavy pressure was being brought to bear upon the Army commanders to step up their attitude....".
>
> "I am sure that such information would never have been committed to paper but would have been passed by word of mouth. I suppose that my comment probably derived from what I regarded as well-informed Army sources. Alternatively, it may have come from comments by Civil Servants or from journalists who had ready access to the Army, but I cannot be definite about any of this." KC2.1

7.8.4. That pressure was indeed exerted on the GOCNI to take more and tougher action can be seen in the following

(i) The minutes of the NI Cabinet meeting on 6th July 1971 where the GOC was criticised for "the Army's apparent reluctance to move in and "mop up" militant elements in the Bogside area of Londonderry". In addition "The GOC... agreed with the Minister [of Agriculture] that nothing would be more reassuring to the population than the taking of positive steps against terrorists but that the local circumstances often made shooting at people out of the question." Giving evidence Lord Kilclooney indicated that in this meeting the GOC was "definitely" being pressed by ministers to fight back against law breakers with greater robustness than they were doing Day 196/32/14 to Day 196/32/19

(ii) The minutes of the JSC meeting of 2nd September 1971 in relation to General Tuzo's initiative to break to no-go areas in Derry. At that meeting General Tuzo explained his change of tactics in Derry. After discussions with local people he was prepared to give them a chance to see if they could bring about improvement in the situation there. The Prime Minister Mr Faulkner and the Minister of State at the Ministry of Home Affairs, now Lord Kilclooney, appear to have been outraged by this suggestion and indicated that they believed that Derry had returned to a no-go situation. Mr Taylor was particularly vociferous The minutes record the following

(iii) "The Minister of State at the Ministry of Home Affairs said that account would have to be taken of the feelings of people in the country who thought that a 'deal' had been done and that a 'No Go' area had been created. There was now an area in Londonderry where the IRA were known to be where they could now regroup and where arms were known to be and the Army were not going in to get them. He did not feel that he could support such a situation."

(iv) "The Prime Minister said that while one should not be too concerned about what might be termed 'grandstand opinion' it was nevertheless necessary to realise that a situation of this sort might have a serious effect elsewhere. The GOC pointed out that at any time the Army could go back in strength. He knew there were IRA men in the area and he knew where they were. If no progress was made in the new tactical direction then he would be prepared to go in and to take whatever action was necessary. The situation in Londonderry was under constant review." Agenda and Conclusions of JSC Meeting Thursday 2 September 1971 G11.71 to G11.74 at G11.72.

(v) In a letter to General Tuzo in September 1971 Mr Faulkner requested information on a number of matters including "Can it be assumed that attention is being given to devising new means of dealing with unruly crowds and terrorists and advantage being taken of experience in other countries". Letter from the Prime Minister of Northern Ireland to the GOC 20 September 1971 G13A.82.1 to G13A.82.2 at G13A.82.2. General Tuzo's detailed reply can be seen at G14AB.86.1.9 to G14AB.86.1.12.

(vi) The minutes of the JSC meeting of 20th January 1972. "The Prime Minister emphasised strongly the importance of stopping the march effectively. Protestant and Catholic attitude to the continuing ban on processions will be vitally influenced by the outcome on Saturday and also in the case of the other marches proposed for the immediate future.." Conclusions of JSC meeting, Thursday 20 January 1972 G63.377 to G63.379 at G63.377.

(vii) There was also constant pressure on the army in relation to border security and the cratering of unapproved roads and the enlargement and localisation of the UDR.

(viii) Letters between the GOC NI and the Prime Minister of Northern Ireland relating to the release of internees. Letter from the GOC to the Prime Minister of Northern Ireland, 13 September 1971 G12A.78.1 and Letter from the Prime Minister of Northern Ireland to the GOC G12B.78.2

(ix) The above mentioned letter from the Prime Minister of Northern Ireland to the GOC 20 September 1971 G13A.82.1 to G13A.82.2 and the reply at G14AB.86.1.9 to G14AB.86.1.12.

7.8.5. While it is clear that on occasion General Tuzo was able to withstand the pressure applied by the Northern Ireland government it is also clear that such pressure could in fact, influence the army. This is seen most dramatically in the events surrounding the meeting with the Strand Traders Association in January 1972 and the resulting memo from General Ford.

7.8.6. In the minutes of the JSC meeting that preceded General Ford's visit to Derry it can be seen that a request had been made for the Prime Minister, Mr Faulkner to meet with the Strand Traders Association about "a spread of violent activity into the William Street area of the city" Agenda and Conclusions of JSC Meeting, Thursday 6 January 1972 G47.289 to G47.298 at G47.294. In the end the GOC agreed to meet members of the Association on the spot. As the Tribunal knows, it was General Ford who eventually travelled to Derry but, whoever made the trip, it was a highly unusual one. In such a situation those commanding the army were being placed in a position whereby direct pressure could be and was applied.

7.9. British Appeasement of the Northern Ireland Government

7.9.1. As the end of 1971 drew near it was clear that other areas of British government policy were feeling the effect of the situation in Northern Ireland and that Prime Minister Heath was himself coming under pressure as a result.

7.9.2. During a telephone conversation with Mr Faulkner in which the Northern Ireland Prime Minister voiced his opposition to the holding of tripartite talks between himself, Mr Heath and the Taoiseach Mr Lynch and indicated that he had been told that the Chairman and Secretary of his party would resign if he took part Prime Minister Heath said

"And I think you know we shall have to tell your colleagues, I shall have to tell them myself if you like, that public opinion isn't going to have 17 battalions over there and just have people refusing to talk as to how to deal with the problem..." Transcript of telephone conversation between the Prime Minister and the Prime Minister of Northern Ireland 10 September 1971 G12AA.78.1.1 to G12AA.78.1.9 at G12AA.78.1.6

7.9.3. At a GEN 47 meeting in October 1971 Mr Heath commented that

"the crisis in Northern Ireland continued to overshadow the work of the Government in many fields and threatened to jeopardise the success of economic and defence policies and the approach to Europe...." Minutes of a Meeting held at 10 Downing Street Wednesday 6 October 1971 G15.87 to G 15.91 at G15.87

7.9.4. As has been seen, Brian Faulkner's refusal to consider broadening his government and his concentration on the security situation to the near exclusion of political reform created considerable problems for the British Government. However, despite its increasing frustration and irritation with the situation in Northern Ireland it is clear that the British government did all in its power to present a united front with the Stormont government. This attitude can be seen in the following

(i) "The Unionist Party has formed the Government of Northern Ireland for fifty years. It still holds a substantial majority in the House of Commons at Stormont. But its authority and handling of the situation is weakened by division among its supporters despite the firm support which the UK Government gives to the Stormont administration. The Republican elements who represent the opposition at Stormont are not able to form either a coherent opposition or an alternative government." Internal Security Instruction 1/71 (Revised) G20.141 to G20.155 at G20.141

(ii) Internment and associated decisions taken at the meeting between UK Ministers and Mr Faulkner on 5th August 1971

(iii) Internment without trial began in Northern Ireland with Operation Demetrius early on the morning of 9th January 1971. Internment had been an option that was called for by many in the Unionist community for a long time. It was hoped that it would have the same effect as it had during the 1960s where it was introduced simultaneously in NI and in the Republic of Ireland "with some success" KH11.3 paragraph 5.

(iv) While such an approach may have been successful in 1950s things had moved on quite substantially since then. Against the background of the civil rights campaign the introduction of such a repressive measure as internment without trial would inevitably lead to protests and civil disobedience.

(v) Unionists had been clamouring for the introduction of internment for quite some time. It was noted that initially Mr Faulkner had "withstood the demands of his own extremists and Mr Paisley for rearming the Police, internment and the resurrection of the B Specials" Report from H Smith to the Home Secretary. 10 June 1971 G1AA.19.1.1 to G1AA.19.1.10 at G1AA.19.1.7

(vi) In a telegram sent to Howard Smith for Prime Minister Faulkner on 4th July 1972 the Home Secretary made it clear that while the decision to introduce internment was for Mr Faulkner to make "under the constitution" the governments had come to an arrangement that it would be agreed with the British government first. The Home Secretary then made it clear that the GOC was not recommending internment and that the British government would raise no objection to its introduction if after consultation with the security authorities and the NI government it was satisfied that it would help in the campaign against the IRA. Also in the message the Home Secretary is clear that, were internment to be introduced in advance of the Apprentice Boys parade on 12th August it would be essential to proceed simultaneously with the indefinite banning of all political processions. Text of Message from the Home Secretary to Mr Faulkner, 4 August 1971 G4.49

(vii) As it turned out, Faulkner came to London on 5th August 1971 to meet with Ministers about the possible introduction of internment. Ministers held their own meeting in advance of the meeting with Mr Faulkner at which it seemed clear that Ministers were not adverse to the implementation of internment. Minutes of meeting of Cabinet Sub-Committee on Northern Ireland, 5 August 1971 G4A.49.1 to G4A.49.4 at G4A.49.2, G4A.49.3

(viii) Mr Faulkner met with the Prime Minster, the Home Secretary, the Foreign Secretary and the Secretary of State for Defence that afternoon and argued strongly that internment should be introduced. Note of a Meeting at 10 Downing Street, Thursday 5 August 1971 G5.50 to G5.55 at G5.50

(ix) The UK Ministers indicated the difficulties they had in that their military advice was that internment was not necessary on military grounds. They further indicated that "balancing action" would be needed in the form of the banning of parades and curtailment of gun clubs. Note of a Meeting at 10 Downing Street, Thursday 5 August 1971 G5.50 to G5.55 at G5.50

(x) In addition it is clear that Mr Faulkner protested about the introduction of the ban on marches and the limiting of the rifle clubs "The Protestants in Northern Ireland would regard internment as no more than a merited punishment for the violence of the IRA and their Roman Catholic supporters; they would not see it at all as something which required a corresponding gesture on the part of themselves. Since the Government would need full Protestant support for any new initiatives on political reconciliation which they might be able to undertake, it would be foolish to alienate Protestant support by an indiscriminate ban on marches." Note of Meeting at 10 Downing Street. 5 August 1971 G5A55.1 to G5A.55.5 at G5A.55.3.

(xi) It also appears clear that the British government softened its stance on these two issues. Therefore rather than an indefinite ban on marches it was agreed that the ban would be for six months. In addition the rifle clubs were not suspended but no additional licences for clubs were to be granted for the time being.

(xii) Giving evidence to this Tribunal Sir Arthur Hockaday agreed that the introduction of internment demonstrated the influence of Protestant Unionist opinion on political and security initiatives in Northern Ireland Day 271/85/8. In his memo dated 31st December Sir Arthur had commented that "....many political decisions, from non-implementation of Home Rule in 1914 through partition in 1921 to internment in 1971, have been taken primarily to satisfy Protestant opinion." Memorandum from AUS(GS) enclosing draft minutes and brief for Secretary of State, 31 December 1971 G45A.285.1 to G45A.285.16 at G45A.285.13.

(xiii) Sir Edward Heath himself said, "It became clear however, that Mr Faulkner and his colleagues in the Government of Northern Ireland had come to the view that the introduction of internment was essential in order to contain the threat of Republican violence, and attached such importance to it that they would be unlikely to continue in office without it. In that event, direct rule...would have become a virtual certainty. The alternative could therefore have been the collapse of the Government in Northern Ireland and the introduction at very short notice of direct rule by her Majesty's Government. We wished to avoid that if possible." KH4.4 paragraph and, giving evidence that "...we, of course, were very doubtful indeed about internment at all, and we wanted every possible action taken to ensure that it did no damage" Day 282/100/4 to Day 282/100/6

7.10. Lack of Political Direction From Westminster

7.10.1. Under this heading it is worth quoting the evidence of Sir Edward Heath to this Tribunal at some length. He said

> "At that time, as you know, the military were entirely concerned or – yes, concerned with Ireland itself and not with us as a central power, it was entirely their affair" Day 285/108/1 to Day 285/108/4
>
> "Well at that time the forces in Ireland were in control of the Irish government" Day 285/118/12 to Day 285/118/13
>
> "...We had no control over the military whatsoever and I did not know who was in the military there, neither did other senior members. They can give their own evidence here." Day 287/112/8 to Day 287/112/11
>
> ...What we thought at the time, of course, was that the handling of this by the military was something for which we had no responsibility, and which one could criticise and say that it should have been done differently. But I would not have given myself the responsibilities for doing it, because that was not our responsibility.

Q. Do you think Sir Edward that if you had involved yourself a bit more closely in what the Army were planning to do on Bloody Sunday, that things might have been different?

A. I was involving myself as Prime Minister to the right extent and in the right way, and power had been passed over to those who were more closely involved, and they acted on it.

Q. But the question I am asking you Sir Edward – I am not going to reopen this business of what your involvement was or why again – if you had involved yourself more than you claim you did, could this have been avoided?

A. The only way I could have involved myself more would have been to have taken over full responsibility for Northern Ireland and I was not prepared to do that at that time. The disadvantages of trying to do so were obviously very great and so we did not try. That had to wait until midsummer." Day 289/95/22 to Day 289/96/21

Q. Sir Edward is the answer then, that, to come back to a question I tried to get an answer from you earlier on, that even with the knowledge of what actually was being planned by the military at that particular stage – which presumably you have now – you would not have changed anything. Is that it?

A. Well, the responsibility of the military at that time was on the Northern Ireland Government, and one – as we saw later on, one could not change a part of it because they were unwilling. If one was going to change anything we had to change the whole thing, and that is what we were forced to do." Day 289/97/11 to Day 289/98/6

"...because the Armed Forces were in Northern Ireland, and their control was under Northern Ireland, except for the – what action their general officer commanding could take. And we did not interfere with that. That was their affair." Day 289/124/4 to Day 289/124/8

7.10.2. Asked about Operation Motorman in July 1972 Sir Edward said that at that stage

> ...I was Prime Minister of the whole governmental organisation and the military organisation, carrying out that operation. That was not the case in the earlier one." Day 287/124/24 to Day 287/125/2

7.10.3. Sir Edward's evidence to this Tribunal is clear. As UK Prime Minister he did not interfere in the security situation in Northern Ireland as that was the affair of the Northern Ireland government. Indeed he also said "...I found that those in Ireland who were in charge of such things for the general public were very sensible and very responsible" Day 289/126/11 to Day 289/126/13.

7.10.4. Sir Edward did not accept when it was put to him that the Stormont government had been given the British Army "to do with as it would" Day 289/126/14 to Day 289/126/20. He gave evidence that decisions were taken by the Ministry of Defence Day 291/53/15 to Day 291/53/21 but was quite clear that even though he delegated much of the responsibility in respect of Northern Ireland to Lord Carrington and Mr Maudling as Defence and Home Secretary respectively[26] he recognised that

> "...they themselves of course, had to recognise what was the responsibility of the Northern Ireland Government." Day 289/97/15 to Day 289/97/19

7.10.5. This approach is apparent from the material before the Tribunal where it can be seen that as late as October 1971 Prime Minister Heath was saying that the British Government needed to formulate a "concerted Northern Ireland policy". Minutes of a Meeting held at 10 Downing Street.

[26] Day 291/54/13 to Day 291/54/18

Wednesday 6 October 1971 G15.87 to G15.91 at G15.88 and that they were "giving the impression of being borne along by events" Record of a Discussion with the Prime Minister of Northern Ireland, 10 Downing Street, Thursday 7 October 1971 G17.119 to G17.132 at G17.120.

7.10.6. In addition, Professor Arthur has said "The Prime Minister was consumed with getting the UK into Europe....In these circumstances he was able to devote little time to Northern Ireland. Unfortunately his Home Secretary displayed little real interest." E6.0041.

7.10.7. However, the important signals that were being sent to the British Army by the Government in Westminster related to the rule of law in Northern Ireland, the status of the Catholic population there and the action that the army could be expected to face when allegations of criminal misconduct by troops on the ground were raised.

7.11. The Rule of Law

7.11.1. All of the relevant witnesses before the Tribunal were clear in their evidence that the British Government would not have contemplated the use of techniques which included the organised, premeditated and systematic breaches of peoples' fundamental rights.[27] In fact we submit that the opposite is the case and that what the material and evidence before the Inquiry shows is that the approach adopted to Northern Ireland by the British Government was one where adherence to the rule of law was sacrificed in what was, essentially, a war situation. This attitude can be seen in Sir Edward Heath's interview to Channel Four News where he said, "...Northern Ireland was in a state of war..." X.1.6.59. This was a view which he confirmed giving evidence to this Tribunal Day 285/118/5 to Day 285/118/10. [28]

[27] See, for example the evidence of Sir Arthur Hockaday Day 271/31/4 to Day 271/ 31/14
[28] Lord Carrington disagreed Day 280/89/15 to Day 280/89/23

7.11.2. Deep Interrogation Techniques

7.11.2.1. The British Government's approach to the rule of law is well demonstrated by the attitude that was taken to the allegations that emerged soon after internment as to the techniques being used for the interrogation of detainees[29].

7.11.2.2. During the course of the GEN47 meeting held on 18th October 1971 Prime Minister Heath indicated that he had agreed to a request to discuss allegations made concerning methods of interrogation of persons detained under the Special Powers legislation in Northern Ireland.

> "The Secretary of State for Defence said that....On 10 August he had been informed of the principles governing the proposed methods of interrogations: that detainees should be subject to medical supervision, that there should be no brutal or degrading treatment, and that interrogation should be carried out humanely, but under strict discipline; techniques designed to isolate detainees subject to interrogation, to prevent them from obtaining any exact sense of time and location and to impose fatigue by exposure to insistent and disturbing noise ("white sound") were regarded as proper. It was on the basis of this information that the Home Secretary and he had that day agreed that interrogation should be carried out according to these principles. The RUC conducted the interrogation and the Ministry of Defence provided supervision....As he understood it, the basic principles governing methods of interrogation, though not the precise techniques which he had mentioned, had been settled following the report on interrogations in Aden in 1967... Meeting of Cabinet sub-

[29] It can also be seen in the approach taken to the suggestion made by the Lord Chancellor Lord Hailsham that those who obstructed the army in carrying out their duties in Northern Ireland were ipso facto enemies of the Queen and could be shot as to which see for example X1.33.11 to X1.33.14. Sir Edward Heath gave evidence that "at the time people just said "Well that was Quinton" and got on with it and certainly as a government, of which I was Prime Minister, we took no notice at all" Day 282/87/21 to Day 282/87/24.

committee on Northern Ireland 18th October 1971 INQ 1.375 to INQ 1.379 at INQ1.376

"...While it was important that methods of interrogations should not overstep the proper bounds, it had to be remembered that the lives of British soldiers and of innocent civilians depended on intelligence. We were dealing with an enemy who had no scruples, and we should not be unduly squeamish over methods of interrogation in these circumstances. It was thought likely that the methods of interrogation employed in Northern Ireland had not greatly differed from those employed in Cyprus and Malaysia and, under the previous administration, in Aden..." INQ 1.375 to INQ 1.379 at INQ1.377.

7.11.2.3. Giving evidence, Sir Arthur Hockaday indicated that the techniques had been approved for application to a small proportion of internees at a time when "the Government, rightly or wrongly, did not realise that this was likely to be found, by at least a minority of the European Court of Human Rights, to be a "violation of rights"..." Day 271/39/16 to Day 271/39/19.

7.11.2.4. Sir Arthur therefore appears to suggest that Ministers were innocent of any unlawful intention in relation to the use of these techniques. His answers on this point are somewhat undermined however by the minutes of meeting of Cabinet sub-committee on Northern Ireland. 29 October 1971 G22C.163.5 to G22C.163.8. At G22C.163.6 it is noted that Sir Philip Allen (PUS Home Office) said that there appeared to be little doubt that the treatment of detainees would be held legally to constitute an assault; the issue might be raised in the Northern Ireland courts or, on more general grounds, before the European Commission on Human Rights. Despite this clear statement from a senior official the government ministers did not indicate that such activities should therefore be ceased immediately but rather discussed the public relations aspects of the allegations of ill treatment. Meeting of Cabinet sub-committee on Northern Ireland. 29 October 1971 G22C.163.5 to G22C.163.8 at G22C.163.6, G22C.163.7.

7.11.2.5. In fact the interrogation techniques used on internees were the subject of an inter-state case taken by Ireland against the United Kingdom at the European Court of Human Rights where they were found to constitute inhuman and degrading treatment[30].

7.11.3. Attitude to the People of Northern Ireland

7.11.3.1. The thrust of the approach to Northern Ireland by the military and the government was to deal with that jurisdiction as if it was a place apart, not really a part of the United Kingdom. That such thinking was abroad in a number of areas is clear from the following

(i) A note authored by Colonel Tugwell where he says "The indigenous Irish, once convinced that their cause is just, possess a breath-taking ability to lie with absolute conviction, not just in support of something they believe to be true, but to put across a story they know very well is untrue.." Note by Col Tugwell on public opinion and the Northern Ireland situation G26A.195.1 to G26A.195.6 at G26A.195.4

(ii) The note authored by Adrian Thorpe, which appears at KW3.86 to KW3.87.

(iii) This document, entitled "The Problem of Londonderry" and dated June 1972 was addressed to Mr Kelvin White and is commented on in his statement:

"This is a minute by Adrian Thorpe of RID (one of two or three juniors in RID) to myself regarding a MoD draft paper by Anthony Stephens on "The Problem of Londonderry". I have been specifically drawn to paragraph 3 of Mr Thorpe's minutes where he comments "As you know I have always been in favour of encouraging the no-go areas to rot from within; there is no reason why we should not encourage the break-down of essential services and the spread of disease etc." KW3.33 paragraph 24

[30] Judgment Ireland v UK [Series A No. 25 18th January 1978] 2 EHRR 25

"I have no recollection about this document now, nor can I explain why Adrian Thorpe made this comment. I clearly did not give his suggestion any serious thought. My handwritten comment at the top of the document says that any further action on the MoD paper would not be until early July. The matter was "comatose, if not dead". I was not aware at any stage of the government discussing or seriously contemplating the positive break down of essential services in Londonderry." KW3.33 paragraph 25

Kelvin White accepted that he saw this paper. He identified his handwriting on the top right corner of the copy the Tribunal has. That appears to say

"This is now comatose, if not dead. If the ceasefire does not work, and we should see clearly within the week, then we must pursue NIO on the JSC paper, which will take precedence over this MoD effort. For unless the ceasefire does work, some military moves against L'Derry are almost inevitable I judge therefore look again on 3 July" KW3.86

The discussion in this memo is therefore not judged to be outrageous and beyond consideration. The note on the Thorpe paper from White himself in no way discounts the proposal outlined therein. Indeed it is clear from the paper that this was a matter that the two men (i.e. Thorpe and White) had discussed previously "As you know I have always been in favour of encouraging the no-go areas to rot from within...". The language suggests that civilian deaths as a result of such a plan would not be out of the question, if not inevitable. Presumably if, during the course of previous discussion it had been made clear to Thorpe that such a proposal was unacceptable, he would not have repeated it in his paper.

It was confirmed to the Tribunal when Mr White gave evidence that Mr Thorpe is now British Ambassador to Mexico. Clearly nothing he said in this paper in any way hindered his rise to the very top of the diplomatic corps.

(i) Giving evidence to this Tribunal Mr White agreed that Mr Thorpe's suggestion was not "practical, sensible or moral" in that order Day 269/97/18 and agreed that he did not reprimand Mr Thorpe. He did however, provide further evidence of the general attitude when he said

> A. What I said at the time I cannot possibly recall. I do not think that was practical, sensible or moral, no. But what I would have said to Adrian was probably something along the lines of "Forget it, do not be absurd. You know you cannot do that broadside. Stick to the Guinness wagons". And that was our old joke, that the no-go areas would not survive if the no-go areas forbade entrance to the Guinness wagons supplying the pubs. It was just a joke. Day 269/97/17 to Day 269/97/25 emphasis added

7.11.4. Contemplation of Civilian Casualties

7.11.4.1. In addition there are, among the papers, numerous examples of the willingness of both the British Government and the army to contemplate military operations that would lead to the use of unlawful force against civilians, and in particular the civilian population of the Bogside and

Creggan in Derry. While this is discussed in more detail in section 10 it can be noted here that the following provide ample evidence of this fact

(i) Note of Home Secretary's meeting with GOC and other senior officers at Lisburn, 14 December 1971 G40.259 to G40.262 at G40.261;

(ii) Future Military Policy in Londonderry – An Appreciation by the CLF 14th December 1971 G41.263 to G41.274 at G41.270;

(iii) General Ford's memo The Situation in Londonderry as at 7th January 1972 G48.299 to G48.301 at G48.300;

(iv) The CGS report to GEN47 Minutes of a Meeting held at 10 Downing Street, Tuesday 11 January 1972 GEN 47 G50.307 to G50.309 at G50.308, G50.309

(v) Loose Minute: Northern Ireland Marches in 1972 by Colonel Dalzell-Payne. 27 January 1972 G82.512 to G82.521 at G82. 519

7.11.5. Failure to Investigate and Impunity

7.11.5.1. It appears that in the time period between June 1971 and the end of January 1972 thirty-six civilians were shot by the army in disputed circumstances[31]. If the papers in Bundle G are examined it is clear that not one of those deaths was ever mentioned at a GEN 47 meeting, nor were they mentioned at any of the Ministry of Defence's Northern Ireland Policy Group meetings.

7.11.5.2. This apparent lack of political concern in relation to disputed deaths occurring in a part of the country for which the British Government had ultimate responsibility is astounding. In fact it appears that even when deaths produced significant political developments they did not merit any comment. This can be most clearly seen in relation to the shooting in Derry of Seamus Cusack and Desmond Beattie in July 1971. They were accused by the army of being in possession of a rifle and a bomb respectively, claims which were vigorously denied by eyewitnesses. The (Northern Ireland) government's refusal to hold an inquiry into their deaths led to the SDLP's withdrawal from Stormont and an escalation of the political crisis. Yet the deaths themselves are not mentioned as an issue of concern in the meetings held by British Ministers at the time, nor is the possibility of the establishment of an inquiry into the deaths discussed – a move that would undoubtedly have taken the heat out of the political situation. This state of affairs illustrates the latitude and unquestioning support given to the Army in the manner in which they undertook their task in Northern Ireland. In this regard see also Section Nine.

7.11.5.3. Other examples of the British Government's attitude to the actions of the army can be seen in the following

(i) Their reaction to the initial internment operation. At the GEN 47 meeting following the launch of Operation Demetrius the minutes record that those present thought "The conduct of the Army had been highly commendable." This in circumstances where nine civilians, including a priest, Father Hugh Mullan, were shot dead by soldiers on 9th August alone. Minutes of a meeting of the Cabinet Sub-Committee on Northern Ireland 12 August 1971 INQ 1.371 to INQ1.374 at INQ1.374

(ii) Their reaction to the events at Magilligan beach in the week prior to Bloody Sunday. The brutality of the soldiers there do not appear on the agenda of any Ministerial meeting held in the following week[32]. It was not mentioned at the GEN 47 meeting, either by the CGS who,

[32] MOD Northern Ireland Policy Group G75D.462.5; Minutes of a Meeting Held at 10 Downing Street Thursday 27 January 1972 G78.485.001 to G79.487.3

as usual, reported to the meeting on the security situation, or by Ministers who showed no concern there at the scenes shown on television the previous week. That officials were alive to the problems created by army actions at Magilligan is clear. The following passage appears in the briefing paper prepared for the Prime Minister in advance of the GEN47 meeting of 27th January

i. "You may wish to question the Secretary of State for Defence about recent suggestions in the Press and on television that the Army over-reacted against some of the Civil Rights demonstrations last weekend and that, in particular, soldiers of the Parachute Regiment, by being unnecessarily rough, have gratuitously provoked resentment among peaceful elements of the Roman Catholic population." G75CA.462.5.1 to G75CA.462.5.4 at G75CA.462.5.4 paragraph 12

ii. Giving evidence to this Tribunal Sir Edward Heath claimed not to remember what had taken place at Magilligan Day 290/119/10. In any event, he said he did not take up this suggestion "Yes, well, I did not ask him that because I did not think it was necessary" Day 282/131/9 to Day 282/131/10[33]. Lord Carrington did remember the events at Magilligan Day 280/38/2 to Day 280/38/3 and agreed that the Prime Minster had not taken up the suggestion in the brief to question him about those events in the GEN 47 meeting.

(iii) On 25th January 1972 an article, authored by Simon Hoggart and Simon Winchester, appeared in the Guardian newspaper. The article appears at L7. The article claimed that at least two army units in Belfast had requested that the Parachute Regiment be kept out of their areas because of their reputation for brutality. The article appears to have prompted some activity within the Ministry of Defence, the results of which can be seen in a memo from the Col GS MO4 (Colonel Dalzell-Payne) to the MA/CGS (Sir David

[33] see also his supplementary statement KH4.89 paragraph 28

Ramsbotham) at G75A.462.1, a telegram to the Ministry of Defence from 39 Brigade at G75B.462.2 a memo to the Secretary of State for Defence from the Under Secretary of State (Army) at G75C.462.3 to G75C.462.4 and a memo from the APS to the Secretary of State for Defence to the PS of the Minister of State G75E.462.6. Among these papers there are various suggestions for action that might be taken against the journalists involved but no proposals for investigating the veracity of the reported comments.

i. Giving evidence to the Tribunal Sir Edward Heath appeared to confuse the issue of media coverage of the events at Magilligan with the article that appeared in the Guardian. As to the latter, he appeared to say that his reaction was to automatically dismiss it ii. "-and we said "Very well, we know this paper" and we took no notice of it." Day 290/118/12 to Day 290/118/13.

(iv) These incidents are, of course, overtaken by the attitude displayed by the government ministers in the aftermath of Bloody Sunday. Rather than taking an objective approach to the terrible events of 30th January 1972 government ministers appeared to accept with little or no analysis, the Army's version of events and set about propagating that version of events in advance of the proposed inquiry. Sir Edward Heath gave evidence to this Tribunal to the effect that he, as Prime Minister, had no disciplinary force over the army Day 285/140/15 to Day 285/142/21. Some examples of the government's approach in this regard can be seen in the following documents

(a) Prime Minister Heath's telephone conversation with Taoiseach Jack Lynch. Telephone Conversation between the Prime Minister and the Prime Minister of the Republic of Ireland on Sunday 30 January G104A.635.1 to G104A.635.9

(b) At the NIPG meeting on the morning of 31st January 1972 there was discussion of how to make "our version of the facts public" Minutes of a meeting of the NIPG Monday 31 January 1972 G101.606 to G101.608 at G101.608

(c) At the GEN 47 meeting later that morning Ministers indicated that they had no doubt "that the facts as reported by the Chief of the General Staff were essentially correct, there were numerous direct conflicts of evidence, and a quite different version had been given currency in the publicity media. It would be wrong to leave unchallenged the allegations that had been made against the Army; and to refuse the widespread demand for an enquiry into the incidents would be represented as suggesting that the Army had something to hide." Minutes of a meeting held at Downing Street 31 January 1972 G99A.600.004 to G100.605 at G100.601

(d) The Government followed through on its objective to "make our version of the facts public" when on 1st February 1972 the Minister of State for Defence Lord Balniel delivered a statement in the House of Commons V24 to V28. The statement was delivered in advance of the setting up of the Widgery Tribunal because "It is not right that the Army's case should go by default when bitter, intemperate and, to the best of my belief inaccurate or untrue statements have been made against it." V24.

Giving evidence to this Tribunal Lord Carrington tried to suggest that the speech made by Lord Balniel was an attempt to "put some objectivity into the accusations made against the Army immediately after Bloody Sunday" Day 280/114/17 to Day 280/114/17 and denied that the speech was part of a propaganda war Day 280/115/7. That this is exactly what the speech was designed to do can be seen from its content, its timing and the discussions that took place in the GEN 47 and NIPG meetings referred to above.

On Day 247 the Tribunal announced that Lord Crawford (as Lord Balniel now is) would be excused from giving oral evidence to the Tribunal on medical grounds Day 247/1/1 to Day 247/1/13. The parties were invited to pose questions to him in written form. We delivered these questions to the Inquiry under cover of letter dated 14th November 2002. On 19th June 2003 in response to our letter of 18th June 2003 the then solicitor to the Inquiry, John Tate, indicated that the written questions had not, at that stage, been furnished to Lord Crawford. After a number of requests[34] answers to those questions were finally provided to the parties under cover of letter dated 3rd March 2004. Lord Crawford's supplementary statement (dated 20th February 2004) merely reiterates the reasons he gave at the time for making the speech KC10.15 paragraphs 50 to 51. However his answer to question 25 from Madden & Finucane clearly demonstrates the purpose of that speech. In that answer he indicates that "the presentation of the army's case was important" and "silence by the Ministers who were responsible for the armed forces would certainly have had a damaging effect on morale.." KC10.19 paragraph 25.

7.12. Conclusion

7.12.1. It can therefore be seen that a combination of the circumstances existing in the months before Bloody Sunday and the interaction between the British Government, the Northern Ireland Government and the Army led to a situation where

(i) The British Government had clear objectives in mind, namely the maintenance of devolved government in Northern Ireland and the speedy withdrawal of the army;

(ii) In trying to achieve these objectives they gave disproportionate weight to the pressures faced by the Northern Ireland government and allowed their Northern Ireland policy to be guided by the question of what would keep the unionists on board;

[34] As to which see letter dated 28th January 2004 entitled "Outstanding Issues" from Peter Madden to Gordon Dickinson.

(iii) The divided constitutional responsibility for security meant that it was not clear from whom the army took their political direction;

(iv) The British Government did not provide the army with adequate political direction and indeed by its actions failed to uphold the rule of law in Northern Ireland and countenanced measures that would not have been acceptable for use in Britain;

(v) In addition the Government provided unquestioning and uncritical support to the army at a time when accusations of murder and brutality were abroad;

(vi) The Army were thus aware that the use of lethal force would be tolerated if felt necessary to advance the security situation and/or to appease Unionists;

(vii) In these circumstances the Army came under severe pressure from the exclusively unionist Northern Ireland political establishment and was disproportionately influenced by those around it;

(viii) This led to a situation where the political objectives of the Northern Ireland government dictated the military objectives of the Army.

8 LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL CONSIDERATIONS IN 1972

8.1 General Introduction

8.1.1 The very first conclusion which the Widgery Report made was:

> "there would have been no deaths in Londonderry on the 30th of January if those who organised the illegal march had not thereby created a highly dangerous situation in which a clash between demonstrators and the security forces was almost inevitable"

8.1.2 In this section we challenge the assertion that the march on 30 January 1972 was illegal. In doing so, we examine (a) the basic constitutional framework and the respective responsibilities of the Westminster and Northern Ireland Parliaments and (b) the relevant domestic and international legal framework within which the Order prohibiting the march was made.

8.2 Summary of Submissions

8.2.1 It is submitted that the Order of 9 August 1971, the consequent prohibition of the civil rights march in Derry on 30 January 1972 and the operation to enforce the prohibition violated Article 11 of the European Convention.

8.2.2 It is further submitted that the Order was an invalid and unlawful exercise of the statutory powers conferred by Section 2(2) of the Public Order Act (NI) 1951.

8.3 The Government of Ireland Act 1920

8.3.1 Section 4(1) of the Government of Ireland Act 1920 ("the 1920 Act") provided:

FS1.507

"Subject to the provisions of this Act ... the Parliament of Northern Ireland shall ... have power to make laws for the peace, order and good government ... of Northern Ireland".[1]

8.3.2 The 1920 Act established a bicameral Parliament and provided for reduced representation of the Northern Ireland electorate at Westminster. Section 4(1) transferred to the Northern Ireland Parliament ("Stormont") the extensive power to make laws for "the peace, order and good government" of the Province. This grant of power was residual in that it was subject to certain limitations[2]. First, excepted matters, which dealt with matters of Imperial or national concern, remained within the exclusive competence of Westminster. Secondly, reserved matters, which included postal services, savings banks, certain major taxes and the Supreme Court, some of which had been intended for transfer to the all-Ireland Parliament had it come into existence, were, for as long as they remained reserved matters, equated with excepted matters and consequently they too stayed within Westminster's exclusive competence. All other matters, other than the excepted and reserved matters, were transferred to Stormont. Consequently, the 1920 Act created three categories of legislative power – transferred matters (the responsibility of Stormont) and reserved and excepted matters (the responsibility of Westminster).

8.3.3 Section 75 of the Act guaranteed Westminster's continued supremacy in Northern Ireland as in any other part of the United Kingdom –

"Notwithstanding the establishment of the Parliament of Northern Ireland ...or anything contained in this Act, the supreme authority of the Parliament of the United Kingdom shall remain unaffected and

---

[1] As to whether Section 4(1) granted to the Northern Ireland Parliament plenary legislative powers or whether it thereby qualified the power to legislate by reference to the purpose or at least the effect of the legislation see Calvert, Constitutional Law in Northern Ireland (1968) at pp.162-72; see also Hadfield, The Constitution of Northern Ireland (1989) at pp.63-70 – As Hadfield points out: "That the phrase "peace, order and good government" – sometimes called the "pogg clause" – is capable of bearing a construction limiting legislative competence is clear. If the words are not to be used as a criterion for assessing the vires of a statute, they become superfluous, and change the power granted to the power to make laws simpliciter".

[2] The provisions of the Act limiting this grant of power were Sections 4(1)(1) – (14), 5, 6, 9, 21, 22, 47, 64, 65, 68 and 75.

undiminished over all persons, matters and things in [Northern] Ireland and every part thereof"[3].

"Constitutional" Conventions

8.3.4 It is clear that Westminster not only possessed exclusive competence with relation to excepted and reserved matters, but also as a result of the doctrine of Parliamentary Sovereignty and through Sections 6, 12 (the Governor's power to withhold the Royal Assent) and Section 75 of the Act specifically, shared with Stormont competence over transferred matters.

8.3.5 The circumstances or conditions under which Westminster would exercise its powers over transferred matters was ultimately a matter for the Westminster Parliament itself which was free to act as it saw fit.

8.3.6 The Convention, however, developed with regard to Stormont that Westminster would legislate over transferred matters only with the consent of the Northern Ireland Government. This apparently gave Stormont exclusive powers over transferred matters. It was a position reinforced by a ruling of the Speaker of the Westminster House of Commons in 1923, that no questions could be asked at Westminster on matters transferred to Stormont on the ground that there was no Minister responsible therefore at Westminster:

> "With regard to those subjects which have been delegated to the Government of Northern Ireland, questions must be asked of Ministers in Northern Ireland, and not in this House"[4].

[3] This general assertion of Westminster sovereignty was reinforced by the provisions of Section 6(2) which provided that: "where any Act of ... the Parliament of Northern Ireland deals with any matter with respect to which that Parliament has power to make laws which is dealt with by any Act of the Parliament of the United Kingdom passed after the appointed day (3rd May 1921) and extending to the part of Ireland within its jurisdiction, the Act of ... the Parliament of Northern Ireland shall be read subject to the Act of the Parliament of the United Kingdom, and so far as it is repugnant to that Act, but no further, shall be void".
Section 6(1) reserved to Westminster the power to repeal or alter the Act except where the Act itself permitted the Northern Ireland Parliament to amend certain of its provisions (eg Section 14(5) enabling it to legislate regarding Stormont elections). It also withheld from the Northern Ireland Parliament the power to repeal or alter any Act of the Westminster Parliament passed after the appointed day and extending Northern Ireland, even although that provision dealt with a transferred matter.

[4] 1923 HC Vol63, Col 1625; This policy was said to derive from the division of responsibilities and powers between Westminster and Stormont in the Government of Ireland Act "It has been held by successive governments in the UK, regardless of party, that the reserve powers in the Government of Ireland Act do not enable the UK Government to intervene in matters, which, under Section 4 are the sole responsibility of the Northern Ireland Parliament and Government" Conservative Home Secretary,

8.3.7 The convention created the impression that Stormont had been given an exclusive competence over matters transferred to it and it also served to reduce the expression of Northern Ireland opinion on excepted and reserved matters to whatever the Northern Ireland Members at Westminster could achieve or felt inclined to try to achieve.

8.3.8 Professor Wheare has stated:

> "There is nothing in law to prevent the parliament of the United Kingdom from passing laws for Northern Ireland not merely on the specified reserved subjects, but on any subject whatever. Moreover, the parliament of Northern Ireland received its powers from the Parliament of the United Kingdom, and the latter can reduce or increase or abolish these powers. Of these two governments in the United Kingdom, one only can be described as independent and that is the government at Westminster. The government at Stormont is a dependent government".[5]

8.3.9 The fundamental constitutional reality that Stormont was the dependent government was graphically illustrated when Westminster used the full force of Section 75 and its own sovereignty to dissolve Stormont in 1972 and introduce direct rule.

8.4 Domestic Law on the Banning of Marches

8.4.1 Section 2(2) of the Public Order Act (Northern Ireland) 1951 ("the Act") provides:

> "... If at any time the Minister of Home Affairs is of opinion in consequence of information furnished to him by a member of the Royal Ulster Constabulary not below the rank of superintendent or for any other reason that-Henry Brooke House of Commons Debates, 5th ser., vol 698 cols 1097- 1152. 14 July 1964 A similar ruling was made by the Speaker of the Northern Ireland House of Commons ruling out questions and debate on matters outside its own competence: "Since ... we have no power to make laws on any of these reserve matters, they are not prima facie proper subjects for discussion here" (HC Debs (NI) Vol 8, Col 490.

[5] Wheare, Federal Government (4th Ed, 1963) pp 31-2

(a) the exercise of the powers conferred by the preceding sub-section will not be sufficient to prevent serious public disorder being occasioned by the holding of any public procession in any area; or

(b) the holding in any area or place of any public procession or any open-air public meeting is likely to cause serious public disorder or to cause undue demands to be made upon the police of military forces; or

(c) the holding in any area or place of any public procession or any open-air public meeting is likely to cause undue hardship to persons working or carrying on business in that area or place; the Minister may make an order-

(i) prohibiting, for such period not exceeding twelve months as may be specified in the order, the holding in that area or place of all public processions or open-air public meetings or of such classes of public procession or open-air public meeting as may be so specified;

(ii) ..."

8.4.2 An Order was made under this Section of the Act on 12 November 1971 by the Minister of Home Affairs for Northern Ireland, Brian Faulkner, which so far as material, was in the following terms:

"Whereas I, the Right Honourable Brian Faulkner, Minister of Home Affairs, am of the opinion in consequence of information furnished to me by the Chief Constable of the Royal Ulster Constabulary that by reason of the unrest and tension at present existing in Northern Ireland the holding of any public procession in any public highway, road, or street is likely to cause serious public disorder or to cause undue demands to be made upon the police or military forces.

Now, therefore, I, the Right Honourable Brian Faulkner, Minister of Home Affairs, in exercise of the powers conferred upon me by Section 2(2) of the Public Order Act (Northern Ireland) 1951 do hereby order that the holding of all public processions in any public highway, road or street in Northern Ireland is prohibited for the period commencing on 12th November 1971 and ending on 8 February 1972.

This Order revokes the Order made by me on 9th August 1971".

8.4.3 It is clear that the order banning marches was a quid pro quo for the introduction of internment LAW7.1. Faulkner and Shillington (Chief Constable) clearly did not consider that a blanket ban on all marches was necessary or justified (see Dalzell-Payne's paper G82.512 to G82.521). The prohibition order is unsurprisingly framed to make it appear as an intra vires exercise of statutory power. However, the contemporary documents disclosed to this Tribunal reveal that the dominant reason for the prohibition order was not the reason stated in the order but rather the insistence of Westminster that such a ban was a pre-condition for Westminster's agreement to the introduction of internment (which was only viable with the support of the armed forces). The exercise of the discretion conferred by the Act for the achievement of this collateral purpose was plainly unlawful.

8.4.4 A discretion exercised by a Minister as a consequence of a power conferred or a duty imposed by statute must be used "to promote the policy and objectives of the Act" – Lord Reid in Padfield v Minister of Agriculture [1968] AC 997, 1030B. It is well settled that a decision taken for a collateral purpose will be amenable to judicial review, see for instance In Re Cook's Application [1986] NI 242 and In Re De Brun & McGuinness [2001] NI 442.

8.5 Article 11 of the Convention on the Banning of Marches

8.5.1 Article 11 of the European Convention provides:

"1) Everyone has the right to freedom of assembly ...

2) No restriction shall be placed on the exercise of these rights other than such as are prescribed by law and are necessary in a democratic society in the interests of national security or public safety, for the prevention of disorder or crime, for the protection of health or morals or for the protection of the rights of others. This Article shall not prevent the imposition of lawful restrictions on the exercise of these rights by members of the armed forces, of the police or of the administration of the State".

8.5.2 Article 11 confers a right to hold meetings, marches and demonstrations on the public highway. This was established in the early case of Rassemblement Jurassien and Unite Jurassienne v Switzerland [1979] 17 DR 93 where the Commission began its analysis of Article 11 with the following statement of principle:

> "The Commission wishes to state at the outset that the right of peaceful assembly stated in this Article is a fundamental right in a democratic society and, like the right to freedom of expression, is one of the foundations of such society ... as such this right covers both private meetings and meetings in public thoroughfares ...[6]

8.5.3 Under the convention, orders banning meetings and marches can be justified only in extreme circumstances. In Christians against Racism and Fascism v UK (1980) 21 DR 138 the applicant association had planned to hold a procession to promote its aims: unity in the love of God and opposition to racism and fascism. An order was made under the Public Order Act 1936[7] prohibiting all processions other than those of a religious, educational, festive or ceremonial character for a period of four weeks. The effect of this order was to prevent them from holding their planned procession. It complained that its rights under articles 10 and 11 of the Convention had been violated.

8.5.4 The Commission began by observing that:

> "Under Article 11(1) of the Convention, the right to freedom of peaceful assembly is secured to everyone who has the intention of organizing a peaceful demonstration. In the Commission's opinion the possibility of violent counter-demonstrations, or the possibility of

[6] [1979] 17 DR 93 at Para 119. This approach has been reinforced by subsequent decisions of the European Court, see, for example, Plattform Artze fur das Leben v Austria [1988] 13 EHRR 204, Ezelin v France [1992] 14 EHRR 362, Chorherr v Austria [1993] 17 EHRR 358

[7] Now Public Order Act 1986

extremists with violent intentions, not members of the organising association, joining the demonstration cannot as such take away that right. Even if there is a real risk of a public procession resulting in disorder by developments outside the control of those organising it, such procession does not for this reason alone fall outside the scope of Article 11(1) of the Convention, but any restriction placed on such an assembly must be in conformity with the terms of paragraph 2 of that provision".[8]

8.5.5 On the question of necessity, the Commission held:

"A general ban on demonstrations can only be justified if there is a real danger of their resulting in disorder which cannot be prevented by other less stringent measures. In this connection, the authority must also take into account the effect of a ban on processions which do not by themselves constitute a danger for public order. Only if the disadvantage of such processions being caught by the ban is clearly outweighed by the security considerations justifying the issue of the ban, and if there is no possibility of avoiding such undesirable side effects of the ban by a narrow circumspection of its scope in terms of its territorial application and duration, can the ban be regarded as being necessary within the meaning of Article 11(2) of the Convention".[9]

8.5.6 On the unchallenged facts the Commission found that the situation existing in London at the time was characterised by a tense atmosphere resulting in a series of riots and disturbances caused by public processions of the National Front and counter-demonstrators, particularly in the run up to a by-election in Lambeth. In view of this prevailing atmosphere of violence and the impending by-election and the fact that the applicant's procession could have taken place two days later (when the ban ran out), the Commission found no violation of article 11.

[8] Note 45 at para 4
[9] Note 45 at para 5

8.5.7 In Rai and Others v UK (1995) 82-A DR 134[10] the Commission had to consider government policy not to allow meetings in Trafalgar Square on issues related to Northern Ireland. Having reviewed the origin and scope of the policy, the Commission concluded that:

> "Having regard to the fact that the refusal of permission did not amount to a blanket prohibition on the holding of the applicant's rally but only prevented the use of a high profile location (other venues being available in Central London) the Commission concludes that that restriction in the present case may be regarded as proportionate and justified as necessary in a democratic society ..."

Had the policy been more broadly drawn, or alternative venues not available, the decision might have been different.

8.5.8 The breadth of the August ban (extending the previous ban) could not, on any showing, having regard to the contemporary documents and evidence, be regarded as proportionate and justified as necessary in a democratic society. Accordingly, in our submission the ban and the operation to enforce it violated Article 11 of the Convention.

Part II

8.6 General Introduction & Summary of Submissions

8.6.1 As a matter of practice allegations of the use of unlawful force against military personnel were not properly investigated because the police duty to investigate was unlawfully delegated to the Royal Military Police. Since the underlying objectives of a proper investigation are to underpin the right to life, it is apparent that the State operated and applied a policy which was incompatible with respect for the right to life itself.

8.6.2 In the run up to Bloody Sunday the Westminster Government and the Stormont regime countenanced and implemented measures which violated fundamental rights and freedoms including the non-derogable rights contained in Article 3 (prohibition of torture, inhuman and degrading treatment).

[10] See also Pendragon v UK [1999] EHRLR 223

8.6.3 The armed forces were not authorised to arrest people under the Special Powers Act ("the SPA") since the relevant provisions purporting to thus empower them were ultra vires the Government of Ireland Act 1920.

8.6.4 The arrest operation by the Army on Bloody Sunday under the SPA was on this account wholly unlawful.

8.6.5 Those who authorised the deployment of the army must have known or be deemed to have known that the use of the army to conduct an arrest operation under the auspices of the SPA was unlawful.

8.6.6 The decision that soldiers should exercise these powers was the ultimate responsibility of the Secretary of State and Her Majesty's Government at Westminster.

8.7 Internment

8.7.1 Following mounting pressure from the unionist community the decision to introduce a policy of detention and internment was taken on 5 August 1971 by the Northern Ireland Government, following a meeting in London between the Northern Ireland and United Kingdom Governments G5.50 to G5.55.

8.7.2 The planned exercise was not aimed at any section of the unionist community but was used at this time exclusively against nationalists and republicans[11] and often on the basis of inadequate or inaccurate information.

8.7.3 Starting at 4.00am on Monday, 9 August 1971, the army, with police officers occasionally acting as guides, mounted an operation to arrest the 452 persons whose names appeared on the final list. In the event, some 350 persons were arrested in accordance with the Special Powers Regulations. The arrested persons were taken to one of the three regional holding centres at Magilligan, Ballykinler or Girdwood that had been set up to receive the prisoners during 48 hours. All those arrested were

[11] At 11.15am on 9 August 1971, the Prime Minister of Northern Ireland announced to the public the introduction of internment. He stated, inter alia:
"The main target of the present operation is the Irish Republican Army ... They are the present threat; but we will not hesitate to take strong action against any other individuals or organisations who may present such a threat in the future."

subjected to interrogation by police officers of the Royal Ulster Constabulary (RUC). 104 persons were released within 48 hours. Those who were to be detained were sent on to the prison ship "Maidstone" or to Crumlin Road Prison, both in Belfast.

8.7.4 The introduction of internment provoked a violent reaction within the Catholic community. Serious rioting broke out in Belfast and elsewhere, there was a considerable increase in shootings and bombings, and the security situation in general deteriorated rapidly. Within the minority community there occurred a further alienation from the authorities and the security forces.

8.7.5 The Special Powers Act empowered the Minister of Home Affairs for Northern Ireland to take all such steps and issue all such orders as might be necessary for preserving peace and maintaining order. It was an enabling Act whose substantive provisions were contained in Regulations made there under.

The number and scope of the Regulations in force varied over the years; they could be brought into use without any legislative act or proclamation. Regulations 10, 11 and 12 were utilised to implement the policy of internment introduced on 9 August 1971.[12]

8.7.6 Twelve persons arrested on 9 August 1971 and two persons arrested in October 1971 were singled out and taken to one or more unidentified centres. There, between 11 to 17 August and 11 to 18 October respectively, they were submitted to a form of "interrogation in depth" which involved the combined application of five particular techniques.

It emerges from the Commission's establishment of the facts in Ireland v UK [1978] 2 EHRR 25 that the techniques consisted of:

(a) wall-standing: forcing the detainees to remain for periods of some hours in a "stress position", described by those who underwent it as being "spreadeagled against the wall, with their fingers put high

[12] For a full analysis and explanation of the relevant powers see paras.83 and 84 of Ireland v UK [1978] 2 EHRR 25 above the head against the wall, the legs spread apart and the feet back, causing them to stand on their toes with the weight of the body mainly on the fingers";

(b) hooding: putting a black or navy coloured bag over the detainees' heads and, at least initially, keeping it there all the time except during interrogation;

(c) subjection to noise: pending their interrogations, holding the detainees in a room where there was a continuous loud and hissing noise;

(d) deprivation of sleep: pending their interrogations, depriving the detainees of sleep;

(e) deprivation of food and drink: subjecting the detainees to a reduced diet during their stay at the centre and pending interrogations.

The Commission's findings as to the manner and effects of the application of these techniques on two particular case-witnesses are referred to at paragraph 104 of the Report [1978] 2 EHRR 25.

8.7.7 In Ireland v UK it was conceded by the British Government that the use of the five techniques was authorised at "high level". Although never committed to writing or authorised in any official document, the techniques had been orally taught to members of the RUC by the English Intelligence Centre at a seminar held in April 1971.

8.7.8 Reports alleging physical brutality and ill-treatment by the security forces were made public within a few days of internment. A committee of enquiry under the chairmanship of Sir Edmund Compton was appointed by the United Kingdom Government on 31 August 1971 to investigate such allegations. Among the 40 cases this Committee examined were 11 cases of persons subjected to the five techniques in August 1971; its findings were that interrogation in depth by means of the techniques constituted physical ill-treatment. The Committee's report (Cmd 4823), adopted on 3 November 1971, was made public, as was a supplemental report of 14 November by Sir Edmund Compton in relation to 3 further cases occurring in September and October, one of which involved the techniques.

8.7.9 The Compton reports came under considerable criticism in the United Kingdom. On 16 November 1971, the British Home Secretary announced that a further Committee had been set up under the chairmanship of Lord Parker of Waddington to consider "whether, and if so in what respects, the procedures currently authorised for interrogation of persons suspected of terrorism and for their custody while subject to interrogation require amendment".

The Parker report (Cmd 4901), which was adopted on 31 January 1972, contained a majority and a minority opinion. The majority report concluded that the application of the techniques, subject to recommended safeguards against excessive use, need not be ruled out on moral grounds. On the other hand, the minority report by Lord Gardiner disagreed that such interrogation procedures were morally justifiable, even in emergency conditions. Both the majority and the minority considered the methods to be illegal under domestic law, although the majority confined their view to English law and to "some if not all the techniques".

8.7.10 The Parker report was published on 2 March 1972. On the same day, the United Kingdom Prime Minister stated in Parliament:

> "[The] Government, having reviewed the whole matter with great care and with reference to any future operations, have decided that the techniques ... will not be used in future as an aid to interrogation."

He further declared:

> "The statement that I have made covers all future circumstances. If a Government did decide ... that additional techniques were required for interrogation, then I think that ... they would probably have to come to the House and ask for the powers to do it."

As foreshadowed in the Prime Minister's statement, directives expressly prohibiting the use of the techniques, whether singly or in combination, were then issued to the security forces by the government.

8.7.11 At the hearing before the Court on 8 February 1977, the United Kingdom Attorney General made the following declaration:

> "The Government of the United Kingdom have considered the question of the use of the 'five techniques' with very great care and with particular regard to Article 3 (art. 3) of the Convention. They now give this unqualified undertaking, that the 'five techniques' will not in any circumstances be reintroduced as an aid to interrogation."

8.7.12 In its report, the Commission unanimously held that the combined use of the five techniques in the cases before it constituted a practice of inhuman and degrading treatment and of torture in breach of Article 3. It also concluded, again unanimously, that there had been at Palace Barracks, Holywood, in the Autumn of 1971, a practice in connection with the interrogation of prisoners by members of the RUC which was inhuman treatment in breach of Article 3 (art. 3) of the Convention.

8.7.13 The Court concluded that recourse to the five techniques amounted to a practice of inhuman and degrading treatment but not torture. The British Government did not contest before the Court, the finding of the Commission that the facts constituted a practice of inhuman and degrading treatment.

8.7.14 Accordingly, a short period of time before Bloody Sunday and in conjunction with internment, a practice of inhuman and degrading treatment in violation of both domestic and international law, had been in place – a practice which it was conceded by the British Government was authorised at a "high level".

8.8 Role of the Army in support of the Civil Power

8.8.1 When called to the aid of the civil power soldiers in no way differ in the eyes of the law from other citizens, although, by reason of their organization and equipment, there is always a danger that their employment in aid of the civil power may in itself constitute more force than is necessary. LAW 12.2, 3[13]

8.8.2 Indeed, in McCann, the European Court held that in determining whether the use of force was compatible with Article 2 that it is necessary to carefully scrutinize not only whether the force used was strictly proportionate but also whether the operation was planned and controlled by the authorities so as to minimise, to the greatest extent possible, recourse to lethal force (see para.194 of the Judgment).

8.8.3 The Law Officers at the time expressed their opinion thus:

> "... A soldier differs from the ordinary citizen in being armed and subject to discipline; but his rights and duties in dealing with crime

---

[13] In R v Clegg [1995] 1 All ER 334 Lord Lloyd stated as follows:

"The special position of a soldier in Northern Ireland is reflected in Lord Diplock's speech in the same case ([1976] 2 All ER 937 at 946, [1977] AC 105 at 136-137):

> 'There is little authority in English law concerning the rights and duties of a member of the armed forces of the Crown when acting in aid of the civil power; and what little authority there is relates almost entirely to the duties of soldiers when troops are called on to assist in controlling a riotous assembly. Where used for such temporary purposes it may not be inaccurate to describe the legal rights and duties of a solider as being no more than those of an ordinary citizen in uniform. But such a description is in my view misleading in the circumstances in which the army is currently employed in aid of the civil power in Northern Ireland ... In theory it may be the duty of every citizen when an arrestable offence is about to be committed in his presence to take whatever reasonable measures are available to him to prevent the commission of the crime; but the duty is one of imperfect obligation and does not place him under any obligation to do anything by which he would expose himself to risk of personal injury, nor is he under any duty to search for criminals or seek out crime. In contrast to this a soldier who is employed in aid of the civil power in Northern Ireland is under a duty, enforceable under military law, to search for criminals if so ordered by his superior officer and to risk his own life should this be necessary in preventing terrorist acts. For the performance of this duty he is armed with a firearm, a self-loading rifle, from which a bullet, if it hits the human body, is almost certain to cause serious injury if not death'.

I would particularly emphasise the last sentence in the above quotation. In most cases of a person acting in self-defence, or a police officer arresting an offender, there is a choice as to the degree of force to be used, even if it is a choice which has to be exercised on the spur of the moment, without time for measured reflection. But in the case of a soldier in Northern Ireland, in the circumstances in which Pte Clegg found himself, there is no scope for graduated force. The only choice lay between firing a high-velocity rifle which, if aimed accurately, was almost certain to kill or injury, and doing nothing at all".

are precisely the same as those of the ordinary citizen. ... they must act on their own responsibility ... they must not use lethal weapons to prevent or suppress minor disorder or offences of a less serious character, and in no case should they do so if less extreme measures will suffice. Should it be necessary for them to use extreme measures they should, whenever possible, give sufficient warning of their intention. LAW 12.12 to 12.13

MINISTERIAL RESPONSIBILITY

8.8.4 As set out before, the Government of Ireland Act 1920 empowered the Northern Ireland Parliament to make laws for the peace, order and good government of Northern Ireland, but specifically excluded the power to legislate about the Armed Forces and defence matters generally. These remained the responsibility of Westminster.

8.8.5 A soldier acts under higher military authority up the chain of command as far as the Defence Council and ultimately Her Majesty. The Secretary of State is the Minister responsible to Her Majesty for everything connected with the performance of their military duties by the Armed Forces of the Crown.

8.8.6 The decision whether or not soldiers should exercise the powers under the SPA was the responsibility of higher authority in the chain of command up to the Defence Council and is thus the ultimate responsibility of the Secretary of State and Her Majesty's Government at Westminster.

LAW 13.1 to 13.4

8.9 Army's power of Arrest and Detention

8.9.1 On 18 August 1971 John Hume MP, Ivan Cooper MP and others were arrested under the Civil Authorities (Special Powers) Act NI 1922 on the grounds that they had remained in an assembly of more than 3 persons after being ordered to disperse by an Army Officer. On 8 September 1971 they were convicted and fined £20. They challenged their conviction on the basis that Regulation 38 under which they were charged was outside the powers of the Minister who made the regulation and that the Regulation was outside the powers of the Parliament of Northern Ireland. Their essential point was that the power of the NI Parliament under section 4(1) of the Government of Ireland Act 1920 to make laws for the peace, order and good government of Northern Ireland was subject to the limitation that they should not have power to make laws in respect of the "navy, the army, the air force, the territorial army, or any other naval. Military or air force matter" and any law made in contravention of that limitation was to be void. The contention was that the conferment of powers on officers of the Armed Forces contravened that limitation. Such a contention, if well founded, would mean that their conviction was invalid because they had been ordered to disperse by an Army Officer under a regulation purportedly made under the SPA. The case was heard in the High Court on 11 and 12 January 1972 and judgment was reserved.

8.9.2 The Attorney General argued the case and the government must have been aware as to the possibility or indeed probability that arrests by the army under the SPA would be invalidated. This being so, any arrest under the SPA made by the Army on Bloody Sunday would be similarly invalidated.

8.9.3 At a meeting on 22 February 1972 the Cabinet agreed to rush legislation through Parliament retrospectively validating action taken by the Armed Forces under the SPA in the light of an adverse judgment quashing the convictions which was then expected.

8.9.4 On the following day judgment was delivered by Lowry LCJ in which he quashed the conviction accepting the contention that the conferment of powers of arrest on the armed forces by the Parliament of Northern Ireland was ultra vires the Government of Ireland Act 1920. The case is to be found at 1972 NI 91LAW 11.1 to LAW 11.35. On the same day and the beginning of the next what became the Northern Ireland Act 1972 passed through all its stages in both Houses and received the Royal Assent.

8.9.5 Accordingly at the time when the Army made arrests on 30 January 1972 under the SPA (as they did) they were all unlawful and that the arrest operation, which involved arrest under that Act, would also have been unlawful.

8.9.6 As noted earlier, ultimate responsibility for the exercise of these powers rested with the Secretary of State and Her Majesty's Government at Westminster.

8.10 Investigation of the Army in relation to offences against the ordinary criminal law

8.10.1 In R v Foxford [1974] NI 181 Lowry LCJ stated at p200

> "The preliminary statements of many of the civilian witnesses were not the only ones taken by an unorthodox procedure. We learnt that from September 1970 until September 1973 an RUC Force Order was in operation whereby if an offence against the ordinary criminal law was alleged against military personnel in Northern Ireland the interviewing of military witnesses and of the alleged offender himself was conducted exclusively by military investigation. This practice has been discontinued, but we deprecate this curtailment of the functions of the police and hope that the practice will not be revived"[14].

8.10.2 In the recent judicial review of In Re Mary Louise Thompson [Unreported – High Court – 28 February 2003] Kerr J (as he then was) accepted the Applicant's argument that the Respondent had not conducted a proper investigation into the shooting of the deceased by military personnel in Derry in 1971.

8.10.3 Kerr J stated as follows:

[14] See also Lynch v Ministry of Defence [1983] NI 216 at p224 Letter F – p225 Letter B where the Court referred to an entry in the Batallion Log of the relevant regiment which stated: "soldiers involved in incident not to be interviewed by RUC. RUC want to interview them, stall them – telephone me and I will dispatch Flying Lawyer". Hutton J (as he then was) stated "the Court deprocates this message. It is the function of the police to investigate shootings, including shootings where it may ultimately become apparent that soldiers open fire lawfully, and the military authorities should assist the police to carry out such investigations. Moreover, the attitude of mind shown in such a message gives rise to the suspicion that there is something to conceal, a suspicion which on full subsequent investigation may be shown to be unfounded". He then went on to apply to this message the words of Lord Lowry in Foxford quoted above.

"I need not rehearse all of the deficiencies adumbrated by the applicant in her skeleton argument to this court. I merely point to the circumstance that the soldier who effectively discharged the shot which caused the death of Mrs Thompson and those who were with him at the time were interviewed by a member of the Royal Military Police. I do not consider that this satisfied the duty imposed on the police at the time to properly investigate this fatal shooting. In my view it was not open to them to delegate that critical responsibility to another agency such as the Royal Military Police. Quite apart from that however, the fact that each of the interviews cannot have lasted any more than half an hour; the fact that clear discrepancies appear in the statements made, discrepancies which have not been the subject of further challenge or investigation, are sufficient to demonstrate the inadequacy of the investigation into the death of the deceased".

8.10.4 Accordingly, the duty imposed upon the police to properly investigate this incident involving lethal force by the army, in Derry, was unlawfully delegated to the Royal Military Police.

8.10.5 The essential purpose of such investigation is to secure the effective implementation of the domestic laws which protect the right to life and to ensure their accountability for deaths at the hands of state agents. By this means the right to life itself is secured.

8.10.6 The underlying objectives of the obligation to properly investigate are also intended to maintain public confidence in adherence to the rule of law and in preventing any appearance of collusion in or tolerance of unlawful acts.

8.10.7 However, what one finds is that by the time of Bloody Sunday there had been operating, for well over a year, a state sanctioned practice of not carrying out the necessary investigations of where, inter alia, there were allegations of the use of unlawful force against military personnel. This is clearly incompatible with the duty on the state to secure the right to life itself and demonstrates that at the material time there was a prevailing culture in which no or inadequate weight was given to the right to life and that the use of unlawful lethal force was tolerated or condoned.

8.11 Relevant Domestic Law on Use of Force

8.11.1 The reasonableness of the use of force has to be decided on the basis of the facts which the user of the force honestly believed to exist: this involves the subjective test as to what the user believed and an objective test as to whether he had reasonable grounds for that belief. Given that honest and reasonable belief, it must then be determined whether it was reasonable to use the force in question in the prevention of crime or to effect an arrest.[15]

8.11.2 The test of whether the use of force is reasonable, whether in self defence or to prevent crime or effect an arrest, is a strict one. It was described in the following terms in the Report of the Royal Commission appointed to consider the law relating to indictable offences:[16]

> "We take one great principle of the common law to be, that though it sanctions the defence of a man's person, liberty and property against illegal violence, and permits the use of force to prevent crimes to preserve the public peace and to bring offenders to justice, yet all this is subject to the restriction that the force used is necessary; that is, that the mischief sought to be prevented could not be prevented by less violent means; and that the mischief done by or which might reasonably be anticipated from the force used is not disproportionate to the injury or mischief, which it is intended to prevent".

8.11.3 Lord Justice McGonigal in Attorney General for Northern Ireland's Reference[17] stated his understanding of this approach as follows:[18]

> "... it appears to me that, when one is considering whether force used in any particular circumstances was reasonable, the test of reasonableness should be determined in the manner set out in that paragraph. It raises two questions:
>
> (a) Could the mischief sought to be prevented have been prevented by less violent means?

(b) Was the mischief done or which could reasonably be anticipated from the force used disproportionate to the injury or mischief which it was intended to prevent?

These are questions to be determined objectively but based on the actions of reasonable men who act in the circumstances and in the light of the beliefs which the accused honestly believed existed and held. Force is not reasonable if:

(a) greater than that necessary, or

(b) if the injury it causes is disproportionately greater than the evil to be prevented".

STATUS OF YELLOW CARD

8.11.4 Judicial dicta on the Yellow Card persistently stressed that breach of this document has no value in helping to ascertain the guilt of an offender charged with either murder or manslaughter. In 1975, at the murder trial, R v Jones [1975] 2 NIJB, following the death of Patrick McElhone Justice MacDermott stated:

> "For my part, I consider this card to be something which exists for some reason of policy and is intended to lay down guidelines to the forces, but in my view it does not define the legal rights of members of the security forces. No doubt it contains much sound advice but I can readily understand that to many soldiers and perhaps to others too, it is to say the lease of it a difficult document".

8.11.5 Justice MacDermott confirmed that a failure to follow the instructions contained in the document would not imply that the soldier's conduct had been unlawful. The views are echoed by Lord Chief Justice Lowry in the McNaughton case in the same year, [1975] NI 203. The soldier concerned was charged with attempted murder. The shooting had taken place after a bomb explosion in the vicinity of the soldier's patrol unit, which encountered John Walsh coming from the direction of the blast. Walsh alleged that he had been ordered to climb over a nearby fence by the accused and was subsequently shot on the basis that he was attempting to escape. In the course of his judgment, the judge reiterated that the Yellow Card was only a policy document remarking:

> "There was, of course, at the same time in existence what is called the yellow card, something the contents of which, it seems, are largely dictated by policy and are intended to lay down guidelines for the security forces but which do not define the legal rights and obligations of the forces under statute or common law". (p206 Letter C).

8.11.6 Some judges have regarded breaches of the instructions as "irrelevant" per Gibson LJ Attorney General's Reference [1976] NI 160 at 197.

8.11.7 Nevertheless it must be of importance that soldiers adhere to the standards that they have been set. McGonigal LJ in the Attorney General's Reference stated at page 191 Letter B:

> "The 'Yellow Card' has not, however, the effect of a rule of law and does not purport to define the legal limits. It is, therefore, only a factor to be taken into account. The test is still an objective test and the instructions in the 'Yellow Card' material factors to be taken into account in applying that test".

8.12 Article 2 of the European Convention

8.12.1 Article 2, which safeguards the right to life and sets out the circumstances when deprivation of life may be justified, ranks as one of the most fundamental provisions in the Convention, to which in peacetime no derogation is permitted under Article 15. Together with Article 3, it also enshrines one of the basic values of the democratic societies making up the Council of Europe. The circumstances in which deprivation of life may be justified must therefore be strictly construed. The object and purpose of the Convention as an instrument for the protection of individual human beings also requires that Article 2 be interpreted and applied so as to make its safeguards practical and effective.[19]

[19] See McCann & Ors v UK [1996] 21 EHRR 97

8.12.2 In the light of the importance of the protection afforded by Article 2, the Court must subject deprivations of life to the most careful scrutiny, taking into consideration not only the actions of State agents but also all the surrounding circumstances. Indeed, the burden of proof may be regarded as resting on the authorities to provide a satisfactory and convincing explanation.[20]

8.12.3 The test of Article 2, read as a whole, demonstrates that it covers not only intentional killing but also the situations where it is permitted to "use force" which may result, as an unintended outcome, in the deprivation of life. The deliberate or intended use of lethal force is only one factor however to be taken into account in assessing its necessity. Any use of force must be no more than "absolutely necessary" for the achievement of one or more of the purposes sot out in sub-paragraphs (a) to (c). This term indicates that a stricter and more compelling test of necessity must be employed from that normally applicable when determining whether State action is "necessary in a democratic society" under paragraphs 2 of Articles 8 to 11 of the Convention. Consequently, the force used must be strictly proportionate to the achievement of the permitted aims[21].

8.12.4 The training and instruction of agents of the state and the need for operational control are matters which raise issues under Article 2(2) concerning the proportionality of the state's response.

8.12.5 In determining whether the use of force was compatible with Article 2 it is necessary to carefully scrutinise not only whether the force used by the soldiers was strictly proportionate but also whether the policing operation was planned and controlled by the authorities so as to minimise, to the greatest extent possible, recourse to lethal force.

9. CRIMINAL CONDUCT AND NON-ACCOUNTABILITY OF SOLDIERS IN THE NORTH OF IRELAND

9.1 General Introduction and Summary of Submissions/allegations

9.1.1 Introduction

This section will introduce the themes that run throughout the submissions and allegations that will be made out in relation to the Criminal Conduct and Non-accountability of Soldiers in the North of Ireland on and around the time of Bloody Sunday.

9.1.1.1 In particular the following aspects will be considered.

1972 RMP/RUC AGREEMENT

Shooting with Impunity

General Lawlessness of the Soldiers

Modification of Rubber Bullets

Private Supplies of Ammunition

Breaches of the Yellow Card

Reputation of the Paras

9.1.1.2 It will be demonstrated that clearly the position on Bloody Sunday in Northern Ireland was that the criminal conduct and non-accountability of soldiers derived from the fact that policing in Northern Ireland had been unlawfully abdicated to the Army by the RMP/RUC Agreement.

9.1.1.3 In this context the army were ill-prepared and ill-suited to perform this function. This was the fault both of the military command, but also of the Government of the day.

9.1.1.4 The army permitted a culture to develop whereby criminal and murderous conduct was permitted so much so that individual soldiers could act with impunity. Soldiers knew that systems did not exist to hold them accountable for their actions and that there was no will among the authorities to hold unlawful behaviour to account.

9.1.1.5 The general lawlessness of the soldiers will be identified from their disregard for the Yellow Card; the modification of rubber bullets and the direct aiming of baton guns to cause maximum injury; the retention of additional rounds of ammunition to hide the unlawful firing of live rounds; the ability to kill with impunity; the aggressiveness and brutality of the Para Regiment and the desire to live up to this reputation when placed on the streets of Northern Ireland and in Derry on Bloody Sunday.

9.1.2 1972 RMP/RUC AGREEMENT

9.1.2.1 Consideration will be given to:

The deployment of the British Army in the North of Ireland in 1969
Introduction of principles of martial law to the policing of civil disorder

The creation of a framework within which the use of lethal force and a commitment to militarism became the prevalent response to the policing of a civil conflict.

The military's dominance of the criminal justice system.

Review of the jurisprudence in relation the protection of the Right to life to show:

i) Soldiers involved in lethal force incidents were removed from the control and sanction of the domestic legal system.

ii) Lethal force incidents involving soldiers were 'investigated' by the military.

iii) The military investigation was neither 'independent' nor 'effective'.

iv) The procedures were not effective in that the military put in place procedures for investigating allegations of criminal conduct against soldiers which were expressly designed: not to investigate allegations of criminal activity but rather to; suppress evidence of criminality on the part of soldiers, while assisting the Army in countering allegations made by civilians.

v) The procedures were not independent in that the innate sympathy of the SIB to the individual soldier, ensured that evidence of criminal conduct on the part of soldiers was not and could not be the outcome of an SIB investigation.

vi) The system expressly facilitated collusive behaviour on the part of soldiers, and collusion was also a feature of the conduct of the SIB in their conduct of the investigation.

vii) As a consequence lethal force incidents involving soldiers were inadequately investigated, and soldiers in uniform engaged in the use of lethal force operated outside the controls of the legal system, and were in a very real sense 'above the law'.

viii) The Agreement, with its consequential impact on the likelihood of a soldier facing criminal prosecution for the use of lethal force, was one of a number of elements which contributed to a culture in which soldiers used lethal force with impunity.

9.1.2.2 The agreement between the GOC and the Chief Constable of the RUC was illegal.

9.1.2.3 The control of the military meant that from the outset the soldier was operating in an environment designed to assist him in protecting himself from the threat of criminal sanction.

9.1.2.4 The purpose of the agreement was not merely to create an environment conducive to the concealment of misconduct, but to create a procedure whereby the Army could control the presentation of information about shooting incidents.

9.1.2.5 The actions of the Chief Constable in delegating to the RMP the interviewing of military personnel in lethal force incidents was not only a breach of the obligation of the police under domestic law to investigate such incidents.

9.1.3 Shooting with Impunity

9.1.3.1 It is our submission that there existed a system whereby soldiers using lethal force operated outside the law and a culture in which soldiers believed that they could use lethal force with impunity with permitted to flourish.

9.1.3.2 This culture informed the conduct of soldiers throughout Northern Ireland, but also operated as a relevant backdrop to the conduct of soldiers on Bloody Sunday.

9.1.3.3 There was a willingness to engage in the use of lethal force which would not have existed had soldiers been subjected to the normal rigours of the criminal justice system for their use of lethal force prior to Bloody Sunday.

9.1.4 General Lawlessness of Soldiers

9.1.4.1 The brutality and criminal activity of the Parachute Regiment will be examined by consideration of:

The treatment of soldiers during training and the conditioning to aggressive behaviour, which resulted in alleged frustration engendered brutality and callous and sadistic behaviour;

Unlawful assaults;

Robberies;

Planting of evidence to secure internment of civilians;

Racism.

These will demonstrate that the Parachute Regiment was completely incapable of carrying out the policing duties abdicated to them.

9.1.4.2 The concentration on the maximum use of force demonstrated sadistic tendencies that rendered their presence on the streets of Northern Ireland as a recipe for acts of murder, which was duly brought to fruition throughout Northern Ireland and on Bloody Sunday.

9.1.5 Modification of Rubber Bullets

9.1.5.1 There was a regular and widespread practice that rubber bullets fired from baton guns were modified by soldiers.

9.1.5.2 In addition there is extensive evidence of the misuse of rubber bullets contrary to acknowledged rules and practice for their use and this was done to inflict maximum injury to the person.

9.1.5.3 The modification and misuse of Rubber Bullets was so widespread that it is utterly implausible that senior Officers did not have knowledge of such practices. It is also clear that there was no proper system of check or control in force on Bloody Sunday on the number of baton rounds used by individual soldiers. It is quite clear that there was no system of control in place on Bloody Sunday for either the issue or recording on return of rubber bullets used. There is no evidence before the Inquiry of any disciplinary action or rebuke ever having been issued by officers in with regard to this practice.

9.1.6 Private Supplies of Ammunition

9.1.6.1 The practice of the keeping of private supplies of ammunition was widespread amongst soldiers and was a practice adopted by members of different ranks and regiments.

9.1.6.2 Senior Officers were aware of and condoned the practice. Checks were cursory and inadequate.

9.1.6.3 The purpose of keeping private supplies of ammunition could only be to facilitate the firing of shots and not having to account for them.

9.1.6.4 At least some soldiers carried extra supplies of ammunition on Bloody Sunday a practice must cast further doubt on the accounts of soldiers as to the quantity of shots discharged by them on the day.

9.1.6.5 The carrying of spare rounds of ammunition demonstrates the capacity of soldiers to act in an undisciplined and illegal manner.

9.1.7 Yellow Card

9.1.7.1 Government Role in respect of the drafting/approving of the Yellow Card

9.1.7.2 Commentary on the Yellow Card, in respect of the lack of clarity, training for soldiers, inherent residual discretion

9.1.7.3 Breaches of the Yellow Card (to include Para attitude to the Yellow Card)

9.1.7.4 Lack of disciplinary action in respect of the breaches

9.1.7.5 Incompatibility of the Yellow Card with Common Law Principles

9.1.8 Reputation Of The Paras

9.1.8.1 The Paras were credited with ensuring that no nationalist area was closed to military control. Their achievement was extolled constantly in the British media and through British Army public relations.

9.1.8.2 It is this type of thinking that led to the Paras being considered for deployment in Derry on 30 January 1972. That city had been seen to represent a failure for the army.

9.1.8.3 Underlying all, were the attitudes of superiority and invulnerability that were drummed into Paras and this inflated self-image of the ordinary Para was shared by the highest ranking soldiers.

9.1.8.4 Many Paras viewed bloody Sunday as a victory, for had they not once again lived up to their reputation for 'brutal efficiency.'

9.1.8.5 The military planners were guilty of a fatal lack of judgement in sending such troops into a very delicate situation such as Derry on 30 January 1972, especially when they were disregarding the advice of locally based commanders.

9.2 1972 RMP/RUC AGREEMENT

> "Those first two years.....the situation changed so much....made it up as we went along. Almost had a free hand....just a game with the SIB.....
> During that time, the second tour, we got away with murder."
> INQ 1413 O18.1 paragraph 3.[1]

9.2.1 INTRODUCTION

9.2.1.1 The deployment of the British Army in the North of Ireland in 1969 aimed to provide practical support for a local Police Force that could no longer cope with the civil disorder on the streets. However, the Army's deployment also introduced principles of martial law to the policing of civil disorder and put in place a framework within which the use of lethal force and a commitment to militarism became the prevalent response to the policing of a civil conflict.

9.2.1.2 As we will set out in more detail, the erosion of the role of the police in security matters and the illegal transfer of control over policing the security situation, from the police to the military, is key to an understanding of why lethal force was used on unarmed civilians in Derry.

9.2.1.3 However the military's dominance over the police was to be a feature, not merely in the conduct of security operations, but also of the criminal justice system. In theory, the army, when deployed in the North, operated in hierarchical subservience to the Police. In practice the lines of legal authority between the Police and the Army were blurred and in fact the military rather than the police were the dominant force.

[1] INQ 1413 denies that O18.1 are the notes made by Neil Davies during an interview with him for the Praxis Production Company.

9.2.1.4 In the 1970's an agreement was reached between the GOC and the Chief Constable of the RUC, whereby in an investigation into the use of lethal force by military personnel, the interviewing of soldiers would be carried out, not by members of the legally constituted police force, but by the RMP, another branch of the army 'family' tree. C3.1 paragraph 5

9.2.1.5 The existence of the agreement was documented by the then Deputy Assistant Provost Marshall (Special Duties)

> "Back in 1970 a decision was reached between the GOC and the Chief Constable whereby the RMP would tend to military witnesses and the RUC to civilian witnesses in the investigation of offences and incidents. With both the RMP and RUC sympathetic to the soldier, who after all was doing an incredibly difficult job, he was highly unlikely to make a statement incriminating himself, for the RMP investigator was out for information for managerial, not criminal purposes, and using their powers of discretion, it was equally unlikely that the RUC would prefer charges against soldiers except in the most extreme of circumstances." C3.1 paragraph 5

9.2.1.6 That the investigative process in relation to the use of lethal force by state agents is key to ensuring the protection of the right to life has been made explicitly clear by the jurisprudence of the European Court of Human Rights. As the Court stated in Jordan v. United Kingdom:

> "The obligation to protect the right to life under Article 2 of the Convention . . . requires by implication that there should be some form of effective official investigation when individuals have been killed as a result of the use of force . . . The essential purpose of such investigation is to secure the effective implementation of the domestic laws which protect the right to life and, in those cases involving State agents or bodies, to ensure their accountability for deaths occurring under their responsibility." [Jordan v. United Kingdom (2003) 37 EHRR 2, para. 105]

9.2.1.7 Two of the key features identified by the European Court of Human Rights in Jordan v. United Kingdom were that the investigation would be "effective" and "independent".

9.2.1.8 The investigation must be independent in that:

> "For an investigation into alleged unlawful killing by State agents to be effective, it may generally be regarded as necessary for the persons responsible for and carrying out the investigation to be independent from those implicated in the events . . . This means not only a lack of hierarchical or institutional connection but also a practical independence . ." [Jordan v. United Kingdom (2003) 37 EHRR 2, para. 106]

9.2.1.9 The investigation must be

> "effective in the sense that it is capable of leading to a determination of whether the force used in such cases was or was not justified . . . and to the identification and punishment of those responsible . . . This is not an obligation of result, but of means. The authorities must have taken the reasonable steps available to them to secure the evidence concerning the incident . . . Any deficiency in the investigation which undermines its ability to establish the cause of death or the person responsible will risk falling foul of this standard." [Jordan v. United Kingdom (2003) 37 EHRR 2, para. 107]

9.2.1.10 While these principles had not been expounded in 1972, they nonetheless articulate principles which of necessity underlie a properly functioning domestic criminal justice system. The absence of an independent and effective investigation results in a situation in which domestic law is not effectively implemented and state agents are rendered unaccountable for their use of lethal force. This contributes in turn to a culture within which soldiers engage in the use of lethal force without fear of criminal sanction and operate above the law.

9.2.1.11 That the principles enunciated by the European Court of Human Rights in Jordan v. United Kingdom were as valid in 1972 as they are today, is illustrated by the decision of the then Lord Chief Justice, Lord Lowry in R v Foxford:[2]

> "We learnt that from September 1970 an RUC Force Order was in operation whereby if an offence against the ordinary criminal law was alleged against the military personnel in Northern Ireland the interviewing of military witness and of the alleged offender himself was conducted exclusively by military investigation."

9.2.1.12 Lowry LCJ deprecated a policy which effectively curtailed the functions of the police investigation and undermined the workings of the criminal justice system.

9.2.1.13 As Major INQ 3 himself conceded during his oral testimony to this Inquiry, the entire purpose of the agreement was to "ensure that the conduct of soldiers could be protected from scrutiny". Day 256/186/14 to Day 256/186/20

9.2.1.14 By January 1972 the military had effectively supplanted the police as the dominant partner in all security operations resulting in an approach to policing in which notions of martial law rather than civil law were applied to law enforcement. In particular, the military were quick to have recourse to the use of maximal force and were slow to consider alternatives.

9.2.1.15 The RUC/RMP Agreement commenced in 1970 and continued until abolished in March 1972 by the Director of Public Prosecutions upon the imposition of Direct Rule and the establishment of the office of DPP in Northern Ireland. During that period soldiers engaged in the use of lethal force were not subject to the rigours of the domestic legal system, nor were they rendered accountable, in any way, for their use of lethal force.

9.2.1.16 The RUC were also in a real sense powerless to control the actions of soldiers acting outside the law. Day 211/152/23 to Day 211/157/1 The RUC/RMP Agreement was a significant usurpation of the police responsibility for the investigation of crime when the suspects were soldiers. This Agreement, combined with the military domination of security matters contributed significantly to the creation of a culture in which the military were able to enforce a militarist state of affairs without the constriction of the rule of law, and soldiers could commit acts of assault and use lethal force with impunity.

9.2.1.17 It is our submission that this Agreement meant that:

i) Soldiers involved in lethal force incidents were removed from the control and sanction of the domestic legal system.

ii) Lethal force incidents involving soldiers were 'investigated' by the military.

iii) The military investigation was neither 'independent' nor 'effective'.

iv) The procedures were not effective in that the military put in place procedures for investigating allegations of criminal conduct against soldiers which were expressly designed: not to investigate allegations of criminal activity but rather to; suppress evidence of criminality on the part of soldiers, while assisting the Army in countering allegations made by civilians.

v) The procedures were not independent in that the innate sympathy of the SIB to the individual soldier, ensured that evidence of criminal conduct on the part of soldiers was not and could not be the outcome of an SIB investigation.

vi) The system expressly facilitated collusive behaviour on the part of soldiers, and collusion was also a feature of the conduct of the SIB in their conduct of the investigation.

vii) As a consequence lethal force incidents involving soldiers were inadequately investigated, and soldiers in uniform engaged in the use of lethal force operated outside the controls of the legal system, and were in a very real sense 'above the law'.

viii) The Agreement, with its consequential impact on the likelihood of a soldier facing criminal prosecution for the use of lethal force, was one of a number of elements which contributed to a culture in which soldiers used lethal force with impunity.

9.2.2 The SIB Investigation

9.2.2.1 At the time of Bloody Sunday military investigations were the responsibility of 178 Provost Company; a unit of 1 Regiment RMP. With around 50 personnel, the major part of the company was made up of sub-units of an SIB Sergeant and six junior (untrained) NCO's.[3] The overwhelming proportion of the workload related to 'internal security incidents', i.e. shooting incidents. Day 383/122/3 to Day 383/122/5 Moreover the main function, in our submission, the only function, of the SIB was to receive statements for and on behalf of the military higher command CW1.67

9.2.2.2 It was claimed by Warrant Officer Wood that the SIB were "specialist investigators" and the "equivalent to the CID in the civil police force". CW1.1 paragraph 2 By way of contrast INQ 2025 responding to a query about the nature of the relationship between the SIB and the soldier, conceded that his primary purpose in dealing with a soldier in the immediate aftermath of Bloody Sunday was to protect the interests of the army rather then to help uncover the truth. Day 243/142/17 to Day 243/142/21

9.2.2.3 It is our submission that these "personnel trained in investigation to de-brief the soldiers concerned and to collect and preserve evidence where possible" CW1.1 paragraph 5 did so for the exclusive benefit of the military. The "RMP investigator was out for information for managerial, not criminal purposes" C3.10 paragraph 12 and the objective was to enable the army to counter allegations against civilians, rather than to uncover wrongdoing within the army.

9.2.2.4 In essence it is our submission that the structural deficiencies of the system were such as to ensure that the investigation conducted was not "effective" and thus was incapable of establishing whether the force used was justified in the circumstances. It is our further submission that the SIB, as with the rest of the Army, was imbued with the military culture of "closing ranks". The system lacked independence in both its hierarchical and practical sense, the SIB were blatantly sympathetic and biased towards the soldier and this operated to ensure that where the normal mechanisms failed to protect the soldier from scrutiny, the individual SIB officer would achieve that objective.

The Structural Deficiencies of the Investigation:

9.2.2.5 The 'Brief for Investigators' and accompanying aide-memoire drafted by Warrant Officer Wood and signed by the Assistant Provost Marshall, INQ1383 give an insight into the nature of the investigation conducted by the SIB. CW1.46, CW1.47 This document was issued to all SIB Investigators and SIB statement-takers working in Northern Ireland and established the protocol to which the SIB should adhere when tasked to investigate an internal security incident, it was this protocol to which the SIB were working on the 30 January 1972. Day 383/123/11 to Day 383/123/22

9.2.2.6 It is our submission that the procedures put in place demonstrate that the purpose of the statement-taking process was not to investigate allegations of criminality with a view to establishing the truth but rather to:

i) Suppress evidence of criminal conduct so as to protect both the individual soldier and the army.

ii) To counter allegations made by civilians against the Army by allowing the Army to respond quickly with their version of the incident.

9.2.2.7 As the aide-memoire attached to Warrant Officer Wood's 'Brief for Investigators engaged on Inquiries and Internal Security matters in Northern Ireland' makes clear, the SIB Inquiry in Northern Ireland was ". . . not a normal 'investigation' as such". CW1.48 paragraph G

> "The SIB actions could not be said to constitute a full and exhaustive investigation".

9.2.2.8 In fact an Inquiry by the SIB into shooting incidents was a far cry from the type of investigation which ought to have been conducted by the legally constituted police force, charged with investigating allegations of criminal conduct. It is clear from Warrant Officer Wood's brief that, as regards the function of the SIB:

> "Assessment of criminal responsibility is not your task in these inquiries." CW1.48

9.2.2.9 In fact the purpose for which this information was obtained was to get basic information up the military chain of command as quickly as possible in order that the military would be in a position to "answer immediately any allegations that may be raised by civilians." CW1.48, paragraph (a)

9.2.2.10 That the statement obtained by the SIB investigator was far from comprehensive is illustrated by the fact that the SIB investigator saw his function as obtaining a 'contact statement', designed to amplify the initial mandatory contact report which all soldiers would previously have made as a matter of routine army procedure. Day 383/124/22 to Day 383/125/2

9.2.2.11 As INQ 3 accepted the SIB investigator or statement taker was merely trying to "establish what happened" rather than trying to obtain an admission of criminal responsibility. Day 256/181/17 to Day 256/181/20

9.2.2.12 The key to understanding how the procedures put in place by the SIB were structurally incapable of delivering an effective investigation into allegations of the use of lethal force was the fact that the SIB investigation operated, within a policy framework whereby soldiers would be treated as witnesses rather than suspects. Thus although these statements were taken from persons who, in the normal course of events would be regarded as the prime suspect in a murder investigation, the people taking the statement did not approach their task from that perspective, and thus statements were taken without caution. Day 252/27/4 to Day 252/27/8, Day 383/158/19 to Day 383/158/21

9.2.2.13 Moreover it was "not the SIB investigator's job to challenge or cross-examine a soldier about his account but simply to take a note of what he was saying". Day 256/180/21 to Day 256/180/25

9.2.2.14 Thus soldiers were interviewed without caution or challenge and with the deliberate avoidance of the legal niceties of protections such as the Judges' Rules. Day 383/158/1

"Q. So a soldier knew that really so long as he did not make any incriminating admissions, his account would not be tested and he would be in the clear as far as a prosecution was concerned?

A. Possibly. That was up to him.

Q. there was certainly nothing to discourage a soldier from fabricating an account, was there?

A. No.

Q. In fact, you can see how this procedure would have positively encouraged soldiers to fabricate accounts where the soldier had something to hide?

A. It is possible.

Q. Because if the soldier hid the truth by a false account the SIB investigator would not look behind that?

A. He would if he had the time and he felt it was false. But if he had no time and he had no direct suspicion, then he would not follow it through." Day 256/181/24 to Day 256/182/16

9.2.2.15 That a person who has engaged in the use of lethal force against a person, who in many instances was demonstrably unarmed, is treated as a witness, results in a process which is irredeemably flawed from the outset. It cannot be considered, in that context, that there is a realistic prospect that such a person will be rendered accountable or amenable to the rule of law.

9.2.2.16 That the procedures were hopelessly inadequate as a method for investigating the criminal conduct of soldiers even in 1972 has been expressly recognised by the High Court in Belfast in Thompson v. Secretary of State. That case involved the shooting of an unarmed woman, Kathleen Thompson in the rear garden of her home, in the Creggan Derry, by a member of the Royal Green Jackets. Kerr J. concluded that the State

> "had not conducted an investigation sufficient to comply with the obligations under article 2 of the European Convention on Human Rights. In reaching that conclusion I do not rely on the contemporary standards . . . Judged by the standards that applied in 1971-1972 when the investigations into the death of the deceased were conducted, I am satisfied that such procedural safeguards as were required to ensure that article 2 was complied with were not fully implemented by the respondent in this case." [para. 1]

9.2.2.17 Kerr J. did not detail all of the deficiencies in the investigation conducted by the state save to point out that:

> "the soldier who effectively discharged the shot which caused the death of Mrs Thompson and those who were with him at the time were interviewed by a member of the Royal Military Police. I do not consider that this satisfied the duty imposed on the police at the time to properly investigate this fatal shooting. In my view it was not open to them to delegate that critical responsibility to another agency such as the Royal Military Police. Quite apart from that however, the fact that each of the interviews cannot have lasted any more than half an hour; the fact that clear discrepancies appear in the statements made, discrepancies which have not been the subject of further challenge or investigation, are sufficient to demonstrate the inadequacy of the investigation into the death of the deceased."

[para. 2]

9.2.2.18 The investigation conducted by the SIB into the death of Kathleen Thompson into the actions of soldiers in Derry in November 1971, was typical of investigations routinely carried out by the SIB in all lethal force incidents involving soldiers. This was a system in which the soldiers' account was never challenged, discrepancies were ignored and the investigation as such was non-existent. Ultimately as INQ 3 stated it was up to the soldier to determine whether he wished to make an incriminating statement, in the absence of a soldier volunteering there was no realistic prospect that his evidence would be tested. Day 256/181/23 to Day 256/182/6

9.2.2.19 However, if the inherent bias of the system was insufficient to prevent a soldier from making admissions of criminal conduct, the SIB system had in place further safeguards designed to prevent the soldier persisting with any such admission. CW1.48 paragraph g, C1835.5 paragraph 31

9.2.2.20 These safeguards were as follows:

i) An interview would be stopped if an admission of criminal conduct was volunteered. Day 256/183/6 to Day 256/183/20;

ii) It would be referred to an Officer for confirmation. CW1.48,CW1.49;

iii) It would be referred to the Army Legal Services. C1835.5 paragraph 31;

iv) A caution would then be administered reminding the soldier of his right not to say anything to incriminate himself. Day 256/184/12 to Day 256/184/20

9.2.2.21 In effect a four stage process designed to encourage soldiers, such as Soldier V, to withdraw any admissions they had made.

9.2.2.22 Finally, in relation to the structural deficiencies it is our submission that the system was designed to facilitate collusive activity on the part of soldiers, an issue which will be developed in our the sub-section entitled Military Culture of Closing Ranks below. Warrant Officer Wood described to this Tribunal a pre-interview "waiting room" for those they had "rounded up" who had been involved in shooting incidents. CW1.8 paragraph 50 Not only was no attempt made to prevent pre-interview collusion or discussion by those involved and in fact the conditions were created to encourage it.

9.2.2.23 In essence the nature of the agreement between the RMP and the RUC provided for an 'investigation' into shooting incidents for "...managerial, not criminal, purposes." C3.10 paragraph 12 Without cross-examination or caution it was a simple note taking exercise by the SIB – the task of each Investigative Officer "to record witness statements"[4] and the main purpose to provide information required for and on behalf of the military higher command. CW1.46 paragraph 2 Thus the army had in place a system which enabled it: on the one hand to counter allegations made by civilians promptly and effectively; while protecting the conduct of soldiers from meaningful scrutiny. Thus the SIB investigation achieved the object of the RUC/RMP agreement to "ensure that the conduct of soldiers could be protected from scrutiny" Day 256/186/14 to Day 256/186/20

9.2.2.24 Kitson stated in his oral evidence that he would hope that the army would provide the support for soldiers involved in shooting incidents. Day 237/85/4 to Day 237/85/7 The army certainly did, the agreement between the GOC and the Chief Constable removed them from the normal remit of the criminal justice system, rendering them unaccountable and above the law.

[4] INQ 2025 Day 252/27/12 to Day 252/27/13.

The Military Culture of 'Closing Ranks'

9.2.2.25 This undermining of the workings of the criminal justice system was aggravated by the openly sympathetic attitude exhibited by the SIB Investigative Officers towards the soldiers. Any prospect that this internal investigative procedure would fulfil the requirements of an independent investigation into lethal force incidents is undermined by the admission by a number of members of the SIB, including Major INQ 3, that the SIB officer's sympathy lay with the soldier. As his document records:

> "With both the RMP and the RUC sympathetic to the soldier, who after all was doing an incredibly difficult job, he [the soldier] was highly unlikely to make a statement incriminating himself..." C3.1 paragraph 5

9.2.2.26 There was a tendency amongst soldiers to: 'close ranks' if there was a risk that one of their number might face prosecution; Day256/164/24 to Day 256/165/3 and, to "look after it's own" in the face of opposition or criticism; C1835.5 paragraph 32 helping to create an environment which was conducive to the concealment of misconduct by soldiers.

9.2.2.27 As Warrant Officer 1835 describes it, a philosophy existed within the army that the army was "a family" and a family that "looks after it's own". C1835.5 paragraph 32 Thus even absent, the SIB officer's sympathy and the structural edifice designed to prevent admissions of criminal liability there existed a philosophy within the ranks which operated to discourage soldiers from incriminating other soldiers. As INQ1835 suggests:

> "Had a soldier made a comment to me such as the command structure had broke down that day, I would have put it in his statement. But frankly it is not likely that the soldier would say that outside the barrack room. The Army is a family and the family looks after it's own."

9.2.2.28 The relationship the SIB enjoyed with the soldiers whom they were to investigate, contributed to the ability of the army rank and file to conceal not only their own misconduct but that of their comrades and operated to discourage those who might otherwise have spoken out.

9.2.2.29 However, as the culture which operated within the army preventing soldiers from identifying criminal conduct from amongst their ranks, the whole atmosphere in the barrack and interview room created an environment conducive to the concealment of misconduct and to collusive activity.

9.2.2.30 Warrant Officer Wood describes a pre-interview "waiting room" for those they had "rounded up" who had been involved in shooting incidents. CW1.8 paragraph 50 Not only was no attempt made to prevent pre-interview collusion or discussion by those involved and in fact the conditions were created to encourage it.

9.2.2.31 As for the interviewing procedure itself, Warrant Officer Wood assured the Inquiry that the Soldiers were not "wary" of the SIB and in fact the SIB had a "...very good, open relationship with them". While other witnesses to this Inquiry, such as Corporal Brobson Day 275/149/1 to Day 275/149/2, have sought to suggest that the soldiers involved in shooting incidents were apprehensive when interviewed by the SIB, Warrant Officer Wood assured the Inquiry that he could not recall any apprehension felt on any shooting incident inquiry. CW1.64 paragraph 57

9.2.2.32 Warrant Officer Wood in fact describes the 'interview procedure' as being conducted in a "relaxed atmosphere." CW1.64 paragraph 57 With descriptions of "cigarettes and sometimes sandwiches" and the SIB working in "plain clothes" such a description does appear apt and in our submission this again operates to promote an atmosphere favourable to the suppression of adverse revelations.

9.2.2.33 It is our further submission, that on occasion the SIB played an active role in the concealment of misconduct. This was effect by:

i) The SIB 'filling the gaps' which existed within the statement/s of a soldier/s by providing the soldier with what he 'should' say to protect his own position and that of his colleagues;[5] and/or;

ii) The SIB sanitising the versions of events offered by soldiers to remove admissions of criminal liability and to enhance their credibility.

9.2.2.34 In his description of the interview procedure CW1.9 paragraph 58 Warrant Officer Wood discussed how an interviewer would "get down to business.." when taking statements:

> "The interviewer would write out the statement in longhand during the course of the interview and the interviewee would then sign it at the end of the interview. We would not write down what was said word for word as most of the interview was merely grunt; we would turn what we were told into what looked like a proof of evidence on the spot."

9.2.2.35 Warrant Officer Wood's description of the statement taking process tends to suggest that the job description of the interviewing SIB officer was more than the mere 'recording of statements'. However it is the evidence of Soldier 018, Soldier 005 and Soldier 037 among others which suggests that the RMP statement-taker held an even more pro-active role.

9.2.2.36 Soldier 018, a member of Anti-Tank Platoon, gave evidence in a statement made on the 4th February 1972 about firing by two other members of his Platoon, Lance Corporal F and Private G at a gunman located on the second floor of the Rossville Flats. B1491.009 In his statement to this Inquiry, Soldier 018 stated that he was not in a position to see whether there was a gunman in the flats where the shots were fired: "Nor could I see that they went through a window." B1491.005 paragraph 42 Soldier 018 has stated that the inclusion of such detail was at the instigation of the SIB:

[5] A more detailed investigation into these allegations is offered in Soldiers - 5.2.3 Bloody Sunday

"The RMP told me that he needed to include this to substantiate the details that had been provided by my colleagues to show that when they fired, they did not hit anybody." B1491.005 paragraph 42

9.2.2.37 He also suggests that the SIB led him to believe that the evidence he was providing falsely was actually true:

"At the time I made my statement, I was led to believe the details about the location of the gunman in the flats and the area to which fire was returned were true...I therefore agreed to include the details in my statement." B1491.005 paragraph 42

9.2.2.38 In his RMP statement Soldier 005 suggests that he witnessed Soldier R shoot a man who was positioned on the first floor veranda of Rossville flats (between block 1 and 2) and who had fired two shots with a pistol. B1370 However, in his statement to this Inquiry, Soldier 005 suggests that these details were included at the instigation of the SIB. Soldier 005 went on to suggest that the statement taking process described by Warrant Officer Wood; whereby the SIB would write out the statement long-hand and the Soldier would sign at the end of the interview, meant that he really had very little input into 'proof of evidence' at all:

"He told me to sign it and I did. I do not even remember reading it. When I saw it for the purposes of making this statement I did not recognise it at all." B1374.005 paragraph 34

9.2.2.39 In oral evidence to this Inquiry he again repeated the accusation that it was RMP that had provided the material details of the statement and that his role was merely to 'sign' the document without protest. Day 338/165/24 to Day 338/166/15

9.2.2.40 Warrant Officer Wood stated in evidence that he thought "every statement-taker was aware that he was there to record what happened, not to orchestrate what was reported as having happened." Day 383/142/6 to Day 383/142/8 He accepted in his oral testimony that the interview process was a two-stage process in that firstly the shooters were interviewed and then those soldiers who could provide supporting evidence were interviewed. Day 383/140/12 to Day 383/140/16 This process is certainly one which is capable of facilitating the type of exercise described by Soldier 005 and Soldier 018. Moreover as was conceded by Warrant Officer Wood, despite previously having claimed that he could not see the why orchestration would have occurred in relation to statements taken at short notice, Day 383/141/25 to Day 383/142/2 the statements of Soldier 018 and Soldier 005 were not in fact taken until the 4th February 1972. Day 383/172/5 to Day 383/172/17

9.2.2.41 There is also evidence that the role of the SIB statement-taker involved sanitising the version of events which had been offered by the soldiers in their statements.

9.2.2.42 Warrant Officer Wood gave evidence which demonstrated clearly how he had sanitised the statement offered to him in interview by Soldier T. In his statement to this Inquiry Warrant Officer Wood describes Soldier T had claimed that he had been burnt by battery acid and Wood's own scepticism of such claims CW1.10 paragraph 59 The RMP statement of Soldier T B725 included no reference to 'battery' acid and refers merely to acid. Day 383/176/10 to Day 383/176/13 Warrant Officer Wood accepted that the reason why such a claim was not to be found in the RMP statement of Soldier T was his scepticism:

> "That is why at that stage I did not put in there that it was battery acid." Day 383/177/2 to Day 383/177/3

9.2.2.43 What Warrant Officer Wood is describing, whether or not he was conscious of this at the time, is a process whereby the account of Soldier T was doctored in order to make the statement more credible.

9.2.3 Shooting with Impunity

9.2.3.1 The structural deficiencies and inherent bias, which operated to "ensure that the conduct of soldiers could be protected from scrutiny" Day 256/186/14 to Day 256/186/20 contributed, in our submission to a system whereby soldiers using lethal force operated outside the law and a culture in which soldiers believed that they could use lethal force with impunity. This culture informed the conduct of soldiers throughout Northern Ireland, but also operated as a relevant backdrop to the conduct of soldiers on Bloody Sunday. The soldiers of 1 Para operated as part of a military institution in circumstances where they knew their use of lethal force would not be subjected to scrutiny. There was thus a willingness to engage in the use of lethal force which would not have existed had soldiers been subjected to the normal rigours of the criminal justice system for their use of lethal force prior to Bloody Sunday.

9.2.3.2 The army's arrival in 1969 was characterised by the Government as the military acting in support of the civilian power. In our view as set out in this section and in Section 10, this characterisation was strikingly inaccurate. In fact January 1972 was a period during which the military had primacy over the control of security with the police reduced to the role of acting in tactical support on the ground.

9.2.3.3 Military primacy contributed directly to the use of lethal force as a method for controlling public order. The existence of the RUC/RMP agreement, meant that the use of lethal force by soldiers had been removed from the control of the criminal justice system and the use of lethal force was thus uninhibited by any system of accountability under domestic law.

9.2.3.4 Over the period 1969 – 1974, 188 people were killed in Northern Ireland by the use of lethal force by state agents. The figure 188 represents 53% of the total number of deaths resulting from the use of lethal force by state agents in Northern Ireland over the period 1969 and 1994. Of those 90%, 169 deaths were caused by the use of force by the regular military. 65% of those killed were indisputably unarmed at the time of death, while in only 12% of those deaths, 23 persons in all, was it confirmed that the deceased had been in possession of a weapon at the time of death.[6]

9.2.3.5 The rate at which lethal force was used by the military moreover dramatically increased following the introduction of Internment, which in effect copper-fastened military control over the security situation. In the period between the introduction of Internment until Bloody Sunday, 37 Catholic civilians and 2 Protestant civilians were killed by soldiers of the British army in disputed circumstances. Of those 8 were claimed as members of the IRA, although the circumstances of the shooting were disputed and 3 were killed in a robbery, they were unarmed. The widow of one of those killed in the robbery brought a case to the European Court of Human Rights which was settled by the UK Government.[7]

9.2.3.6 As regards the application of criminal sanction to the use of lethal force during the years of 1969 to 1974, information is limited. What is apparent is that only a tiny number of prosecutions concerning the exercise of force took place in comparison to the number of deaths arising from its systematic use. "This information raises highly problematic questions for the state in relation to the proportionality of the force exercised, and the lack of accountability for those deaths where there is no dispute that the deceased was unarmed."[8]

9.2.3.7 The lack of any effective investigation by the SIB arising out of the use of lethal force has already been noted. In the case involving the death of Kathleen Thompson, which was the subject-matter of Thompson v. Secretary of State, the interviews that were conducted by the RMP took place over a total of two hours between 3.30am – 5.30am, a total of half an hour per statement. Moreover, despite significant discrepancies between the statements made by the 4 soldiers who had been operating as a unit, who claimed to have been in close proximity at the time of the shooting, neither the prime suspect nor any of the other soldiers were ever re-interviewed in order to explore the discrepancies within their statements.

9.2.3.8 As submitted above the investigation into the death of Kathleen Thompson was typical of investigations into the exercise of lethal force in the militarist phase of 1969-1972.

9.2.3.9 A further example of the attitude to the use of lethal force, which in our submission permeated the British army operating in Northern Ireland in 1972 can be found in the transcript of Mr. Porter's tapes of radio transmissions on or about 28 January 1972. W12 – W13

9.2.3.10 The transmission, clearly contemplates the use of lethal force in circumstances which were a breach of domestic law and the Yellow card and is a classic demonstration of the military approach was one of maximal, rather than minimal force, without reference to domestic law standards, or even their own internal standards.

9.2.3.11 Thus in a context in which the use of lethal force by the military was on the increase, the system for investigating the use of lethal force by soldiers was in a very real sense non-existent. Soldiers had nothing to fear from the criminal justice system.

9.2.3.12 As OS3.11 and OS7.61 demonstrate, 2 PARA had been involved in the use of lethal force against 10 civilians around internment and 1 PARA had been involved in the death of John Laverty on the 10th August 1971. It is our contention that the system for the investigation of lethal force incidents was known by soldiers generally and could not have been unfamiliar to the soldiers of the Parachute Regiment who went to Derry on Bloody Sunday.

9.2.3.13 The soldiers who went to Derry and fired live rounds on Bloody Sunday, did so in the sure and certain knowledge that they would never face the sanction of the criminal justice system.

9.2.4 Conclusion

9.2.4.1 The agreement between the GOC and the Chief Constable of the RUC was illegal. It removed soldiers from the normal operation of the criminal justice system and involved the establishment of an alternative structure operated and controlled by the military.

9.2.4.2 The control of the military meant that from the outset the soldier was operating in an environment designed to assist him in protecting himself from the threat of criminal sanction. Individual officers within the SIB were sympathetic to the soldiers 'predicament'. More importantly however structures were put in place that operated not merely to prevent the comprehensive investigation of alleged wrongdoing by individual soldiers but to suppress any such evidence.

9.2.4.3 The existence of this policy at a time of heightened militarisation and ever-increasing use of lethal force by soldiers leads to the conclusion that, the purpose of the agreement was not merely to create an environment conducive to the concealment of misconduct, but to create a procedure whereby the Army could control the presentation of information about shooting incidents. The fact that members of the SIB took the statements enabled them to 'fill in the gaps' in statements which did not provide the necessary information required to validate the actions of the soldier or his colleagues and to edit and therefore sanitise accounts to ensure a version free from criminal liability. The agreement provided the Army with a mechanism whereby it could protect individual soldiers and the reputation of military as a whole. Neither the agreement nor the statement-taking process which flowed from it were designed to determine the legality of the actions of individual soldiers, rather it was to remove from public scrutiny any assessment of that legality that the agreement existed.

9.2.4.4 The actions of the Chief Constable in delegating to the RMP the interviewing of military personnel in lethal force incidents was not only a breach of the obligation of the police under domestic law to investigate such incidents. The RUC/RMP Agreement contributed positively to the notion held by the rank and file that their actions, however arbitrary and however deadly, were without consequence or criticism. The Agreement contributed significantly to a culture within which soldiers could shoot, and kill, with impunity.

9.3 General Lawlessness of the Soldiers

9.3.1 Introduction

9.3.1.1 We will set out the erosion of the role of the police in security matters and the illegal transfer of control over policing the security situation, from the police to the military in section 10. Section 9.2 has dealt with implications of the 1972 RMP / RUC Agreement

9.3.1.2 In section 19.9 which refers to sector 2, the lawlessness and brutality of the soldiers on Bloody Sunday has been outlined specifically in relation to the activities in that area. Further sections 9.4; 9.5; 9.6 and 9.7 deal in detail with the evidence respectively in relation to Modification of Rubber Bullets; Private Supplies of Ammunition; Breaches of the Yellow Card and Reputation of the Parachute Regiment.

9.3.1.3 However there remains a great store of information in relation to the general lawlessness and brutality of the British Army Regiments that served tours of duty in Northern Ireland and specifically the Parachute Regiment whose actions resulted in the atrocity that is Bloody Sunday.

9.3.1.4 The brutality exhibited on Bloody Sunday was not a one-off aberration on the reputation of an exemplary military regiment. Rather it was representative of the culture of brutality and lawlessness that existed within the British Army generally and the parachute regiment specifically. Indeed the authentic and reliable evidence of the individual soldiers who gave statements to the PRAXIS team, provides a unique opportunity to understand the depths of depravity that the soldiers of the parachute regiment would sink to in carrying out their duties.

9.3.1.5 Examples of criminal conduct include:

Shooting civilians with impunity; (Section 9.2.2)

The modification of rubber bullets to transform a weapon for crowd control into a lethal weapon; (Section 9.4)

Private supplies of ammunition by soldiers which would be used to cover up unlawful shootings; (Section 9.5)

Breaches of the Yellow Card; (Section 9.7)

9.3.1.6 Further examples of the brutality and criminal activity of the Parachute Regiment include:

- The treatment of soldiers during training and the conditioning to aggressive behaviour, which resulted in alleged frustration engendered brutality and callous and sadistic behaviour;
- Unlawful assaults;
- Robberies;
- Planting of evidence to secure internment of civilians;
- Racism.

These are dealt with below.

9.3.1.7 Whilst the PRAXIS material does refer to specifically identified soldiers, it is important to note that not all of the soldiers interviewed have been identified, nor have all of the soldiers referred to in those interviews have been identified. Indeed the disclosure of the activities of the Parachute Regiment proved so difficult for some soldiers that they went to some lengths and to some risk to themselves to deny that they had provided the interviews. A case in point is soldier 019. Excerpts from the cross-examination of the witness on Day 343 below refer:

MR MACDONALD: 019, I am suggesting to you that you know perfectly well that you gave these interviews with Neil Davies and other members of the Praxis team, that is Goddard and Stark, and that you are lying to this Tribunal when you say that you did not; do you understand?

A. I understand what you are saying, but, no, I did not give that statement at all.

Q. Do you understand I am accusing you of committing perjury?

A. I understand what you are saying.

Q. Do you understand the importance of giving evidence truthfully under oath?

A. I do.

Q. And you are saying that you are giving your evidence truthfully?

A. I am.

Q. What I want to demonstrate to you and invite your comment on is the material which makes it clear that you were the person who gave these interviews; do you understand?

A. I understand what you are saying.

Q. I will do it in a summary fashion: you were the only person who fits the profile that emerges from these interviews; do you understand?

A. I understand what you are saying.

Q. I was going to go through those other individuals in your Pig individually to demonstrate that, but perhaps -- unless there is any objection to it -- you can take it from me that no-one else fits that profile?

A. I never gave that statement. Day 343/130/13 to Day 343/131/18

Q. If the Tribunal were to find that in fact you are the person who gave this interview and the other interviews that I am coming to, you could not argue with that, could you?

A. I never gave that interview; I never gave that statement.

Q. Could you see that there is a fairly overwhelming case that you did give these interviews?

A. I never gave the interview.

Q. Could you answer the question: are you prepared -- I know you deny that this was you -- but do you even recognise or acknowledge that there is an overwhelming body of evidence to suggest this was you?

A. No, I do not recognise it; I never gave the interview.

A. I do not remember Mr Goddard.

Q. Did you not give him or require him to keep the confidence that you had been the person giving him an interview?

A. I am not with you.

Q. You required him to give you an obligation of confidentiality to promise you that he would not disclose your name?

A. Who are we talking about now?

Q. Mr Goddard.

A. I do not know Mr Goddard. Day 343/140/14 to Day 343/141/16

MR MACDONALD: Why do you think you were telling your own counsel one thing and this Tribunal another?

A. Can you elaborate on that?

Q. As has been demonstrated by Mr Rawat, you were apparently telling your counsel on a previous occasion in the past that you may very well have been the source, you believe you were the source for at least part of the material that appears on the page that you are just denying being a source for, and you are telling this Tribunal none of that material came from you.

A. I am telling this Tribunal that I never made that statement.

Q. That is why I was asking you earlier on whether you were trying to engage in a play in words in some way. You have indicated to the Tribunal that none of this material emanated from you directly or indirectly?

A. As far as I can remember none of this related to anything I said to Neil Davies.

Q. Have you some difficulty with the words that I am using and are you trying to put a different slant on what I am suggesting to you?

A. Can you explain it a bit better?

Q. It is very, very simple, do not be worried about the particular words I am using, I would like you to put it in your own words. As I understand it what you have said to the Tribunal today, on oath, is that you are not responsible, not the source of anything that appears in this page that we showed you, directly or indirectly?

A. I can only keep saying to you: I did not make that statement to Neil Davies. Day 343/146/2 to Day 343/147/6

MR MACDONALD: Thank you, Soldier 019, I have no further questions for you. Sir, I formally request this Tribunal to consider referring this matter to the DPP with a view to prosecuting this witness for perjury in the light of the evidence he has given today. Day 343/176/19 to Day 343/176/24

9.3.2 Aggressive behaviour

9.3.2.1 The treatment of soldiers during training and the conditioning to aggressive behaviour which resulted in alleged frustration engendered brutality and callous and sadistic behaviour.

There are numerous exchanges in the interviews about the need for aggression which formed an essential element of the training of the Parachute Regiment.

Q So what's different about the paras' psychological approach in the Ireland to the other regiments. You can talk about them being more aggressive or going in harder.

A. "Yeah, you have to be aggressive. It's about being a para, isn't it, its aggression.

You know, sensible aggression, er, controlled aggression is worth anything. " O19.29

9.3.2.2 However exercising control over their aggressive conduct does not, in reality, appear to have been a feature of the Paras conduct of policing operations In Northern Ireland. Even amongst themselves the members of the Parachute Regiment had problems with controlling aggression.

"Go to the Regt. And you meet some of the rottenest people in the world, y'know right evil bastards and they're really evil y'know and a in every sense of the word, I mean if you got into a fight with them they wouldn't think nothing – mean you think people sticking an ashtray in your – you know – something like that, I mean I've the blokes come in at night and with your para helmet you wore tin ones, not the plastic ones, your tine one, blokes 'd – he upset him and he's just come in and he 's tapped him on the shoulder and he's sat up and he's had this helmet from back there in his face, you can always tell when somebody's squad (?) in the airbourne 'cos you hit it with the airbourne helmet and the airbourne ... you can always tell somebody's got hit 'cos he have a lovely long bruise like that y'know.

"And no nose"

"A laugh they'd put a newspapers under his bed and set fire to them and all on top of these newspapers and they sit there and time to see how long it took them to wake up. You know, the bloke's bed on fire like. You know, you always have blokes like that; you have O20.73

other ones who work as hard as the others, they were more frightened of him and the good ones, a bloke called

"He would come home one night and you'd find that he gone down the rockery squirting petrol in through your – through the air vents and put a match in. He had no civvies, he had no uniform, he had nowt, he'd burnt the lot. Or you'd be asleep with gob open and he'd have a pair of pliers and a hexamine ri' and as you went like that he'd drop the lighted hexamine in your mouth; or he'd come in with a boiling kettle and pour it over your bollocks. They wouldn't think twice about doing it at all, they wouldn't think twice about it, so men has to look to their own. You think it was like for" O20.74

Pranks amongst the parachute regiment were of such an uncontrolled aggressive nature that they can be more properly considered sadistic.

9.3.2.3 However the paras themselves recognised the dilemma posed by the inappropriate role given to them by their political masters.

"at the same time I was never short of being aggressive if I needed to, you know

"you can't put the soldier as a policeman, no way they do a policeman's role"
"Two different things, you know". O20.104

It was the aggressiveness of the para that rendered him an inappropriate policeman, particularly when this aggressiveness could not be controlled.

"If you want 100 men to clear 2,000 off the street, they've gotta be tough and aggressive, and they've gotta be motivated"

"I would have said yes when you get into close quarters with a man, yeh probably is an over reaction. Instead of hitting him once he hits him twice, yeh that's a possibility". O22.14

"But the soldiers are trained to use the maximum force necessary to do a job as quickly and as ruthlessly as possible" O22.15

"Maximum violence in minimum time. React. "

"Dominate, sort out, people then behave themselves, unpredictable, kick shit out of em. Dominated any fucking place. Like Aden, do that, keep press out, what the army wants. Northern Ireland sort out. Politicians shit themselves. " O28.1

"Well you wouldn't last in the Para or Green Jackets if you weren't basically aggressive". 037.12

"The aggress.... The aggression from your training comes out and makes you the winner of that sort of situation. That's what you've got to do ain't it, you've got to win. Whatever the situations is at the lowest level or the highest level of aggressions, you've got to win it. " O35.36

"Whether there is a tendency to over react in a situation like that because you're so pent up because of you training?

In any situation you'll always get a single, or a couple of people no matter what walk of life to them, that'll over react to anything. It's up to whoever's in charge of 'em to spot that and keep it in check." O35-41

9.3.2.4 The use of minimum force and the approach dictated by the Yellow Card was at complete odds with the training provided to paras. In a conflict situation they reverted to what had been ingrained in them through training. There was no dampening of their aggressiveness and no curbing of their violent tendencies. Indeed if - If their inability to carry out the role and function of a police officer was evident to the individual soldiers it must surely have been evident to their NCOs, their platoon leaders and higher ranking officers.

"To actually see a bloke drop when you fire. It could be uplifting in some cases. It's so easy, You know,... about you know why you... shoots a bloke and you – his first guy as his shot and he's full of remorse. No, nothing of the sort. You are over the moon. Think bloody hell that was easy and look for another one". O33.8

A blood lust, gratification in the death of another highlighted how far removed the paras would become from normal feelings of remorse and revulsion at causing the death of another person.

"Quartermaster. Search house. Next night go in to where we dumped stuff off night before. Arrest. Even say he got gun out, yellow card, problem over. Trust each other, survive" O28.2

"I didn't get a chance to blow any IRA away. I'm fucking disgusted with that." O37.158

"I was fucking disgusted, because we were ready to go in, we would have enjoyed ourselves. O37.161

The justification for the callous behaviour of the paras was explained by one soldier

Q.
"So do you think it's difficult for the paras to operate in conditions like Northern Ireland because they've got to operate like other regiments? "

A.

"It's not difficult, its frustrating. You know, " O19.36

So frustration resulted from the constraints that were placed upon these aggressive soldiers and this was the reason for their behaviour. An inability to carry out their policing activities in the manner in which they had been trained to act. Their aggression however could not be contained whenever they were brought into action.

9.3.3 Unlawful assaults

9.3.3.1 The approach of the paras to opportunities for carrying out assaults is highlighted in the statements made to the PRAXIS Interviewers. Any opportunity to use disproportionate physical force was relished.

"An Irish drunk is going to give you stick. You know.... So when he argued back – get a bank on the head, whack in the legs.

Had to be seen to be hard men." O18.1

"We didn't, we fought the paddies of our ground; we'd bring them up to where we wanted them to go, right, but what they didn't realise that every time we were going backwards and pushing them forwards, beat the shit outta them and come back into a – the battle battalion, then we play with them again..."

"Y'know clear 'em, and the you'd go and didn't arrest nobody, you just belted them, his them, killed the – y'know, cut heads open with a stick or whatever, rifle-butted them.. If one bloke was on his knees (?) where he'd been O20.44

"They loved it, they enjoyed it. They enjoyed doing what they done and they wouldn't think no qualms of smacking somebody across the head with a rifle butt for no reason whatsoever. But I mean that's not just the Para reg. You get individual people in all regiments. We just had our fair share of them" O31.30

"But I think we had more than most". O31.31

9.3.4 Robberies

9.3.4.1 The lengths to which the paras were uncontrolled went so far as organised criminal activity.

"um – A Coy., were in Fort Walsh and some – they went... they knocked off a shop, knocked off the old wog and nicked his all his money etc., went back to Fort Walsh, buried the money in Fort Walsh, it was common amongst the battalion who'd done it, because you could name the corporals, the blokes, everything that who'd done it, y'know"
"They turned up with the money at the end of the tour of duty and took it home?
"Nobody was going to tell on them – O20.66

"I mean I was on patrol one day, I won't mention his name, I know who is was, and used to have what's callec the doss-out wire which was plenty of barbed wire and after curfew it anybody went near that wire you could shoot him, didn't have to shout a challenge your could just shoot him and we were in the kutchy huts and there's this sort of

"..y'know and next morning he was found over the top of the wire, dead, y'know no money, all gone, I knew who'd done it, it was common fact everybody knew who'd done it –

But nobody every let on

I mean there was a bus in Aden there was a but shot up" O20.67

"If you found a dump....you keep some hand some in. Simple init. Never hand in the cash, that's well earned drinking money". O29.1

"He had fourteen years, he hasn't been bloody caught. He's been a thief for fourteen bloody years. A petty thief. ..... a few quid here a few quid there. He hasn't been caught for fourteen years so when they say he exemplary .... for fourteen years, bloody rubbish." O34.21

"him and this INQ 1456 – were picked up for robbing a supermarket in Southern Ireland. Now then, they were just robbers, basically, so they both claimed they were getting money for the IRA, collecting funds, so they got away with it". O34.24

9.3.5 Planting of Evidence

9.3.5.1 Planting of evidence to secure internment of civilians was common practice amongst members of the regiment and also soldiers generally.

"One nice dark night he's coming back from the pub, you fire 2 or 3 shots from the pistol shoot him, put the pistol in his hands. As far as anybody's concerned he fired at you, you returned fire and shot him and he's dead, he's out of the way".

"Yes. And no on one occasion. It happened on numerous occasions. It was a method of getting rid of him". O20.11

"So what we did one days is we got him arrested – arrested him and he was paying to various houses, depending on the amount of children, 20 pound or 30 pound a week, so we doctored the book y'see and changed – no, knocked money off, ri, so the next time we were in that area y'know, we would say, 'Get your 20 pound this week?' She says 'What're you talking about?' 'You got 20 pound of your cashier'

"So they executed him – shot him for us"

"When you found a cache of arms, ri' you would always take some of the arms from there, you know where there'd be 45 rounds or 7162 or whatever, y'know 303 rounds – never 7162, you know that's the – " O20.33

"Yeah then a few weeks later another patrol would go in, they would search the house, find the ammunition and turned him(?) over, got him but away. That's what – that's what you used to do"

"So there was no playing by the rules?"

"Oh no, I mean, there's not, I mean the only rule is survival" O20.34

"as I say, you could hide stuff in the house – 2 weeks later somebody else would find it and you've got 'em, its enough to get them interned, get them away, y'know".O20.96

"It was common init. Hit his place. Search. Go back the next night. Straight back to where we dumped the stuff. 303 stuff. Make out it was from information passed on" O29.1

"Planting ammunition, evidence, even smearing for forensics was done" O32.1

"....that weapon's been dropped off, you can leave it another week. Then you pick the weapon up and you've already given orders where do they drop it off at". O34.26

9.3.6 Racism

9.3.6.1 "If you weren't white you never got a chance to put your suitcases down, ri' before you were out, you're with a return ticket, gone"

"Racist"

"Yeah. And it was one race, just white, if you were Chinese, black or whatever, if you were not white, English, Scots or Welsh, you did not get in" O20.38

"Aye it got suckered in somewhere along the line. And Inq 716 being a right wing fascist and there's no doubt about that and everybody knows that"

"Right, so Inq 716 was a right wing fascist bastard as they say? "

9.3.7 Conclusion

9.3.7.1 The Praxis interviews provide an invaluable insight into the thinking of soldiers in the Parachute Regiment and their conduct in Northern Ireland. The interviews, conducted as they were by a former Para, provide an undeniably authentic and reliable account of the kind of lawless and brutally callous -not to say sadistic- culture which operated within the Paras. It was a culture which: exalted aggression and the use of maximal force; and in which contempt for the rule of law was a prominent feature.

9.3.7.1 That this culture informed the soldiers who went to Derry on Bloody Sunday is evident not merely by their unjustified use of lethal force, but by the almost routine nature of the assaults and vile verbal abuse, visited on detainees.

Examination of Soldier 229's statement of the treatment of detainees at Fort George and the statements of particular witnesses themselves including Lynn, McLaughlin and McGinley highlights these points.

9.3.7.2 Paragraph 44 sets out that he attended Fort George with Lance Corporal F who he describes as "not a friend of mine but an acquaintance.[9]" Father O'Keefe describes the pair as follows:

> "I do recall that the RMP told Lance Corporal F and the paratrooper with blond hair who I remember clearly as even having the sadistic edge on Lance Corporal F that they should not hit people in custody...
> (34) I do not think however that they (other soldiers) were as sadistic or as casually brutal as the paratrooper with blonde hair or Lance Corporal F. I recall that the Derry boys were talking back as well." (H21.94)

In paragraphs 48-50 (B2211.007) Soldier 229 details how he waited with his three prisoners in Fort George. He claims that the soldiers would not resort to violence even if provoked. He denies seeing any prisoner being punched, kicked or spat on nor was he involved in any such behaviour.

9.3.7.3 In relation to Dennis McLaughlin 229 says in his RMP statement:

> "I was the last person, so I stood at the back with my three prisoners. The prisoners and their escort were photographed together and statements taken from the prisoners. The only form of heating which I saw was an electric wall fire. The processing did take time and McLaughlin after standing for something like 1 ¼ hours fainted and fell to the floor (my emphasis). It was at this time that a WO II of the Coldstream Guards suggested that I obtain a chair for McLaughlin. I did not obtain a chair because I was not convinced that it was a genuine faint... I believe that McLaughlin was trying to attract attention. However I did pick him up, and held him until such time as he was able to stand on his own feet. The whole incident was over in approximately two minutes. It was approximately half an hour later that I was photographed with my prisoners and I was present when they were interviewed by RUC. One of the things asked of them is if they have any complaints about the way they had been treated... McLaughlin made no complaint about his ill treatment at Fort George." (B2211.015, B2211.016)

Joseph Lynn, Patrick McGinley and Terence O'Keefe all witnessed this incident. It would appear from the evidence of these witnesses that the heaters were being used to torture the prisoners. Father O'Keefe wrote to the GOC Harry Tuzo in the following terms:

"(2) More serious examples of physical assault took place. One youth (aged 16 or 17) was struck in the groin and lower abdomen so savagely that he collapsed. On being kicked and hauled to his feet, he was unable to stand upright and fell backwards, striking his head on the concrete floor. He was kicked to his feet again and placed against the wall in order to keep him upright.

(3) There were also cases of deliberate torture. Two youths were forced to hold their heads back in an unnaturally strained position in order to bring their faces as close as possible to the electric heaters[10], which were on stands and about 6'6" above floor level. They were forced to do this for about ¾ of an hour and were struck if they shifted position. The smaller youth was forced to stand on the taller youths feet to raise his face nearer the heater. When one youth was asked if he wanted a drink, he answered that he did and was told to open his mouth. A paratrooper then spat into his mouth.[11]"

[10] Other witnesses describe there being gas heaters. See the evidence of Patrick McGinley: "One by one they brought us to stand with our faces within inches of the mobile gas heaters which had been brought into the big shed to heat us. The gas heaters were on poles and therefore the flames were at head level. We were made to stand with our faces against the heat until we could stand the gas flames no more. If we ducked down they would kick us and hit us with wooden batons and tip our faces towards the gas flame and make us stand on tiptoe with our face to the flame." AM241.7paragraph 34.

[11] H21.75

O'Keefe also said that the Paras were involved in systematic assaults and acts of provocation with the prisoners which continued for a period of one-one and a half hours[12].

9.4 Modification of Rubber Bullets

Summary of submissions

9.4.1 There is a substantial body of evidence before the Inquiry that it was a regular and widespread practice that rubber bullets fired from baton guns were modified by soldiers. The purpose was to inflict serious injury on those whom they struck. It is submitted that this evidence is especially significant given the receipt of the evidence of Dr. Sheperd and Mr. O'Callaghan and the wounding of Patrick McDaid that is dealt with at Section 19.9 below. In addition there is extensive evidence of the misuse of rubber bullets contrary to acknowledged rules and practice for their use. The rubber bullet as a weapon in itself could be a weapon capable of inflicting serious injury and was potentially lethal.[13] When modifications were made they can only have been so made to increase the potential of this weapon to inflict maximum injury to the person. The modification and misuse of Rubber Bullets was so widespread that it is utterly implausible that senior Officers did not have knowledge of such practices.

9.4.2 A large number of soldiers from different regiments including 1 Para provided evidence as to the practice of modification and the methods employed in the modification of rubber bullets.

9.4.3 The insertion of objects into the rubber bullet with the clear intention of inflicting injury on the person struck was one type of modification. INQ 666 a Driver in B Company RGJ stated at C666.2 at paragraph 7 that:

> "It was ... not uncommon for rubber bullets to be doctored. For example the top of a rubber bullet could be removed and razor blades could be inserted, which would cut whoever was hit."

[13] Three civilians are known to have died in Northern Ireland as a result of being struck by rubber bullets. OS1.842 to OS1.845

9.4.4 INQ 622, a Sergeant in the Intelligence Section, HQ Company, 1 Battalion, Coldstream Guards stated at C622. 6 paragraph 44 that:

> "...unofficially baton rounds were regularly fiddled with. It was possible to take the head of a baton round and put about three pennies in and then put the head back on. The pennies would spread out as it was fired and could make a nasty mess..."[14]

9.4.5 In addition INQ 1937, a Private in D Company 1 Para, stated at C1937.3 paragraph 19:

> "It was not practice to modify 7.62 mm rounds although rubber bullets were modified by putting coins in to pack the rounds or double charging them".[15]

9.4.6 INQ 954, a Rifleman 2 Platoon A Company 2 RGJ stated at C954.2 paragraph 15: "I was never aware of soldiers carrying dumdum bullets nor was I aware of anyone carrying any private weapons. However people did alter rubber bullets. The chamber cases of rubber bullets were sometimes filled with all sorts, such as glass and nails. The ends were then sealed up with a piece of sellotape. It was genuinely felt to be fair game to do this because of the situation in which we were operating. There was a great deal of frustration with the situation in Northern Ireland. Hour after hour we were getting stick from people and no one was ever given the authority to sort the situation out. We took a lot more stick than we should have had to".

[14] Warrant Officer John Wood stated at CW1.8 paragraph 48 that he came across the practice of doctoring rubber bullets. It was possible to doctor a rubber bullet in such a way as to enable it to be fired right through a sheep. The doctoring of rubber bullets was also a court martialling offence at the time."

[15] In the Praxis material Soldier X talked of batteries in the "greeners" or nails down the rubber. O37.2 Also O37.68 to 037.70. See also O25.19, O31.46, O32.1, O37.35.2.

9.4.7 There is also significant evidence before the Inquiry regarding the practice of using additional charges to fire the rubber bullets with greater velocity and to give them greater weight. INQ 1227 a Private in 2nd platoon A company 1st Royal Anglian Regiment stated at C1227.2 paragraph 12:

> "I do not think any soldiers modified live rounds but they would modify rubber bullets by adding extra charges to them".

9.4.8 Again, INQ 1282, a Private in 2nd Royal Green Jackets stated at C1282.1 paragraph 7 that:

> "...we did sometimes customise rubber bullets, however because they were pretty useless otherwise. We would put double charges into them by cutting off the ends and putting an extra charge in to make them go faster and harder...".

9.4.9 Soldier 107, a Lance Corporal of A Company 2 RGJ stated at B1716.004 paragraph 31:

> "I do not know of anyone modifying or altering live rounds but I knew people used to alter rubber bullets e.g. by adding extra charges or putting metal into the tips".

9.4.10 INQ 875, a Guardsman in 2 company Coldstream Guards, stated at C875.4 paragraph 18:

> "It is possible to adapt both rubber bullets and 7.62 SLR rounds. With rubber bullets you could saw off the edges to make them hit harder, file them to make them more pointed, take the bottom out and insert another charge to make them travel faster or take the bottom out and add a coin to give them more weight."

9.4.11 INQ 1764 Lance Bombardier in 22nd LAD stated at C1764.4 paragraph 18:

> "I have been asked about the modification of ammunition. I have heard plenty of stories of soldiers modifying rubber bullets. Rubber bullets took different charges, the weakest being an 18 charge which was so slow a rioter could catch it in his hand. Because of this we would cut off the end of the rubber bullet and put in an 80 or 90 charge. We felt justified in increasing the rubber bullet charges because otherwise rioters would laugh at us because they knew the rubber bullets were utterly useless..."

9.4.12 INQ 471, a Private in C Company 1 Para stated at C471.2 paragraph 5: "I never modified rubber bullets but I knew that happened quite often. A rubber bullet case is about 6 inches long and you could cut it down by half and put a U2 battery in the bottom to make it go faster and hit harder".[16]

9.4.13 Soldier 160, a Rifleman in A Company 2 RGJ stated at B1956.001 paragraph 7:

> "Riots were generally boring and both the soldiers and the rioters used to try and liven them up by playing tricks on one another. For our part we used to doctor rubber bullets. Rubber bullets were not very effective they only used to shoot 30 to 40 metres and we were supposed to bounce the shots off the ground. We used to remove the bullet from its casing and then insert broken glass inside the casing before putting the rubber bullet back in. This was not effective and the glass often fell out before the bullet hit the target. It did our egos a lot of good though".

[16] INQ 1351 who was a guardsman in 1 CSG stated he "saw" modified rubber bullets. INQ 1828 of the RMP at C1828.4 paragraph 27 stated that he "...knew of rubber bullets being doctored" and "one particular regiment in which the practice was particularly prevalent"

9.4.14 In answer to the Chairman of the Inquiry at Day 350/117/8 to Day 350/117/15, the witness explained that the glass was put into the shell casing and would come out behind the rubber bullet when fired. He denied actually inserting glass into the bullets. It is to be noted that at paragraph 7 of his witness statement quoted above the method employed was described as "not effective" in that "the glass often fell out before the bullet hit its target". It is submitted that it is an irresistible inference that this tampering could only have been to cause maximum injury to anyone hit by a rubber bullet and it was the failure to achieve this which made this particular form of tampering "ineffective".

9.4.15 The witness confirmed at Day 350/118/3 to Day 350/118/12 that he had witnessed a few of his own personal colleagues and friends doing it. "I am quite sure a lot of them did". The witness went on to state that they did it about the same number of times as himself that he had put at once or twice and if they did it more often it was without his knowledge. The witness confirmed that if he had had enough time on Bloody Sunday he would more than likely have doctored rubber bullets to fire.

9.4.16 At Day 350/124/17 to Day 350/124/18 the witness whilst denying tampering on the day confirmed that he was shooting rubber bullets wildly. When asked why he replied at Day 350/125/3 to Day 350/125/5:

> "Um, possibly boredom again, you know, the cowboy element comes into things at certain times, you know, when you are under stress like that."

He followed this with a denial of firing directly at bodies "because they would fall short". Day 350/125/6 to Day 350/125/13. It is submitted that this is a somewhat puzzling rationale since it hard to see why firing in front of a person to hit the ground first was more likely to make the rubber bullet hit the target.

9.4.17 It thus appears that across regiments who were based in Derry on 30th January 1972 there was widespread interference with riot control weapons to modify them with a clear intention of maximising their potential to cause injury when fired. It is submitted that it is inconceivable that Officers did not know about such practices that appear to have been known to members and engaged in by members of most of the regiments present in Derry on 30 January 1972.[17]

9.4.18 No baton gunner on duty with the Parachute Regiment on Bloody Sunday has admitted such practices. Soldier 019 was not aware of it. Soldier 112 who had used a baton gun for most of his time in the army including the three years before Bloody Sunday claimed never to have heard of a baton round being modified. The balance of the evidence suggests this to be a most unusual state of ignorance given the widespread evidence of knowledge of the practice.

9.4.19 The Inquiry also has clear evidence not only describing the background to such modification but also of regular breach of the understood rules for using rubber bullets which were to fire at the ground and not directly at the person.

9.4.20 INQ 622 quoted above goes on to describe the background to modification. At C666.2 paragraph 45 he stated the following:

> "The problem with rubber bullets was that they did not work. We were told to fire them at the floor so that they would bounce off the floor and knock the wind out of a rioter. It did not work, as people would move, so we tried to achieve an edge. We worked on the theory that if a person was trying to kill you he would not worry about hurting you, so why should we worry about putting a penny in a rubber bullet. We always fired rubber bullets straight at people, [17] There is some photographic and civilian evidence of doctored rubber bullets being seen on Bloody Sunday. AG34. 1 Statement of Danny Gillespie. Ciaran Donnelly of the Irish Times EP27.14 and M22.1.

rather than bounce them off the ground whether we were told to or not."

9.4.21 INQ 875, quoted above, went on to comment on his understanding of the requirements at C875.4 paragraph 18:

"We were supposed to fire rubber bullets to the ground so that they would bounce up and hit the target but we always used them to fire them directly at the target". [18]

9.4.22 INQ 2099 Lance Corporal Anti-Tank Platoon 3rd Royal Regiment of Fusiliers stated at C2099.2 paragraph 10:

"I was more familiar with the modification of rubber bullets than live bullets. This could happen in a number of ways including putting an additional disc charge at the bottom of the bullet so it came out with more force than speed. Alternatively things such as batteries or coins could be added to add weight. I am aware of one chap being killed by a battery which flew out of a rubber bullet when fired so I don't know how often that practice occurred. The frustrating thing with firing rubber bullets was that we were meant to aim at the floor so that they bounced up to hit the person targeted. We were not supposed to aim directly at the person. Aiming at the floor was completely useless as a deterrent so most soldiers simply aimed the rubber bullet directly at the person they had targeted..."

9.4.23 Inquiry document OS1.839, OS1.840 dated 2 March 1973 sets out the rules for engagement for the use of the Rubber Baton Round. Given the evidence of individual soldiers of the requirements in these documents it is unlikely the rules or requirements differ much from any in force on 30 January 1972. They were as follows:

[18] Lance Corporal 010 described baton guns as "lovely at knocking people over." B1395.003

1. "The round is best fired from the standing position in volleys of 6-12 shots.

2. The round must not be fired at a range of less than 20 metres except when the safety of soldiers or others is seriously threatened.

3. The round must whenever possible be fired at the ground in front of the crowd which has to be dispersed. The round may be fired directly only when the safety of the soldiers or others is threatened by the crowd. And when direct fire is impossible or has proved ineffective. When the round is fired directly it should always be aimed at the lower part of a person's body, and never at the head or neck.

4. Whenever possible the baton round should be fired in conjunction with the deployment of arrest squads in order to pick up members of the crowd struck by the round."

9.4.24 A document attached at OS1.839.40 outlines a warning to be given before the use of baton rounds in the following terms:

> "Unless you disperse immediately we shall use special weapons which may cause injuries."

9.4.25 It repeated the requirement that they were to be fired in volleys of 6 or more, they were to strike the ground first and "direct fire" to prevent injury to troops.

9.4.26 These requirements clearly emphasised the fact that this weapon was for use as a riot control device in a crowd situation. It is clear on the evidence examined at 19.9 of these submissions that this situation did not exist on Bloody Sunday on the waste ground on Rossville Street, in the car park of the flats or in block 1 itself when there is clear evidence of extensive misuse of rubber bullets. The crowd was fleeing away from the paratroopers as they debussed. The video evidence[19] shows the smoke from baton rounds being fired either from the moving pigs or as the soldiers debussed. These weapons were fired at single targets not targets as part of a crowd. They were fired in all likelihood at a range of less than 20 metres certainly on the waste ground and they must have been fired at head height given the evidence of Rosemary Doyle.[20] The idea of the warning set out above being used on the day on the waste ground is of course ludicrous. The soldiers who admitted carrying rubber bullet guns on the day gave conflicting testimony about the rules they operated under but it is clear that they were aware of the requirement to fire at the ground first.

9.4.27 Soldier 013 at B1408.003 paragraphs 15 to 16 claimed he was given the job of firing baton rounds to keep the rioters away. However in fact he admitted to:

a. Firing a rubber bullet inside the northern end of block1 of the Rossville Flats up the stairs at a boy he was chasing. It is hard to conceive a more blatant misuse of a weapon issued for riot control purposes.

b. Firing a number of baton rounds at the windows of the Rossville Flats as there were good firing positions there and he wanted to keep soldiers away from the windows to prevent them shooting at soldiers. Once again apart from any breach of the rules on use of the weapon this was conduct at its most reckless and potentially lethal.

9.4.28 Soldier 039 conducted himself in a similar fashion on Rossville Street by firing at what must have been the windows of the flat at no 2 Kells Walk.[21] His explanation at Day 362/68/18 to Day 362/68/19 betrays the paucity of regard for rules or any claim to civilized conduct by members of the Parachute Regiment on the day:

> "From my statement [referring to his RMP statement] they must have been doing something that caught my eye to make me fire the baton round." In addition this soldier clearly fabricated the account he gave of this incident in his 1972 statements of the girl at the window throwing objects to justify his actions.

9.4.29 Soldier 017 who debussed on Rossville Street claimed in his evidence to this Inquiry that he was not trained to bounce rubber bullets of the ground but it was a "tactic" they could use. He claimed that rubber bullets could be bounced if they were closer to someone but if not to get the distance they had to aim high to get it towards the crowd. He accepted that a rubber bullet could cause serious injury.[22] On the day Soldier 017 claimed he fired his rubber bullets at the crowd, not the ground, because of the barricade. Day 358/49/6 to Day 358/49/25. However this does not explain why his first rubber bullet was discharged at the crowd when he debussed on Rossville Street at the "largest mass of the crowd" to "break them up and contain them". Day 358/47/15 to Day 358/47/22. This was clearly part of a culture of reckless misuse of these weapons by Paratroopers on Bloody Sunday, which risked serious injury to members of the public. Video 48 was played to the witness and since he claimed in his oral testimony that he now believed he was in Sergeant O's Pig on the day, he also accepted that he probably was the person who came out of the back of the vehicle and fired a rubber bullet. He claimed he was firing towards the crowd to disperse them. It was put to him that the video clearly showed only a handful of people trying to get away and not posing a threat. Therefore why did he fire. His reply was: "Keep em moving." Day 358/135/13 to Day 358/136/10. This soldier therefore admitted using a weapon with the potential to at very least maim a target in order to keep a number of innocent civilians "moving."

9.4.30 Soldier 019, who was a baton gunner in Lieutenant N's Pig, was asked was it their training to fire rubber bullets at the ground first to disperse a crowd. He replied: " that was the general practice, yes." It was put to this soldier that he had said at B1494.3 that when he debussed on the waste ground there some civilians around but they were "no cause for concern." It was suggested to the witness that the evidence of V2/1:47 to V2/2.47 showed two puffs of smoke from two baton gunners which must have included himself. He was asked why he had done this if the people he saw gave no cause for concern. He answered that maybe they did not initially but it could have happened afterwards. He rejected the suggestion that it was standard practice to get out of their vehicle and start to terrorise the population just to let them know who was boss. Day 343/163/15 to Day 343/164/22.

9.4.31 The use of baton guns in the circumstances they were used by the soldiers of Mortar Platoon, according to the video evidence, was clearly wholly unjustified and contrary to all proper rule of law, conduct or discipline.

9.4.32 Soldier 112 another baton gunner whose recollection at the Inquiry was that he was in Lieutenant N's Pig on the day had another version of their training on firing. He shot at specific individuals, those who were causing the most trouble. He always tried to aim at the torso being the largest part of the target and avoid the head. He recalled it was never part of their training to fire baton rounds off the ground so that they bounced up at their target rather than fire them directly at an individual. Day 320/93/3 to Day 320/93/15.

9.4.33 It is also clear that there was no proper system of check or control in force on Bloody Sunday on the number of baton rounds used by individual soldiers. At Day 373/196/21 to Day 373/201/25 CSM Lewis was examined concerning the system for checking the number of baton rounds

[22] A woman Emma Groves was blinded three months before Bloody Sunday by a rubber expended on the day. It is quite clear that no proper check was in place or carried out. He admitted there was no return done for them on the day of the number fired and he did not know why. The Battalion store man had recorded that Support Company had expended no baton rounds on the day, which was clearly wrong and accepted as such by CSM Lewis. He accepted that Major Loden might have got it wrong. It is also apparent that the figure of 64 baton rounds used came from himself, which appeared in W91 and later in the Battalion log of 64 baton rounds used. Major Loden's shot list at 2213 contained in a statement dated 31 January 1972 had with it the figure of 51 rubber bullets fired. It was suggested to the witness that the figures on rubber bullets were "pure fantasy." He answered:

"The one on rubber bullets appear to be so, yes sir."

9.4.34 It is quite clear that there was no system of control in place on Bloody Sunday for either the issue or recording on return of rubber bullets used. The main effect of such a failure was that soldiers on the ground could fire with impunity knowing that they would not have to account for numbers, use or if they chose, to doctor bullets issued to them.

There is no evidence before the Inquiry of any disciplinary action or rebuke ever having been issued by officers in with regard to this practice. Thus it is submitted that it is an irresistible inference from the evidence that this practice was known about and condoned. Indeed it would be remarkable if it was not known about, given the presence of senior officers at all such riot control situations. It is submitted that it must have been blindingly obvious to officers on the ground on 30 January 1972 that rubber bullets were being fired at persons directly.

9.5 Private Supplies of Ammunition

Summary of submissions

9.5.1 There is very substantial evidence before the Inquiry that soldiers from a number of Regiments including the Parachute Regiment kept private supplies of ammunition. The checks on such practices were cursory and inadequate and the sanctions on soldiers who flouted the regulations were at best unevenly applied. There is clear evidence that different standards applied in Northern Ireland to the practice in Great Britain. The laissez faire attitude of the Army and the nod and wink approach of some officers was reflected in the lenient range of penalties imposed for such offences. In consequence at least some soldiers on the ground on Bloody Sunday were in possession of private supplies of ammunition which were completely free from even the cursory and wholly inadequate checks claimed to have been carried out on ammunition issued officially to soldiers on the day.

Evidence of soldiers who admit to keeping private supplies

9.5.2 INQ 312, a gunner in 22 Lt AD, admitted that he had a private supply of ammunition in addition to the standard issue 20 rounds. Before he went to Northern Ireland they spent a lot of time at firing ranges. He would usually keep back some of the 20 rounds he had been issued with on each occasion he had used the firing range. It became quite easy to build up another magazine of 20 rounds.

> "In my experience it was not unusual for soldiers to carry extra ammunition and I knew a few lads in my regiment did the same as me." C312.4 paragraph 17

9.5.3 Soldier 160, a rifleman in A company RGJ stated that he had a private supply of about four or five spare rounds of ammunition which he would have kept at all times buttoned down in his top pocket. He generally obtained these from the firing range. "We were never searched when we came off the firing range; we simply gave a declaration that we had no empty cases or unauthorised rounds in our possession." B1956.001 paragraph 11. The witness also stated at B1956.001 paragraph 10 that as far as he could recall it was common in all regiments for soldiers to keep private supplies. He didn't think that they were kept for malicious purposes but to replace lost rounds. "If we lost a round, we would simply place a spare round in the magazine. There was no way to distinguish between authorised and unauthorised rounds in a magazine, as each magazine had a batch number but the individual rounds were not marked."

9.5.4 At Day 160/121/16 to Day 160/121/21 Soldier 160 said he probably would have kept private ammunition supplies with him on Bloody Sunday. They "nearly always kept them". He confirmed other members of his platoon routinely kept them.

Praxis Material

9.5.5 The Praxis material contains a substantial body of evidence as to the widespread practice of obtaining and keeping private ammunition supplies amongst soldiers of the Parachute Regiment. In addition it provides a large body of evidence concerning the inadequacy of searches on firing ranges. The material also presents a disturbing picture of lawlessness, indiscipline and inadequate command and control over members of the Parachute Regiment.[23] In particular Soldier H is specifically cited in this material as having carried private supplies of ammunition.[24] Soldier 013 who was a baton gunner in Mortar Platoon deployed on the day stated it was possible to get spare rounds. He did not think he had any that day but he did have "later in the year." B1408.005 paragraph 31.

Lieutenant N at B438.005 paragraph 27 stated as follows:

[23] INQ 1216 O20.22-27, O20.28.25. INQ1243 O35.74.88, INQ 1413 O19.3, Soldier 162, Unknown O31.33-35, Unknown O33.14-16, Unknown O36.41.48, Unknown O37.2, Unknown O37.50-67, Unknown O37.74-80. O28.2 It is submitted that this material came from Soldier 019. See Day 343/93/17 to Day 343/102/19 and Day 343/125/23 to Day 343/163/14 and the evidence of Neil Davies Day 397/99/19 to Day 397/115/18.

"...all loose/unused rounds and empty cases collected from the ranges had to be handed back. Soldiers were required to declare that they had no live rounds or especially two cases in their possession. However, no set number of rounds were used on the practice ranges and it is possible that some soldiers acquired a personal supply of ammunition by not handing over all their loose ammunition." At no time was he ever aware of any soldier having a private supply of ammunition.

Source of extra supplies and inadequacy of checks

9.5.6 INQ 2037, an RSM in 1 Para, confirmed that it was indeed possible to obtain spares from such a source as the firing range C2037.6 paragraph 36. " In theory all a soldier's equipment should be checked before he went on to the range and after he came off. However this was not always done."

9.5.7 Soldier 229, a Lance Corporal in 1 Para HQ Company and a member of Guinness Force, also confirmed that it was possible for soldiers to carry their own ammunition in addition to that distributed to them. "There is the opportunity to take additional ammunition from the firing range. At the end of the training, you have to give a declaration of what ammunition you have used but you could slip some into your pocket. Training ammunition and operational ammunition have batch numbers printed on them which would show up on the empty cases and could therefore be traced back to who shot them." The evidence of Soldier 160 considered above indicated that in fact the batch numbers were on the boxes not the individual bullets. B2211.010 at paragraph 62.

9.5.8 Both may be correct. Even if the numbers were on boxes and cartridges only the opportunity for getting round the system is obvious from the evidence of Soldier 205. At 2120.001 paragraph 7 to 8 the witness who was the company sergeant major of A Company of the 1st battalion of the first Parachute Regiment stated:

> "It was a court martial offence to be found in possession of a private supply of ammunition. Each box of ammunition would bear the same batch number, which would be numbered and/or lettered. The bullet that would actually be fired would not bear any number/lettering. The cartridge that would be discharged when the bullet is fired would bear the batch number. Whenever someone was shot it was considered good practice for the soldier who had fired to try and recover the cartridge. I suppose that in theory a soldier could have handed in rounds with a mixture of batch numbers, as there would be no way that I could physically check each bullet that was handed in. I would only check a batch number if I had a particular reason to. I cannot recall ever having reason to do so. No one from A Company fired a weapon on the 30th January 1972 and I was handed back the same number of rounds that were issued at the outset."

9.5.9 INQ 666 stated at C666.2 paragraph 7 that "...each issued bullet had to be accounted for but it was not uncommon for soldiers in any of the battalions to have their own private supply of ammunition which were not accounted for. It was easy to hide a few un-discharged rounds of ammunition after exercises on the firing range. When you left the firing range you had to declare to the commanding officer there that you had no live ammunition. For example you would say:.

> "Sir, I declare that I have no ammunition." He would randomly carry out a search but it was not very thorough. Spare ammunition could be hidden in our pockets or flak jackets because they were never searched. Searches were usually only of the ammunition pouches."

9.5.10 At C312.4 paragraph 17 INQ 312 of the 22nd Light Air Defence Regiment stated:

> "On the day, I had the standard 20 rounds I had been issued with, but I also carried a private supply of a further 20 round. When I first arrived in Northern Ireland I realised that 20 rounds would not be sufficient if I got caught in a gunfight with the IRA. Before we went to Northern Ireland we spent a lot of time at firing ranges. I would usually keep back some of the 20 rounds I had been issued with on each occasion I used the firing rake. It became quite easy to build up another magazine of 20 rounds. In my experience it was not unusual for soldiers to carry extra ammunition and I knew a few lads in my Regiment did the same as me. I did not know anyone who had dum-dum bullets although I understood they were quite easy to make. The feeling at the time was because of the tight rules of engagement soldiers were not given enough help to do the job that they were there to do. They were simply becoming targets for terrorists. By carrying a private supply of ammunition, if you were put in a situation where you had fired a shot and you did not want to declare it, having a private supply of ammunition would mean that you would not have to do so. In my opinion this would happen possibly where there was no real justification for having fired a round to avoid unnecessary red tape."

Awareness of Senior Officers

9.5.11 Soldier 219 a Captain in the Royal Army medical Corps who was present on 30 January 1972 had been told that 109 rounds were fired on the day by the Battalion. He found this quite surprising as he thought that soldiers fired a lot more than that. He confirms it is true that some soldiers saved up a private reserve called buckshee rounds. He did not see any on the day but thereafter learnt that there was some available on that occasion.

"Soldiers got their Buckshee rounds illegally from range exercises" B2162.004 at paragraph 16.

9.5.12 INQ 954 a Rifleman in 2 RGJ stated most soldiers carried their own private supply of ammunition in addition to their issued 20 rounds. Often live ammunition was taken from rifle ranges and it was easy to do." If you did not fire all your live ammunition on the firing range you could just not declare it at the end of the session." His evidence is that it would be naïve to say that officers were not aware that this went on although they did not encourage it. C954.2 at paragraphs 12 to 13.

9.5.13 INQ 441 accepted it was possible to obtain private supplies of ammunition but the practice would be "frowned upon" by the Platoon Commander. C441.7 paragraph 39. It is notable that such practices did not always result in anything more serious than being "frowned upon" by Senior Officers.

9.5.14 INQ 312 stated at C312.4 paragraph 17:

> "It would be naive to say that the officers were not aware that this went on, but it was certainly not encouraged. I would not go so far as to say that they turned a blind eye to it, but they were not too bothered."

9.5.15 At C1828 paragraph 27 INQ 1828 of the Royal Military Police stated:

> "I have been asked if I knew whether it was the practice of soldiers in the British army to retain personal illegal supplies of ammunition or to modify their bullets to create dumdums. Whilst I was never asked to formally investigate such practises (and I would not have investigated them without being told to) I can safely say that many soldiers did carry illegal supplies of ammunition. It was not a secret. Even the Royal Military Police did it and I expect it happens everywhere, not just in Northern Ireland. Extra rounds were easy to obtain. If for example a soldier fired eight rounds he could say that he fired ten and then obtain two extra round. He could build up a sizeable supply over time. I expect soldiers did this because they felt safer, having extra ammunition. It was general knowledge that this happened. Those in charge turned a blind eye, not being overly worried about how many rounds soldiers had so long as they fired at what they were supposed to and within the rules."

Modus Operendi

9.5.16 INQ 449, a Private in HQ Company attached to Guinness Force, stated that the ammunition was not cross checked when it was returned. Therefore if a soldier did not want people to know that he had fired a shot he could just fill his magazine with any spare ammunition he had. C449.8 at paragraph 34.

9.5.17 Soldier 216, a Company Sergeant Major in the First Royal Anglian Regiment, stated there would be live firing exercises that would use up old stores of ammunition:

> "...New ammunition would then be issued. There was some spare ammunition lying around and it would be easy for a soldier to get a spare round if he wanted one. This was an illicit source and we were never able to dry it up even though we wanted to." B2153.004 at paragraph 14.

9.5.18 "If a live round was fired in anger that was a different matter. There would be a full inquiry into the circumstances with stringent checks. But the number of times when that happened was rare. It would nevertheless be possible for a soldier who had fired a round to conceal it with a spare round although I was never aware of it happening. Although ammunition cartridges did contain markings which identified them on the base checks did not go into that sort of detail." B2153.OO5 at paragraph 15.

9.5.19 INQ 2099, a Lance Corporal in the Royal Regiment of Fusiliers, stated it was possible for soldiers to accumulate an extra supply of ammunition on the firing ranges:

> "If you spotted a cartridge which had not been collected from the previous shoot you add it to your own collection and hand it in as having been fired and therefore, save one of your own bullets." C2099.2 paragraph 8.

9.5.20 "The regiment did carry out spot checks of ammunition and weapons and you did have to report the circumstances in which you fired any live rounds but other than this you were responsible for your own ammunition during the course of your tour. Consequently it wasn't difficult to build up additional supplies." C2099.2 paragraph 9.

9.5.21 INQ 408 at C408.2 paragraph 8 talked of ways of cheating the system:

> " ..If for example, you engaged a gunman and had cause to fire, you could say you had fired more shots than you actually had, get replacements and keep the spares."

9.5.22 INQ 1345, a Corporal in the First Royal Anglian Regiment, was aware that anyone could get "Buckshee rounds" from the firing range if they wanted them. " Random checks were made after being on the firing range and each soldier was required to make a declaration that he had no live ammunition on him but it was easy enough to get away with." C1345.4 paragraph 22.

9.5.23 INQ 2023, a Private in 1 Para B Company, who was not present on Bloody Sunday, stated that most people had 2/3 Buckshee rounds. They came from training and range exercises and were illegally held. He stated that he did not hear anyone refer to the use of Buckshee rounds on Bloody Sunday but he did not doubt that that they were used so as to reduce the numbers of rounds that they would have to account for as having been fired. "That would have been to minimise their involvement in the action but that happens in every army in the world. It would have been possible form the inspecting officers to have discovered the buckshee rounds by inspecting the markings on the cases but they never chose to do that. C2023.3 at paragraph 17.[25]

9.5.24 INQ 587 was a soldier in 9th Platoon C Company of the Parachute Regiment. His evidence was that keeping extra supplies of ammunition as a practice took place and on 30th January 1972, he would say that on the day he probably had extra rounds of ammunition. He was examined on a number of issues by Counsel for some of the soldiers, including the issue of a declaration to the Range Officer that he does not intend to leave the range with rounds issued. INQ 587's evidence was that a soldier was not searched and that it was possible to conceal a live round elsewhere than in the soldier's pouch, which was searched by the Range Officer. His evidence also was that operational ammunition would not have an individual number on it, but a NATO marking and a year of manufacture on the bottom if the bullet. The box of ammunition would have a batch number, not the round. INQ587 described as common practice to have extra rounds. "If you lost a round it caused a great problem, so if you had an extra round you replace it". Day 324/177/18 to Day 324/186/3.

Consequences of being caught with a Private Supply

9.5.25 A number of soldiers spoke of the serious consequences of being caught with private supplies of ammunition, which was court martial. INQ 147 at Day 359/43/24 to Day 359/48/25 stated that if found carrying extra supplies of ammunition:

[25] In addition to the body of evidence examined above further examples of evidence before the Inquiry confirming the practice of keeping spare rounds can be seen at C1152.8 paragraph 35 and C2037.7

"You would be out of the Army in a flash".

9.5.26 He was asked to confirm by Counsel for the families that what he was saying was, that it was inconceivable that the Army would not deal seriously with anyone who had private supplies of ammunition, since to permit people to have private supplies of ammunition would mean that they could literally get away with murder. The witness agreed. The Inquiry knows of course that this evidence from INQ 147 cannot be correct. At Day 340/98/21 to Day 340/99/25, INQ 1334 confirmed that he had in fact been demoted for keeping his own supply of ammunition. He was not removed from the army.

9.5.27 Warrant Officer John Wood stated at CW1.8 paragraph 47 that he considered it a waste of time to check what ammunition was fired by asking the quartermaster :

> "as there was lots of spare ammunition floating round at the time. There was less stringent control of ammunition at the time - nobody worried when we had too much of it, only when we did not have enough. It was not unusual for us to find spare ammunition amongst the soldiers for instance where they had taped two magazines of the ammunition together. If a soldier was found in possession of one spare round in Aldershot he would be court's martialled instantly, but it appeared to me that there was a different philosophy in the army in Northern Ireland. I seem to recall that the team from SIB who were investigating at a later date covered the question of spare ammunition being used on Bloody Sunday, but I cannot recall what the outcome of the investigation was."

9.5.28 INQ 1152, a Lance Corporal in 1 Para, stated that it was possible to claim to have lost a round and get a replacement or to get one from the firing range. C1152.8 paragraph 35. He stated that he himself did not retain paragraph 42. There is also evidence before the Inquiry of the Practice of making doctored or dumillegal supplies of ammunition but knows it was done. If discovered you would be fined.

Consequences on Bloody Sunday

9.5.29 This evidence is especially significant when the inadequacy of the system for checking ammunition issued is considered. There was clearly no effective or serious system for checking that a soldier did not consistently leave a firing range building up a stock of supplies. Neither was there any system for establishing whether a soldier had fired extra unissued rounds on the day of an engagement. The system in place on Bloody Sunday was for checking the use of officially issued rounds and was itself wholly inadequate. He did not even amount to a physical check but word of mouth of a runner between the soldiers on the ground and the Company Sergeant Major. The evidence of CSM Lewis under examination by Mr. Mansfield QC indicated the clear inadequacies of purported checks on Bloody Sunday even for officially issued rounds. Day 373/172/9 to Day 373/212/19. Such a system could well have allowed an individual soldiers who had personal supplies of bullets to under-declare the number of shots that they actually fired on that day, failing to declare shots up to the number of the private supply used. It is also, of course possible, given the clear inadequacy of the ammunition checks carried out subsequent to the shootings that a soldier or soldiers under-declared the number of shots they fired and any deficiency in the number of the bullets they held was not discovered.

9.5.30 Summary of submissions in respect of Private supplies of ammunition

i. The practice of the keeping of private supplies of ammunition was widespread amongst soldiers and was a practice adopted by members of different ranks and regiments.

ii. Senior Officers were aware of and condoned the practice.

---

dum bullets. See for example C1345.4 paragraph 22 , B1831.006 paragraph 48

iii. The purpose of keeping private supplies of ammunition could only be to facilitate the firing of shots and not having to account for them.

iv. It is an irresistible inference that at least some soldiers carried extra supplies of ammunition on Bloody Sunday and such a practice must cast further doubt on the accounts of soldiers as to the quantity of shots discharged by them on the day.

The carrying of spare rounds of ammunition demonstrates the capacity of soldiers to act in an undisciplined and illegal manner. Soldiers clearly did so on the day of the march on Bloody Sunday. The capacity for such behaviour and the freedom to act in such a manner renders even the purported checks carried out on Bloody Sunday utterly redundant. Those who fired shots could do so in the knowledge that if they used spare ammunition their activity would go completely undetected.

9.6 Yellow Card

9.6.1 Introduction

It is proposed to review the particular issues surrounding the "Yellow Card " by providing submissions in relation to the following:

- Problems Posed By the Yellow Card;

- Breaches of the Yellow Card;

- Lack of disciplinary action in respect of the breaches;

- Incompatibility of the Yellow Card with Common Law Principles;

- Government Responsibility.

9.6.2 Problems Posed by the Yellow Card

9.6.2.1 Lord Widgery in his report in dealing with the provisions of the Yellow Card, ED71.1, ED71.2, and the justification for the soldiers firing set out the following observations:

> "Troops on duty in Northern Ireland have standing instructions for opening fire. These instructions are set out upon the Yellow Card which every soldier is required to carry. Soldiers operating collectively – a term which is not itself defined – are not to open fire without an order from the Commander on the spot. Soldiers acting individually are generally required to give warning before opening fire and are subject to other general rules. These provide inter alia:
>
> "2. Never use force more than the minimum necessary to enable you to carry out your duties.
> 3. Always first try to handle the situation by other means than opening fire. If you have to fire:
> (a) Fire only aimed shots.
> (b) Do not fire more rounds than are absolutely necessary to achieve your aim". ED71.1

9.6.2.2 The injunction to fire only aimed shots is understood by the soldiers as ruling out shooting from the hip – which they in any case regard as inefficient, indeed pointless, except that in a very sudden emergency, requiring split second action, a shot from the hip is regards as permissible if it is as well aimed a shot as the circumstances allow.

9.6.2.3 Other stringent restrictions apply to soldiers who have given warning of intention to fire. But the rule of principal significance to the events of 30 January is that which contemplates a situation in which it is not practicable to give a warning.

Rule 13 provides:

> "You may fire without warning either when hostile firing is taking place in your area, and a warning is impracticable, or when any delay could lead to death or serious injury to people whom it is your duty to protect or to yourself: and then only:
> against a person using a firearm against members of the security forces or people whom it is your duty to protect; or > against a person carrying a firearm if you have reason to think he is about to use it for offensive purposes." ED71.2
>
> The term "firearm" is defined as including a grenade, nail bomb or gelignite-type bomb.

9.6.2.4 Though no-one has sought to criticise the spirit and intention of these orders, it would be optimistic to suppose that every soldier could be trained to understand them in detail and apply them rigidly. Even if he could, the terms of Rule 13 leave certain questions unanswered and, perhaps, unanswerable:

i. In conditions contemplated by Rule 13, is fire to be opened defensively and restricted to that which is necessary to cause the attacker to desist and withdraw, or is he treated as an enemy in battle and engaged until he surrenders or is killed?

ii. In these conditions, is fire to be withheld on account of risk to others in the vicinity who are not themselves carrying or using firearms? Suppose that in a crowd of youths throwing stones one is identified as holding a nail bomb. Is the solder then to hold his fire because of risk to those who are only throwing stones?

iii. When hostile fire is taking place how certain must the soldier be in identifying an object as a firearm? From the front a camera with a telescopic lens may look very much like certain types of sub-machine gun. A television sound recordist holding his microphone aloft could well be taken for someone about to throw a nail bomb.

Faced with such a situation does the soldier wait or does he give himself the benefit of the doubt and fire?

9.6.2.5 Furthermore, anomalous situations could arise from the Yellow Card's definition of a firearm. Although the definition does not embrace the petrol bomb, the soldier is authorised to fire against a person throwing a petrol bomb, but only after due warning and if petrol bomb attacks continue and if the thrower's action is likely to endanger life. There is no specific mention of other types of missile, including aid bombs. However, the soldier is authorised to fire, after due warnings, "against a person attacking.... If his action is "likely to endanger life" or "if there is no other way" for the soldier to protect himself or others "from the danger of being killed or seriously injured". So it would presumably be in order under the Yellow Card rules for a soldier to fire on a person hurling bricks or acid bombs or pieces of angle iron from high up on a tall building, but only after giving due warning, which it might not be easy to give.

9.6.2.6 It was not open to the soldier to give warning by firing warning shots. As has already been seen, the soldier is required to "fire only aimed shots". Whilst the Yellow Card does not in terms forbid a soldier hard pressed by an advancing mob to fire over their heads, to do so is certainly a breach of the orders. The justification put forward for this somewhat surprising provision is that hooligans would rapidly take note of and take advantage of the regular firing of shots. They would understand it to mean they could pass harmlessly by and the carrying of firearms would cease to deter their activities.

9.6.2.7 Soldiers will react to the situations in which they find themselves in different ways according to their temperament and to the prevailing circumstances. The more intensive the shooting or stone-throwing which is going on the more ready will they be to interpret the Yellow Card as permitting them to open fire. The individual soldier's reactions may also be affected by the general understanding of these problems that prevail in his unit. In the Parachute Regiment, at any rate in the 1st Battalion, the soldiers are trained to take what may be described as a hard line upon these questions. The events of 30 January and the attitude of individual soldiers whilst giving evidence suggest that when engaging an identified gunman or bomb-thrower they shoot to kill and continue to fire until the target disappears or falls.

When under attack and returning fire they show no particular concern for the safety of others in the vicinity of the target.

9.6.3 Breaches of the Yellow Card

9.6.3.1 On Bloody Sunday there was a wholesale disregard for the Yellow Card. This was recognised by Officers at a very early stage, INQ 1900 who gave evidence at C1900.4 paragraph 23 stated, "I recall that after reading two or three of them, it was clear to me that much of what had occurred was outside the scope of the Yellow Card. In one statement, a soldier said that he had fired 19 shots at a shadow in a window. In another case, a soldier said that he had fired over the heads of the crowd. These two statements stick in my mind because they were totally outside the requirements of the Yellow Card and so blatantly wrong."

9.6.3.2 It is our submission that the actions of a large number of soldiers and officers, points clearly and unquestionably to a breakdown in discipline and order which undoubtedly contributed towards innocent people being shot. The fact that such a large number of soldiers disregarded the Yellow Card on Bloody Sunday and then escaped punishment is confirmation that the Yellow Card was treated lightly and was habitually ignored.

9.6.3.3 It was exactly as INQ 119 stated in B1752.002 paragraph 5 "a bit of joke". This attitude of contempt towards the yellow card was shown by Soldier 019 in his Praxis interview at O28.2 and by Soldier 162 in his praxis interview at O18.1 "Yellow card system that was a joke. ...well we laughed at that. Just a game with the SIB." And O18.2 "Yellow card - fuck who believes in that nonsense". INQ 1216 C1216.3 paragraph 14 stated "I said in my conversation with Tony Stark that the Yellow Card was a bit of a joke. I would still say that... you would get one of the lads in your platoon to fire in the air so that you could fire back at the terrorists and say that they fired first. You would also fire a few rounds into likely points of cover where there might be terrorists whether you had seen them or not."

9.6.3.4 Soldiers and Officers believed that the yellow card was too restrictive and not only should they be entitled to shoot on suspicion that someone had a firearm, Day 306/59/1 to Day 306/59/13 they should be entitled to shoot stone throwers. The attitude of the officers was displayed memorably in General Ford's memo of the 7th of January and by Colonel Roy Jackson on Day 286/43/17 to Day 286/43/24. Lord Hailsham was of a similar mind and it was his belief that stone throwers could be shot. OS4.24

9.6.3.5 The first and most obvious way of reducing the chances of an innocent civilian being shot is to restrict the occasions when it is permissible for soldiers to carry live rounds in the breech of their weapons. It is clearly stated in the Yellow card (November 1971 revision) ED71.1 General rules no.4, "Unless you are about to open fire no live round is to be carried in the breech and the working parts must be forward. Company Commanders and above may, when circumstances in their opinion warrant such action, order weapons to be cocked, with a round in the breech where appropriate, and the safety catch at safe."

9.6.3.6 A large number of soldiers choose to ignore this requirement demonstrating a willingness and eagerness to fire live rounds on Bloody Sunday. A willingness, which undoubtedly led to innocent civilians being shot. That willingness to open fire is shown in the evidence of: Soldier B, B43.016 E "I cocked my weapon in response to stone throwing", INQ 564, C564.3 paragraph 15 "I probably had my weapon cocked in anticipation", Soldier 112, B1732.006 paragraph 26 "My rifle was cocked and I was looking around to identify gunmen" Soldier 202, B2111.013 paragraph 86 "It was at this stage, as we got into our vehicles, that I saw a soldier who I thought was Corporal P from Mortar platoon cocking his weapon before entering the pig" Sergeant O, B468 paragraph 10 "I had my own weapon cocked and ready from the time we left Little James Street." Soldier P's evidence is that, "We moved forward from Little James Street towards William Street in an armoured humber... I had an SLR loaded with a magazine of 20 rounds. The rifle was cocked with a round in the breech. B623.005 This is not just an isolated breakdown in the enforcement of the rules of engagement, it is a wholesale disregard for them.

9.6.3.7 Soldier U's evidence is that, "As we reached the junction of Eden Place/Rossville Street, I jumped out of the vehicle. As I did so I cocked my SLR putting one round in the breech with the safety catch on safe." Soldier U then claims to have gone forward and arrested a stone thrower, Mr Charles Collins. B748 Soldier L claims that he would not breach the Yellow Card, Day 341/29/4 to Day 341/29/12 however on his evidence at B320 he "cocked" his weapon in order to persuade a civilian, Mr Lynn to come down from the rafters of a derelict building.

Soldier A's evidence is that he cocked his weapon "in readiness" because a man, aged about 50, told him to be careful as there were some 'bad buggers' around the corner" B908.008 paragraph 25.

9.6.3.8 INQ 1918's evidence on Day 342/107/13 to Day 342/107/12 was that his weapon may have been cocked when he pointed his rifle at an arrestee! Lt 119's evidence was "As we passed through ... I saw that the leading Platoon had come under fire. When hostile fire is observed it is the practice to cock weapons without further order. I was carrying an SLR and cocked it. I assume my men did the same. The sound of cocking weapons is clearly audible and when the commander cocks his weapon his men will do the same." B1752.043 paragraph 5 The decision of Lieutenant 119 and the men of his Platoon to cock their rifles, even prior to debussing his further evidence that among the ranked soldiers there was habitual disregard for the Yellow Card. It also demonstrates a willingness and eagerness to engage in lethal force. Soldier F's evidence is particularly illuminating in that he revealed that the standard practice in the Para Regiment was to cock your weapon in advance before you had been fired on. Day 376/63

Q. Are you telling the Inquiry that the account that you gave there of deploying with your weapon already cocked with one round in the breech prior to your ever having been fired upon, that that was consistent with the yellow card?

A. That was standard procedure in the Parachute Regiment, to cock your weapon automatically.

Q. Before you were fired on?

A. That is correct.

Q. With one in the breech?

A. That is correct.

Q. Are you sure about that?

A. Yes.

9.6.3.9 Corporal P and Lieutenant N claim to have fired "warning shots" over the heads of a hostile crowd. Even if this is true, it is a Breach of the Yellow Card for the reasons that have set out by Christopher Clarke QC on Day 04/88/1 to Day 04/89/9. Mr Clarke referred to G130A.865.018. This is a portion of a document, which begins at G130A.865.003 and was a question and answer brief prepared by an official at the Ministry of Defence on 17th April 1972, with a view to enabling questions to be answered from the media following the publication of the Widgery report. One of the questions anticipated was:

> "Why may soldiers not fire warning shots over heads?" The answer that was given was: "Lord Widgery records (paragraph 93) advantage would be taken of the regular firing of shots meant to pass harmlessly by, which would mean that the carrying of firearms would cease to deter.
> "There are other reasons. A warning shot may be misinterpreted, and may thus provoke fire. There is the possibility that a warning shot may hit some completely innocent person at a distance.

Finally, to permit soldiers to fire other than aimed shots would be to relax control over their actions in some degree."

9.6.3.10 It is clear from the question and answer paper prepared by the Ministry of Defence that the code did not permit "Warning Shots", the firing of shots in the air. We accept that it is in that respect stricter than the common law, which is absolutely necessary given that soldiers are trained to kill. We accept that firing shots into the air might seem in some circumstances a reasonable, almost classic method of restoring order or averting a dangerous situation without bloodshed. However we contend that soldiers require greater restrictions because they are trained to use maximum force to destroy the enemy. What is important is that Corporal P and Lieutenant N were well aware of this restriction in the Yellow Card and yet they choose to completely disregard it. Their actions are further evidence that, the Yellow Card carried little weight among the ranked soldiers as well as the regular soldiers.

9.6.3.11 From the evidence of Mr Lynn, Captain 200 B1983 and B1983, and Lance Corporal 229 Day 341/39/3 to Day 341/39/18, it is clear that Soldier L disregarded the Yellow Card by firing shots in a reckless manner into the rafters of a building and this was a fact that was well known within Composite Platoon. It must have been known by his superiors that he was lying to the RMP, the Treasury Solicitor and Lord Widgery.

9.6.3.12 Three soldiers, K, L and M, admitted to firing at persons who were not about to use a firearm for offensive purposes. On their evidence, they shot at one or two people who were crawling along the east side of Rossville Street towards the door of block 1 of the flats. On their evidence the person or persons whom they shot at, was either holding a rifle or passing it forward. In this scenario the evidence that the soldiers have advanced is not that the "targets" were about to use a firearm but on the contrary were crawling away from the barricade, towards the door of block one of the flats. B290, B291, B312, B313, B348 This scenario is quite clearly in Breach of Section 13b of the Yellow Card.

9.6.3.13 In addition the firing by Soldier V at a 'Petrol bomber' without a warning, was a clear breach of the Yellow Card, as a petrol bomb is not a firearm as defined by paragraph 13 of the Yellow Card, therefore soldier V was not entitled to fire at a petrol bomber without warning. In addition the firing by soldier T, at an acid bomber on the authority of Sergeant O was completely contrary to the Yellow Card as an acid bomb is not a firearm as defined by paragraph 13 of the Yellow Card and Sergeant O did not have the authority to override this.

9.6.3.14 In addition it is expressly stated that soldiers should only fire aimed shots as a last resort using the minimum number of rounds necessary to achieve their aim. It is submitted that all the soldiers, who fired on the day failed to do this. The most glaring examples of soldiers firing large quantities of ammunition into target areas are Soldiers F, who on his evidence fired three rounds at a window in Rossville Flats on the basis that he had been told that there was a gunman there and he observed a "movement" at the window. Soldier H, claims to have fired 19 rounds at a window and Soldier S claims to have fired 12 shots at a gunman between blocks two and three of the Rossville Flats. If this did occur, it is precisely the type of shooting described by Sergeant O in a praxis interview namely, "putting ammunition into an area where you know something is happening, just trying to keep people's heads down". B575.20 . Again, on their evidence these soldiers have quite clearly disregarded the Yellow Card, and showed scant regard for human life.

9.6.3.15 The shots fired by A and B are not analogous to the rest of the shooting on Bloody Sunday. They fired from a fixed location, they were with their Platoon Commander and they were no more than 30 metres from their target. The evidence of INQ 441 shows quite clearly that he was in control of what occurred in the Abbey Taxis building by placing Corporal A at a position at the second floor window and Private B at a position on the ground floor. C441.4 paragraph 18. The fact that 441 was in control of this situation is strengthened by the evidence of Soldier A who claims that he informed his Platoon Commander about nail bombs. Soldier A does not claim that he identified a nail bomber. Soldier B did not inform his Commander of the nail bombs or that he was going to shoot a nail bomber. INQ 441 has attempted to distance himself from the shooting by Soldiers A and B by suggesting that he was not in control because he was assisting INQ 455 and was outside the Abbey Taxis building with the rest of the Platoon. INQ 441 knew this was inaccurate. The sole purpose for this assertion was to enable the Platoon Commander to avoid responsibility. Day 303/82/10 and Day 303/92/24 to Day 303/93/4 It is inaccurate because it does not correspond with the other evidence from the members of the Machine Gun Platoon that the Platoon were inside the building and it does not correspond with 441's evidence that he "heard the hard extractions whilst we were in the derelict building when A and B fired at nail bombers."

9.6.3.16 On Bloody Sunday, it is submitted that the troops were acting collectively, therefore they did not have the authority to open fire. This was a collective arrest operation led by the officers and certainly in 1972 the Army were keen to propagate the notion that they were in complete control of this operation. Captain 200 was clear in his evidence that the soldiers were acting collectively, "All rounds fired except for one by soldier L in the ruin, were controlled by Senior NCO's." B1983

In the alternative, if the Tribunal comes to the conclusion that the soldiers were acting individually we submit that, all the soldiers who fired on the day, failed to comply with the Yellow Card. They failed to use minimum force, they did not try to handle the situation by other means other than opening fire and they failed to give a warning before opening fire. They used maximum force.

9.6.4 Lack of disciplinary action in respect of the breaches

9.6.4.1 It is now being suggested that in the ensuing noise and confusion it was impracticable for the officers to exercise control. We do not accept that it was not practicable for officers or NCO's to control soldiers on the ground. What occurred on the ground was that senior officers such as Major Loden abdicated responsibility and allowed soldiers to fire without regard to the Yellow Card and human life.

9.6.4.2 A substantial body of soldiers showed a contemptuous disregard for the yellow card and yet no soldier was disciplined. It is simply inconceivable that the officers of 1 Para, both commissioned and non-commissioned, were unaware of this. It simply confirms that Operation Forecast was not in any meaningful sense planned or controlled to minimize the risk to human life from the use of lethal force.

9.6.4.3 It demonstrates that the attitude of the members of 1 Para was to disregard the mechanisms interposed namely the limited time for assessment between events and the soldier's reaction. It also tends to confirm that 1 Para had arrived at the conclusion, long before General Ford, that the minimum force required to restore law and order in Derry was to shoot to kill those whom they saw as defying the law.

9.6.5 Incompatibility of the Yellow Card with Common Law Principles

9.6.5.1 The Law on the use of force in self-defence, or in the prevention of crime or disorder applies in the same measure to a soldier as to any other citizen. He may use such force as is reasonable in all the circumstances, but not more than is necessary. Paratroopers on Bloody Sunday used SLR Rifles loaded with 7.62mm bullets. The 7.62mm bullet could travel up to 3,000 meters per second, could pass through plated steel, could pass through a railway line, was accurate up to 300 yards and had a possible travelling distance of 3 miles.

9.6.5.2 When a soldier opens fire he is trained to shoot only to kill. The foreseeable and intended consequence of a soldier opening fire is, therefore, the death of his target. How can that ever comply with the common law and international obligations to use no more force than absolutely necessary in all the circumstances? There may be occasions when, as a matter of law, a soldier is entitled to open fire on a target with the intention of wounding, this being sufficient to eliminate the threat or danger posed. Yet the Yellow Card strictly prohibits this even though this may also be the minimum force required to for self defence or the preservation of life. The soldier has the obligation to follow the Yellow Card. The alternative course is to claim to adhere to the Yellow Card, while ignoring it, and use its strict terms as justification for unlawful action, including murder.

9.6.6 Government Role in respect of the drafting/approving of the Yellow

9.6.6.1 The fact that the Yellow Card was specifically approved at a Cabinet Committee is illustrative of the fact that the issues engaged, while within the immediate province of the military, have enormous implications for Government given its responsibility for the use of lethal force by its agents.

9.6.6.2 The Yellow Card recognises that soldiers are not policemen, and they are being asked to fulfil a role for which they are unsuited. To discharge its duties to the troops and the community they are being asked to police the Government and the Army High Command had a duty to devise and enforce a program of instruction and training, so that each soldier, when acting in support of the Civil Power, understood his legal obligations to his fellow citizens. The Yellow Card is an inadequate alternative to such a program.

9.6.6.3 If it was to be a genuinely meaningful document, the Government, the Ministry of Defence and the Military Commanders had to take all necessary steps to ensure that the Yellow Card was adhered to. Military operations which have the potential for the use of lethal force, had to be strictly planned and controlled to limit recourse to its use and thereby minimise the danger to the civil population. This is evident when the primary demands on a soldier are so radically different to those on a police officer, namely to retain an aggressive spirit. Future Military Policy For Londonderry dated 14 December 1971 at G41.266 paragraph 12.c.

9.6.6.4 Further confusion is created by such assertions by General Ford as:

"We should not hesitate to fire whenever events demand it and the law permits."

Commander Land Forces Directive dated 26 October 1971 G23.167 paragraph 15

Such a statement confuses the law with the Yellow Card and fails to address the central question that soldiers are only permitted by the rules of military engagement to shoot to kill.

9.6.6.5 Sir Edward Heath's attitude towards breaches of the Yellow Card as displayed in 1972 by the inaction of his government was confirmed before the Tribunal on Day 285/134/4 to Day 285//142/25. Sir Edward's evidence was abundantly clear. Breaches of the yellow card were a matter of military discipline and the Government had no responsibility to ensure compliance. The military authorities were entirely aware of the unsatisfactory position that its soldiers would be placed in if strict adherence to the provisions of the Yellow Card were properly enforced. If a soldier complied with the terms of the Yellow Card it was probable that he would be acting within the law. If he acted outside its terms then he might still be acting within the law but be in breach of military discipline, or he might be in breach of both.

9.6.6.6 To create a situation in which a soldier armed with a lethal weapon could only use it to kill when lesser action would suffice, was not only an abrogation of the basic and fundamental obligations of the Government and the Military Authorities, but one which was likely to produce a contemptuous disregard for the terms of the Yellow Card. The conduct of a soldier could be produced before an uncritical and sympathetic investigator and the terms of the Yellow Card would be relied upon to justify that which it was supposedly designed to prevent, the murder of innocent people as on Bloody Sunday.

9.7 Reputation of the Paras

"Question: Do you see yourself as an elite force?
Answer: Oh yes, yes, definitely, definitely. When you come home on leave, when you first pass out, before you go into the battalion or anything like that, you get out of Station or wherever you be and you feel it, you feel super trooper. Comprendez?
Question: Yes, sure. But do you see yourself as sort of head and shoulders above other troops?
Answer: Oh yes, oh yes.
Question: A tougher force?
Answer: Very much so.
Question: Does that lead you to be sort of arrogant?
Answer: Yes.
Question: Aggressive?
Answer: Well you wouldn't last in the Para or Green Jackets if you weren't basically aggressive," O37.12

9.7.1 Introduction

9.7.1.1 There is before the Tribunal a large amount of evidence from both military and civilian sources relating to the Reputation of the Parachute Regiment. In summary, the Paras regarded themselves as mentally, physically and militarily superior to other soldiers. They were regarded by other sections of the British Army as effective in some quarters whilst brutal, thuggish and counter productive in others. They were both resented and feared by the Nationalist population in Belfast by 30th January 1972. In the months before Bloody Sunday in Belfast they earned a reputation for involvement in acts of violence and indiscipline.

9.7.2 How They Viewed Themselves

9.7.2.1 Ivan Cooper then a Stormont MP recalled:

> "Magilligan was the first time that I had become conscious of the role of paras, who seemed to me to be a different breed of soldier, a different species, to that which I was used to seeing in Northern Ireland. The paras struck me as very 'soldierly' men who took a pride in their fitness and their belligerence. The paras at Magilligan were very belligerent, and the impression I had gained was that this Regiment had been brought in to 'clean up' the civil unrest in Northern Ireland and that the paras saw themselves in this role. The paras at Magilligan engaged themselves in confrontations with the marchers, readily using batons to thrash the marchers with impunity. The paras had none of the reservations which other regiments of the military had had in the past. The march at Magilligan gave me a taste of the nature of a paratrooper." (emphasis added) KC12.15 paragraph 6

9.7.2.2 Underlying all, were the attitudes of superiority and invulnerability that were instilled into Paras through their training. This is particularly evident in the responses of a Mortar Platoon soldier, to whom Para training was:

> "Toughest training of any in the army. 30 per cent survive. Only take the toughest in the Paras. People have died during training. Got to be a psycho to get in Paras. Aggro bound. Assault troops.

Maximum violence in minimum time. React. Nearest thing to Kamikaze in the British Army. Go go go...
Seen as the hardest, toughest baddest. Hard Paras are hard. Give em stick, they know and we know. See Beret and they know what's coming, what it's all about...
Northern Ireland, sorted out. Politicians shit themselves.
Why send us in if they want social workers" O28.1

9.7.2.3 They shunned the use of riot shields and CS gas that were employed by other Regiments O22.26. When on duty, their pattern of activity was to be called into an area where 'trouble was already running, quieten it down within 20-30 minutes, hand it back to the unit and go away.' It would appear to have been a role they relished. They saw themselves sorting out the messes other regiments got themselves into. The normal containment roles engaged in by other regiments were seen as "passive" 022.26 For the individual Para, regimental training emphasizes aggression, 'taking the fight to the enemy,' capturing a piece of ground and holding it, were all of the essence. 'You can't do that with non-fit, non-aggressive men.' O22.32 and O22.33

9.7.2.4 They felt they were feared by the enemy and respected by fellow soldiers because if there was trouble in an area, 'it would be cleared.' They felt that other units were seen as 'not doing their job properly.' They had to remain in their designated areas, while the Paras were free to cross boundaries 'in hot pursuit.' O19.15

9.7.2.5 For them it meant coming in to restore order. That has nothing to do with law; it is for others to take care of law when order has been restored. O22.34 One soldier, who arrived in Ireland in August 1969, recalls with an air of bewilderment being told that they had to 'play hearts and minds.' (Emphasis added) O23.4

9.7.2.6 In relation to Bloody Sunday, 1 Para Adjutant Captain Mike Jackson was reported to have said that it was necessary for the battalion to 'go in hard' to demonstrate what they had already proved in 39th Brigade that no areas were closed to them.

Ever since the aborted Operation Hailstone in Derry 17th July 1971 it was said, the first Battalion had 'wanted to sweep through the 'no-go' areas of Derry,' CJ1.16

9.7.2.7 It could go anywhere in Belfast, it had now proved it could go anywhere in Derry. CJ1.16. Jackson was reported as saying, in the aftermath of Bloody Sunday that the battalion had 'made amends for the 17 July fiasco.' CJ1.16

Other regiments were referred to by members of the Regiment as 'crap-hats' because Para's sense of superiority and pride of their beret Day 297/144/8 to Day 297/144/15

9.7.2.8 Capt Mike Jackson was reported in the same interview as saying that the regimental policy had been 'to inflict casualties, never to receive them.' CJ1.16, CJ1.18

9.7.2.9 Certain senior officers could always be depended upon to defend the Paras when it was perceived that their reputation was under attack. According to General Sir Frank Kitson:

> "(e) From my perspective 1Para's overall reputation was a for a high level of efficiency and effectiveness. It was an experienced and professional battalion in which I had great confidence. It operated with a high degree of discipline and on several occasions I was impressed with the willingness of the battalion to take on difficult tasks at short notice... If some people in Northern Ireland associated 1Para with a reputation for toughness and brutality, I think they were mistaken." CK1.7 paragraph 2

9.7.3 How They Were Viewed By Others

9.7.3.1 There is a danger in creating elitism within forces, which are assigned to tackling the everyday complexities of a community at war. This perceived elitism concerning the Parachute Regiment was widely acknowledged by a wide variety of informed military sources. In the period before Bloody Sunday, the Parachute Regiment had confirmed its reputation as the military force that got results. In the aftermath of Internment, the security situation in Belfast was recognised by HQNI as being of primary importance.

9.7.3.2 The Paras were credited with ensuring that no nationalist area was closed to military control. Their achievement was extolled in the British media and by British Army public relations. In this regard, it is clear that, from the viewpoint of army command, it was an excellent tactic to enhance the reputation of the Paras as an elite, aggressive force that could sweep aside any opposition and go anywhere in Belfast. It meant that their very deployment would represent a deterrent to all who might contemplate resistance. General Ford's assessment was that "one platoon of 1 Para could do what one company of any other battalion could do in Belfast," B1208.003.015.

9.7.3.3 He credits one officer in particular with this achievement:

> "1Para would not be frightened. They had this tremendous confidence... 1Para had been deliberately trained by Frank Kitson to develop this reputation – as a stabiliser – in his brigade area. So that when things went wrong they came and were tough." B1208.003.016

It was this reasoning that led to the Paras being considered for deployment in Derry on 30 January 1972 following General Ford's visit.

9.7.3.4 According to Ford, their reputation was such that in Belfast the Paras 'only had to be there and everyone went to ground' B1208.003.019 In his interview with Des Hamill, General Ford claimed that he chose 1 Para for use in Derry because he 'had in mind that their reputation in Belfast must have spread to Londonderry.' B1208.003.015

9.7.3.5 He illustrates their effectiveness with an instance from Belfast, where, stuck in crossfire, he and his group were saved when 1 Para arrived, 'tumbled out of their vehicles, went down the street and everything stopped.' Moreover '(t)he terrorists were frightened of 1 Para.' B1208.003.015 In a contemporary document, Ford recorded:

> "For instance, the deployment of one platoon of 1Para will stop a large riot, because they are aware that in the past this unit has gone in fearlessly with its batons and, as always in Ireland, their effect has been exaggerated in the telling. Never was this more so than during the period 9-12 August when 1Para took down barricades on three successive nights..." B1155.020

9.7.3.6 In fact during the three days from 9th to 11th August 1971 between them 1Para and 2Para were responsible for shooting dead thirteen civilians in West Belfast. OS3.11 and OS7.61.

1Paras' reputation for brutality in Belfast was earned because of their involvement in a number of controversial incidents[26]. Incidents like these represented the realities for civilians unlucky enough to have the Paras deployed in their districts.

9.7.3.7 Emma Groves was blinded by a rubber bullet fired by a paratrooper following a relatively peaceful search of the Andersonstown area in Belfast in November 1971. A senior officer of the Northern Ireland Headquarters said after the incident that whatever the woman had been doing, (she had been playing republican songs in her home with the window open), she had got much more than she could have deserved L.007.

9.7.3.8 By the week prior to Bloody Sunday, stories concerning their reputation had made their way to the London broadsheet newspapers. In "The Guardian" 25th January 1972 Simon Hoggart wrote the following:

> "At least two British Army units in Belfast have made informal requests to Brigade headquarters for the Parachute Regiment to be kept out of their areas.
>
> "Senior officers in these units regard the paratroops tactics as too rough and on occasions brutal. One officer whose Commanding Officer has made a request to headquarters said: 'The paratroops undid in ten minutes the community relations which it had taken us four weeks to build up'.... Undoubtedly the regiment is the one most hated by Catholics in troubled areas where among local people, at any rate, it has a reputation for unnecessary brutality. More strikingly, however, many officers in other regiments in the city are now prepared to voice their own considerable doubts about the paratroops' role. A captain in one regiment, whose Commanding Officer has not made a request said 'they are frankly disliked by many officers here, who regard some of their men as little better than thugs. I have seen them arrive on the scene, thump up a few people who might be doing nothing more than shouting and jeering and roar off again, he said. They seem to think that they can get away with whatever they like. The captain added that the paratroops were undoubtedly one of the finest fighting units in the Army and that in many situations their training and expertise were invaluable. But wading into people as if this were jungle warfare simply is not on in Belfast' he said." L7

9.7.3.9 Lieutenant Colonels Ferguson, Steele and R L Jackson of 8 Brigade all acknowledge the tough reputation of the Parachute Regiment at B1122.10 paragraph 52, B1315.004 paragraph 18 and C1347.8 paragraph 37 respectively.

In reality these were front line combat troops trained to display an aggression and firmness more consistent with traditional concepts of warfare rather than the patient and tolerant approach required upon the occasion of a civil disturbance.

Just a week before Bloody Sunday, 1Para consolidated their reputation for tough tactics by attacking marchers on Magilligan Strand. Daniel McGuiness recalled on first seeing them, reflecting that it was an odd use of such tough troops trained for war situations:

> "When I actually saw the paratroopers in action at Magilligan, my opinion of what was happening in Northern Ireland changed dramatically. I saw the paratroopers shooting rubber bullets into the crowd and using their batons to beat civilians. One incident in particular shocked me. I saw a young man throw all caution to the wind and leap on to the back of a paratrooper to prevent him batoning another marcher. I saw the paratrooper turn around and lift his rubber bullet gun and discharge it. I saw the discharge of the shot coming out under the flap of the young man's jacket. If the discharge had gone off in the young man's stomach, he would surely have killed him at such close range. Immediately afterwards, I saw that soldier's superior give him a blistering reprimand and striking him with a baton.
> "Seeing the paratroopers deployed for such vigorous crowd control did not to me reflect the actions of a civilised regime. I began to question the way that London was handling the Irish situation. I now realised that the news coverage I had heard did not give a full story of what was going on. I began to think that there was some justice in the course of action taken by the nationalists." AM277.1 paragraphs 4 to 6

9.7.3.10 Nigel Wage, a reporter for the Daily Telegraph, recalled how at Magilligan drove the marchers into the sea, fired baton rounds at very close range and how the Regiment's NCOs had to use riot sticks to control their own soldiers M79.13 paragraph 2.

A Lance Corporal from the Royal Green Jackets who had witnessed the Paras in action at Magilligan described them as thugs who were used as aggressive shock troops. C1231.4 paragraph 23.

In his evidence Lieutenant Colonel Roy Jackson is much more acute in his judgment of the reasons for deploying 1Para in Derry on Bloody Sunday. He immediately thought that it signalled a change of policy and that 'the citizens and hooligans of Londonderry would be greatly surprised if Belfast arrest procedures were carried out on them.' C1347.8 paragraph 37.

9.7.3.11 Not even the senior officers in 8 Brigade in Derry however could predict just how much of an impact they were to make.

General Jackson

General Mike Jackson said, during an interview with Mr Moynahan in 1972, that he "felt that the 1st Battalion had helped to ensure that there were no-go areas in Belfast, and that a certain contempt was felt for such areas existing elsewhere in the province." CJ1.15. When asked whether these were sentiments that he genuinely held on 4th February 1972, General Jackson answered:

A. Your second point there, yes. I mean, during internment Belfast became a pretty lawless place; there was widespread violence and disorder. At the end of about 10 to 14 days, as I recall, of fairly hectic operations, many of which 1 Para had taken part in as a battalion, that position had been changed. That is what that is getting at there.

Q. Is it also indicating that the method that was used by the Parachute Regiment to ensure the maximum protection for its soldiers was to seize the initiative in an aggressive and a positive way?

A. Yes, I think that is -- that is a fair statement, that where we had a problem, where we were given a task to restore order, that is what we intended to do. I think that is perfectly fair to say that.

Q. I think the next sentence really speaks for itself.

Day 318/57/20 to 318/59/6

Soldier J

Soldier J was returning from Cyprus the night before Bloody Sunday and was not therefore at any briefing given by Lieutenant 119. Nonetheless as with all of the soldiers in Anti-Tank Platoon who have given evidence he rejects the suggestion that soldiers from Anti-Tank Platoon were briefed to "get some kills" or the suggestion that they "this might be an occasion upon which 1 Para might be able to engage with the IRA and get some kills". Day 370/6/7 to Day 370/6/11

He claims that his current recollection was simply that they were there to police an illegal march at which trouble was expected. B289.002 paragraph 11 When questioned by Lord Gifford, Soldier J rejected the suggestion that his attitude in going to Derry was that he would like to get at the rioters and people in no-go areas, and deal with them as fully and strenuously as possible. Day 370/144/10 to Day 370/144/12

However, even in his statement to this Tribunal it is clear that when he went to Derry it was his view, and a view shared by his colleagues that the situation in Derry, was out of control:

"Bombings and shootings seemed to have become a nightly occurrence in Londonderry. Subsequently, just before Bloody Sunday, two policemen had been killed there. We had never been to Londonderry but we all saw the news reels on the television about it and wondered why it was going so badly there." B289.001 paragraph 6

His interview with Toby Harnden is more instructive about his approach of Soldier J and that of Anti-Tank Platoon both in terms of their attitude to the persons on the civil rights march and their expectations as to the operation in Derry.

"Q. "Soldier X, of the Support Company, said he had been told by officers that IRA activity was likely." Then there is the passage in quotes:

A. "We were briefed that it was an illegal march and that the civil rights movement had been completely infiltrated by Republican elements."

Q. Is that what you said and what you were briefed?

A I think so, sir, yes.

Q You are then recorded as saying:

a "Two policemen had been killed in Londonderry a few days earlier [we know that is true] and we were told that the IRA wanted to cause as much mayhem as possible; we were ready for the worst-case scenario."

A Is that what you told Mr Harnden and what you yourself were told?

Q I think so, sir, yes. Day 370/89/24 to Day 370/90/14

Unusually, Soldier J accepted, both that this was what he had said to Toby Harnden and that it was true. In our submission this lends support to the view that at the very minimum the soldiers of 1 Para were dangerously hyped-up when they arrived in Derry, that they substantially over-estimated the risk posed to them by unarmed Civil Rights marchers, and that this attitude was encouraged, rather than suppressed by their officers.

Soldier H

"I felt this was confirmation of our expectation that the IRA were prepared for us and that they had deployed their snipers around the Bogside. We knew we were going into a hostile environment and when the shot was fired at us we realised that the IRA had got their weapons out as soon as we had arrived. They didn't want us going in to the Bogside which had been their territory for two years. However, they were used to dealing with les well-trained troops. Coming under fire like that would get you keyed up." B262 paragraph 5

Dave Longstaff

"You knew that if a riot started, someone would be waiting for you with a rifle." C23.2 paragraph 8

Re going to Derry "I do remember thinking that it was a whole new ball game for me because we were leaving our own territory which we knew well. I didn't know much about Londonderry but I had heard about it in the media, It sounded like a strange place for us outsiders but going into a strange place was a normal operational experience." C23.2 paragraph 11

A "I knew that the whole of Free Derry was a problem area; some sort of self-governing area. The army did not go in. It was a no go area. I did not know how or why it had been decided that the army did not go in. I was only a young private and did not bother about all that. I did what I was told, followed my NCO and looked after my mates. Sometimes we were not sure what was going on until we were out on an operation." C23.2 paragraph 12

"Some of the boys talked about it after the event, saying that the other regiments had not been able to do their job, that we pulled them out of a hole again and that we were only meant to be giving them a hand but we ended up sorting things out for them." B1891.004 paragraph 22

INQ 1581

A "One thing I do remember is there being a general feeling that everyone wanted to go into the no go areas of the Bogside to break them. I have a recollection of us having to wait where we were parked up for some time for permission to go in to be sought up the chain of command, I remember someone saying: "We've had to seek permission from PM", which I assumed meant the UK Prime Minister. As we did not end up going into the no go area, I presume no permission was ever received." C1581.2 paragraph 11

INQ 1237

"The first thing you look out for in a riot situation is the risk of gunmen. It was IRA practice to entice soldiers into a riot situation and then shoot them." C1237.2 paragraph 34

Re briefing or orders "If asked what I thought I was going to do my answer is that I assumed we were going to control the riot. I suppose the way we would do this was the way we had done it before – debus and react to the situation."

contd. "Methods depends on the type of riot it is. Sometimes we would run into a crowd of rioters and arrest the ringleaders, sometimes we would advance slowly towards a crowd using a Pig as cover. Basically we found that if you ran at a rioting crowd they tended to disperse. I don't specifically to arrest rioters." C1237.5 paragraph 36

"I do remember that Soldier 027 kept a daily diary while he was in the regiment to write his memoirs from. I can also add that we were aware that Londonderry was an IRA stronghold. We were aware that a "no go" area existed and the IRA openly patrolled with weapons. However, no areas were treated as "no go" by the paras. I think that is why we were sent there." C1237.12 paragraph 77

"4. "Being a resident battalion based in Belfast, we knew very little about Londonderry. We would have seen reports on the television news about street riots, barricades and shootings. We understood that one difference between Belfast and Londonderry was that, in Londonderry, the IRA were allowed to maintain barricades and create "no-go" areas within the City. That did not happen in Belfast where we were quickly sent in to remove any barricades that were set up. We thought it was diabolical that people could set up barricades and block off roads in a place like Londonderry, which was part of the UK."

"5. re briefing – going to "act as a back up force" and that "there was going to be rather a large march on the Sunday, led by Bernadette Devlin. I don't think we were told much more than that." Second briefing by the Platoon Commander "simply repeated what we had already been told by the Company Commander, but we were given an indication that further specific orders would be given when we arrived in Londonderry."

INQ 131

INQ 131, a Private in C Company of 1 Para, felt that the Paras had "smashed the no go areas and put the patrols back in." C131.6 paragraph 33

INQ 1093

INQ 1093, of C Company, 1 Para, stated: "There was no part of Belfast which was considered a "no go" area for the army. Occasionally an army unit would loose control but the area would only remain a no go area until 1 Para and the units on the ground arrived and helped. I was therefore unfamiliar with the situation in the Bogside in Londonderry at the time apart from what I heard from the media ie the news." C1093.1 paragraph 7

INQ 1544

INQ 1544 of Machinegun Platoon, 1 Para, states that he knew that there were no go areas in the city where the soldiers and the police tended to leave the civilians alone to get on with it rather than anyone doing anything about the situation and that the Rossville Flats were considered troublesome. C1544.1 to C1544.2 paragraph 7.

INQ 1574, a member of C Company, 1 Para, believes the following:

At that time, Londonderry was a no-go area. The military and the police were all in hideouts. The other regiments who were stationed in Londonderry obviously hadn't a clue how to handle the situation. We had helped out other regiments efore, so going to Londonderry to help out the troops there was not unusual. Had

Londonderry been our turf, anyone could have walked down the streets, It was they who declared the Bogside a no-go area; any amount of news footage shots them on the streets armed (they are the ones in balaclavas). C1574.2 paragraph 9

There had been a lot of posturing before 30 January. The Republicans had thrown down the gauntlet to the military, saying that if the military came to Londonderry that day, the streets would run red with the blood of the British army. It was they who had told the hard-liners to be there that Sunday as the City was theirs. We knew because we watched the TV and read newspapers where 75% of our intelligence was gathered which included names and areas. C1574.2 paragraph 10

I think the idea must have been for us to go to Londonderry to sort it out. Forces in Londonderry could not do the job but the bigwigs decided to put the dogs of war in Londonderry for the day. I do not know who decided this, as I only heard it as a rumour. The troops in Londonderry needed backup. Had the troops and the Police there done their job it would never have become a no-go. I believe we were there to break it, hardliners would have been a plus, but anyone who had half a brain knew after their publicity the march was no place to be if you were an upright citizen. They had let the lunatics take over the asylum. . . My understanding was that we would be ordered to move in to plug holes, if the forces there could not handle it. The soldiers on the ground in Londonderry would be reading the Yellow Card, instead of the situation. Most did not want to be there, whereas we would just do our job. C1574.2 paragraph 12

Sergeant O

Sergeant O objected to the No Go area in Derry Day 335/154/12 to Day 335/154/13 and he described how "generally, the men's view seemed to be that this [going to Derry on Bloody Sunday] was a chance to sort out the Londonderry hooligans, who we had all seen on TV." B575.108 paragraph 12

10. BACKGROUND TO BLOODY SUNDAY

10.1 Introduction and Summary of Submissions

10.1.1 The Civil Rights March, which took place in Derry in January 1972, took place against a background in which the use of lethal force by the security forces against unarmed civilians was becoming increasingly inevitable.

10.1.2 In our submissions the security background which laid the foundations for the use of lethal force by the security forces can be summarised as follows:

i) The military, although brought into Northern Ireland 'in support of the civil power' had, by January 1972, effectively supplanted the police as the dominant partner in all security operations.

ii) The military brought military training and military thinking to bear on policing issues. The Army's approach to policing was one in which notions of martial law rather than civil law were applied to law enforcement.

iii) Military thinking categorised those whom they policed, as the enemy, leading to an unnecessarily confrontational and inflexible approach to policing. Securing victory, rather than achieving public order was the primary objective.

iv) In particular, the military were quick to have recourse to the use of maximal force and were slow to consider alternatives.

v) Within both the military and political establishment there was a lack of respect for human life. The use of lethal force against unarmed civilians was an option considered and discussed with increasing frequency as a legitimate method of law enforcement.

vi) The military and political establishment also regarded certain categories of their citizens as enemies of the state, including; Nationalists, Civil Rights activists, the people of the Bogside and Creggan, and rioters. The use of lethal force against these people was increasingly perceived as not only legitimate, but necessary.

10.1.3 Against that background the timing of the Civil Rights march was of immense significance.

i) The ban on marches had just been renewed.

ii) NICRA had begun to organise a series of rallies and marches in opposition to Internment and in defiance of the ban.

iii) The renewal of the ban had met with significant opposition from Unionists and Loyalists.

iv) Unionists were particularly incensed by the apparent ability of NICRA to flout the ban with impunity and threatened that if the ban was not effectively policed they too would defy the ban.

v) Enforcement of the ban, in the context of an increasing willingness on the parts of both communities to defy the ban, placed a huge strain on the army's resources, thus the army had to be seen on 30 January 1972 to effectively police the ban on marches.

10.1.4 The location of the march however caused unique difficulties:

i) The Creggan and the Bogside in Derry were effectively No Go areas, although this was not officially acknowledged. In consequence a march in Derry would pass through the Bogside and the Creggan without meeting security force opposition. This would inevitably lead to the perception that the ban on marches was not being enforced.

ii) The pressure to be seen to enforce the ban, meant that at the point at which the security forces did come into contact with the marchers the military needed to be seen to take tough action.

iii) Meanwhile there was increasing dissatisfaction by the military at Headquarters Northern Ireland level with the continued existence of No Go areas, because they regarded them as a safe haven for the IRA.

iv) There was also an increasing trend, in the months after the introduction of Internment towards an intensification of military action, particularly in Derry.

v) By the time of the NICRA march, the military at Headquarters Northern Ireland had formed the view that the local security forces had effectively lost control of the situation in Derry.

vi) They had also come to the view that the problem of rioting in Derry had reached proportions which necessitated drastic action if they were not going to lose control of Derry city centre. The use of lethal force was perceived as the minimum force necessary to deal with the 'hooligan' problem.

10.1.5 The NICRA march in Derry risked exposing the military's inability to impose law and order in two key areas; the enforcement of the ban on marches and policing the No Go areas of the Bogside and the Creggan.

i) The march was thus seen as a test of the military's effectiveness and the military responded in a way designed to demonstrate their strength and to secure victory over the protestors.

ii) Headquarters Northern Ireland in particular saw the march as an opportunity to 'break the stalemate' in Derry, resulting in a change of tactics and policy in Derry which had as its ultimate consequence the killing of 13 unarmed civilians and the wounding of 14 more.

10.2 Subversion of the Role of the Police by the Military

Introduction

10.2.1 Crucial to an understanding of why lethal force was used by the security forces against unarmed civilians on the streets of Derry in January 1972 was the erosion of the role of the police in security matters and the illegal transfer of control over the policing of security situations from the police to the military.

10.2.2 Within military circles, both before and after Internment, there was clear dissatisfaction with the RUC and its ability to carry out its functions and maintain law and order within Northern Ireland. By the time of Internment the RUC had neither the manpower nor the resources to deal effectively with security issues and were in reality completely dependent upon the military. As former Superintendent McCullagh stated "the Army were . . . in charge of security at the time. The police actually could not do anything of a major nature without the full consent of the Army because we had neither the men nor the equipment." Day 232/137/18 to Day 232/137/22 [1]

10.2.3 Since the army had been sent to Northern Ireland in August 1969, there had been confusion as to the precise relationship and demarcation of roles and responsibilities as between the military and the police. The army were brought in to support the civil power, however, their status relative to the RUC was never clarified.

> "The problem with Northern Ireland at the time was that political affairs were directed by the Northern Ireland Government, the GOC having to deal with the Prime Minister to whom the RUC reports. The army came under the Prime Minister in London, to whom the CGS reports. Operations were directed from Belfast/Lisburn. Resources were controlled from London. The CGS acted as intermediary. The situation was not resolved until after direct rule. The confusion in Northern Ireland was that you had a situation where the army had been sent in, although it was not clear how they fitted into the picture and who they were properly subordinate to." Sir David Ramsbotham, KR2.2 paragraph 7

10.2.4 Certainly the military view, as articulated by General Ford, was that "if law and order was effectively to be maintained the main burden of this would be taken by the Army as the morale of most members of the RUC was low. . . I was supported by General Tuzo in this assessment. This added to the difficulties of maintaining law and order." B1208.021 paragraph 2.12

[1] In his Eversheds statement former Superintendent McCullagh stated: "there was very little we could do in terms of public order if the army did not agree with us." JM17.2 paragraph 5

10.2.5 On the 4 October 1971 in an Appreciation of the Security Situation prepared for the British Prime Minister by the Chief of General Staff, General Carver put the matter in the following terms:

> "There remains the problem of the RUC. The general state of police morale is very low, and the Force is under strength. There is some confusion of aim, a lack of will and leadership . . . and a tendency to rely too much on the Army. Its attitude is passive and its contribution to the security situation is minimal. . . Meanwhile the Army must continue to bear the brunt of the security burden until the RUC can play a more effective part, which may not be for some years." [Emphasis added] G14B.86.11 paragraph 9

10.2.6 The paper concluded that the military's current low intensity policy should be maintained while removing "those restrictions on the operations GOC Northern Ireland wishes to carry out" G14B.86.15

10.2.7 Following that paper, on the 15 October 1971, General Ford issued an Internal Security Instruction, which as he acknowledged, in an interview with Desmond Hamill in 1984, provided for the police to become "for all practical purposes, under command of the Army." B1208.3.6 According to General Ford "the deterioration in . . . the condition of . . . many of the senior police officers . . . [meant that] in certain cases we certainly had to take over command." Day 258/82/19 to Day 258/82/23[2]

10.2.8 Internal Security Instruction 1/71 prepared by General Ford was approved by the GOC and the Chief Constable and General Ford's evidence is that it also had the approval of Stormont and Whitehall Day 258/81/24 to Day

[2] General Ford in the course of his evidence made much of the fact that he had given this interview on very short notice and without the benefit of documents. He did not however suggest that: the interviewer had inaccurately reported his comments; or, that he had been dishonest with the interviewer. Moreover when questioned he accepted that many of the views recorded in the interview reflect the views he held at the time and still holds. It is our submission that the interview was a frank account of General Ford's time in Northern Ireland, albeit 12 years after the event and significant weight should be attached to the interview notes as an accurate reflection of his views.

258/82/2. In view of its timing it seems likely that the Internal Security Instruction was designed to implement the recommendations made by General Carver to the Prime Minister of the 4 October 1971 and accordingly had, as a policy, received the approval of Whitehall.

10.2.9 The Instruction states under the heading Security Operations that:

> "The General Officer Commanding NORTHERN IRELAND is the Director of Operations in NORTHERN IRELAND. As such, he is responsible for the control, tasks and deployment of all security forces in NORTHERN IRELAND. The control and tasking of the RUC is vested in the Chief Constable, although variations may be made when the situation dictates that the RUC come under the direct command of a military commander in certain areas." [Emphasis added] G20.142 paragraph 5a

10.2.10 In his interview with Desmond Hamill General Ford acknowledged that the situation whereby the RUC became, for all practical purposes, under command of the Army was "absolutely wrong. The Army should never have been in charge. Never. But unless it was there would not have been any action taken at all. It was frightful but we really were in command - - not at internment, but afterwards." B1208.3.6

10.2.11 Thus by Bloody Sunday, while the police ostensibly retained operational control, and the army purported to act in support of the civil power and under the direction of the police, the reality was very different "because of the nature of the problem in Northern Ireland it had to operate, on occasions, the other way round. This was well-known in Whitehall and well-known at Stormont." Day 258/85/2 to Day 258/85/6

10.2.12 That the army had de facto control has been expressly acknowledged by the most senior police officer of the day to have given oral evidence to this Inquiry. Superintendent McCullagh in both his Eversheds statement and in oral testimony stated as follows:

"12. It should be noted that we never directed the army, we merely advised them as in effect they were acting as a police force." JM17.3 and during his oral testimony Superintendent McCullagh made it clear that "I think it should be said that the Army were in charge of all security arrangements in Northern Ireland at that time." Day 231/154/6 to Day 231/154/8

10.2.13 In reality the de facto control by the military was entirely illegal. The Chief Constable had no legal power or entitlement to delegate policing decisions to the military. Moreover in the absence of legislation neither Stormont nor Westminster had any such authority. This was in effect acknowledged by the Home Secretary at a meeting with senior military personnel in December 1971. At that meeting the GOC, General Tuzo described the difficulties with the RUC:

> "while it was not for the army to deal with such political questions as whether responsibility for security should be transferred from Westminster to Stormont, it might be helpful to provide a military assessment of the effect of such an action if it were to be contemplated. He had to say that the RUC high command was flabby and morale was low. . . . The Home Secretary said that any change of the kind discussed would involve legislation and would be seen as direct rule by a side door. It was then suggested that reversion to the position which existed between August and October 1969, in which the G.O.C. had operational control of the R.U.C. rather than mere responsibility for co-ordination, might go some way to meeting the need." G40.260

10.2.14 There was recognition within the military that while they had de facto control, there needed to be legal clarification of their position. General Carver in a Report made to the Secretary of State dated the 20 December 1971 suggested that "Law and order become the responsibility of Westminster. Until terrorism is finally eliminated, and in order to hasten its elimination, the GOC resumes full responsibility for the direction of all security operations, Army and Police designed to restore normal processes of law and order." KS3.160 paragraph 5a

10.2.15 General Carver proposed that "we [the MOD] appoint a Deputy Director of Operations (Police), who should be selected as a potential successor to the present Chief Constable . . . He could be a Major General, if no suitable English, Scottish or Welsh police officer is available for this post. He would be responsible to the GOC for security operations, but in all other respects be subordinate to the Chief Constable." KS3.161 paragraph 7a. Thus it was envisaged by General Carver that the Ministry of Defence would appoint the person designed to become the next Chief Constable in the RUC, subject to the proviso that he was not Irish. This proposal was further advanced by General Carver at the Ministry of Defence Northern Ireland Policy Group on the 22 December 1971. G44B.282.4 paragraph 2.

10.2.16 In the period following Internment, by means of the Internal Security Instruction and with the collaboration of the RUC, the military demanded, and obtained, dominance over the police in security matters achieving de facto control. Nonetheless General Carver's proposals demonstrate an acknowledgement that while the military had operational control, there was a question-mark over the legality of this position, something also recognised by the Home Secretary. The concerns about the legal status of the military in Northern Ireland, implicit in General Carver's proposals before Bloody Sunday, were articulated more clearly afterwards:

> "CGS also explained that there was a conflict as to the status of the soldiers taking part.
>
> (a) Were they acting on behalf of the civil power?
>
> (b) Were they acting in defence of the realm against the Queen's enemies?

(c) Were they acting in self-defence?

These legal questions are being examined this instant as a matter of urgency." KR2.7 paragraph 4

10.2.17 In our submission the confusion about the status of the military was deliberately obfuscated, with control vested in Westminster, albeit, both the military and Westminster were responsive to the concerns of Stormont and in particular the concerns of Brian Faulkner. The obfuscation of control enabled the military to take effective operational control of all security operations, while ostensibly acting in support of the civil power.

Military do not make good Police Officers

10.2.18 It is our primary submission that soldiers do not make good police officers.[3] A soldier's approach is premised on the notion that he is engaged in a military conflict, his method of dealing with the 'enemy' is confrontational and his training is to shoot to kill. In our submission the training and ethos of the military is such that their approach to the policing of civil disobedience created a significantly higher risk of the use of lethal force in circumstances where it was unjustified. As demonstrated by the following excerpt from the evidence of General Ford:

"Q. One of the questions in relation to soldiers is that soldiers are not policemen, they are soldiers; that is correct?

A. That is absolutely correct, yes.

Q. They are trained to kill?

A. They are.

Q. They are trained in terms that they enemy they will engage are likely to be in a warfare situation where there is no such thing as beyond maximum force, you are there to destroy, annihilate?

A. That is true." Day 258/42/13 to Day 258/42/23

10.2.19 The approach of police officers is in our submission vastly different, they are not engaged in a military conflict with an 'enemy', rather they are trained to serve their community in circumstances where the use of force, whether lethal or non-lethal, ought to be option of last resort. A police officer's "first duty is to co-operate with others maintaining 'the normal state of society'" his second duty is "without endangering normality, to enforce the law." Report of an Inquiry by the Right Honourable the Lord Scarman, OBE Day 231/124/18 to Day 231/125/2

10.2.20 As has been noted by Fionnuala Ní Aoláin, when dealing with the use of lethal force in public order contexts:

> "the systemic problem which arises from an examination of [deaths caused by the use of lethal force in public order situations] is the mundane and habitual recourse to the exercise of potentially lethal force as a means to control crowd situations to the exclusion of other, less severe, responses. . . .
> since 1969 the distinctive policing culture of Northern Ireland has been inexorably linked to the deployment of the British army to undertake regular policing duties. Notably, the regular army holds a disproportionately high responsibility for deaths by the use of lethal force since 1969 in public order situations. Of the 350 deaths by the use of lethal force under review here, the regular army holds causal responsibility for 240." The Politics of Force: Conflict Management and State Violence in Northern Ireland page 86-7

10.2.21 It is our further submission that in the specific context of Derry in 1972 the pre-eminence of the military over the police in the planning and control over the security operation at the NICRA march is crucial to an understanding of why unarmed civilians were killed. In Derry there was not merely a difference in approach between Chief Superintendent Lagan and General Ford there was also considerable personal hostility on the part of both General Tuzo and General Ford to Chief Superintendent Lagan, which led to the complete disregard of the experience and guidance of the local police. It is moreover our submission that this hostility was substantially informed by religious bigotry.

10.2.22 For the Civil Rights marchers marching against Internment on the 30 January 1972, the contrast between the approach of the police and the military to policing security situations, meant the difference between life and death.

Differences between Police and Army to the NICRA March

10.2.23 The Widgery Inquiry exposed the conflict in the approach of the police and army to the planning and control of the security operation for the policing of the NICRA march on the 30 January 1972, specifically with regard to the decision to stop the NICRA march at William Street. This topic will be addressed in the Section 12.2 below. In this section it is proposed to address what could be described as the cultural differences between the respective approaches of the police and the military to policing the security operation.

10.2.24 Our submissions on this issue can be summarised as follows:

i) The military approached the march and NICRA marchers in a confrontational manner. The military regarded the decision to march as a direct challenge to the security forces, and a challenge which had to be met and defeated at all costs. By way of contrast the approach of senior officers of the RUC in Derry was one where the primary objective was the maintenance of public order. While the law had to be enforced there were methods of enforcing the law which did not necessitate dealing with marchers in a confrontational manner.

ii) The approach of the military and the police in Derry to the problem of hooliganism was markedly different. The military, and in particular General Ford, equated unarmed teenage rioters with IRA gunmen and bombers and considered that the same military tactics could be applied to dealing with them. Senior officers in the RUC in Derry on the other hand appeared to understand and acknowledge that the problem of hooliganism was more complex given the socio-economic status of most rioters and the poverty of Derry city.

iii) The approach by the military and the police to the use of lethal force was also markedly different with senior police officers in Derry subscribing to the doctrine of minimum force. This is an issue which will be developed further in relation to the section addressing the prevailing culture within military and political establishment about the use of force in 1972.

Issue of Discretion in Policing Matters

10.2.24.1 The clearest contrast between the approach of the military and the police to the issue of policing relates to the exercise of police discretion in law enforcement.

10.2.24.2 The importance of the exercise of discretion as a tool in the enforcement of law and order and in particular in the context of public disorder was a topic addressed in "The Report of an Inquiry by the Right Honourable the Lord Scarman, OBE" November 1981 in the context of the Brixton riots. The Report states as follows:

> "Inevitably there will be situations in which the public interest requires [the police officer] to test the wisdom of law enforcement by its likely effect on public order. Law enforcement, involving as it must the possibility that force may have to be used, can cause acute friction and division in the community – particularly if the community is tense and the cause of the law breaker not without support.
> 4.58 The conflict which can arise between the duty of the police to maintain order and their duty to enforce the law, and the priority which must be given to the former, have long been recognised by the police themselves . . . The successful solution of the conflict lies first in the priority to be given in the last resort to the maintenance of public order, and secondly in the constant and common-sense exercise of police discretion. Indeed the exercise of discretion lies at the heart of the policing function. It is undeniable that there is only one law for all: and it is right that this should be so. But it is equally well-recognised that successful policing depends on the exercise of discretion and how the law is enforced. The good reputation of the police as a force depends upon the skill and judgment which policemen display in particular circumstances of the cases and incidents which they are required to handle. Discretion is the art of suiting action to particular circumstances. It is the policeman's daily task." Day 231/125/3 to Day 231/126/10

10.2.24.3 In the specific context of the NICRA march the police approach can perhaps be best encapsulated by the evidence of former Superintendent McCullagh when questioned about the meeting he attended between Brigadier MacLellan and Chief Superintendent Lagan as to whether "it was academic to ask whether the march should or should not be stopped" given the ban on marches:

"Oh no, it did not have to be stopped, oh no. The law had to be enforced, that was the tone of the meeting. The law had to be enforced. The manner in which it would be enforced was another matter." Day 231/142/5 to Day 231/142/16

10.2.24.4 By way of contrast it is our submission that the military saw the march as a challenge to the security forces, a challenge which had to be met and defeated, because otherwise the credibility of the Security Forces would be lost, which from a military perspective was the paramount concern. It was accepted by General Ford in evidence that "in military terms the march was seen as a direct confrontation to the capacity of the Army to actually enforce the ban." Day 259/3/13 to Day 259/3/16

10.2.24.5 It is our further submission that as suggested to General Ford, he believed that "this parade was to be stopped simply because it was your view that it was a challenge to the Security Forces, not because of any public order considerations; not because of any genuine policing considerations; that it was, quite simply a challenge which had to be met?" Day 259/3/24 to Day 259/7/6

10.2.24.6 In our submission the prevailing military analysis was that the motivation of the marchers was to challenge the security forces and contrary to General Ford's oral testimony[4] this is reflected in a number of contemporaneous military documents.

10.2.24.7 The Operation Order prepared by General Ford's ADC states:

> "The Catholics of the Bogside and Creggan areas of Londonderry are proposing to march illegally from their homes to Shipquay Place in the centre of Londonderry and hold a vast anti-internment rally/meeting. They want to succeed and thereby show the weaknesses of the Security Forces." G82A.521.001 paragraph 1a[5]

10.2.24.8 In his letter to General Ford, following the oral testimony of Chief Superintendent Lagan at the Widgery Inquiry, Brigadier MacLellan described as the main aim of the march

> "to demonstrate that it was impossible for Stormont to impose the ban in Londonderry . . ." G128.849 paragraph b

10.2.24.9 In a similar vein Col. Dalzell-Payne in his memorandum on marches stated that:

> "Our ability to impose the ban is tested now and will certainly be exposed on Sunday 30 Jan 72 when the Civil Rights Association plans to hold a massive anti-internment rally in Londonderry." G82.518 paragraph 11

---

[4] See Day 259/2/23 to Day 259/4/25 where General Ford appears to suggest that the Operations Order drafted by his ADC did not reflect his analysis.

[5] In his initial testimony in relation to this topic General Ford stated that he would not have seen the Operations Order prepared by his ADC document Day 259/5/15 to Day259/5/16 however when he was

10.2.24.10 It is our further submission that the military response to this perceived challenge was that decreed by General Ford "the marchers must be stopped at all costs." G82A.521.001 paragraph 1d The reason being that to do otherwise would be to damage the credibility of the Security Forces, something which General Ford regarded, albeit in a different context, as "the most important thing". Day 258/50/17 to Day 258/52/2 and Day 258/95/10 to Day 258/95/23

10.2.24.11 The military approach to policing the march was one where the idea of allowing the march to proceed could not be countenanced because from a military perspective to do so would be to fail in their "duty to restore law and order". The approach was inflexible allowing no room for the exercise of discretion or for exploring methods of law enforcement which did not result in complete victory over the marchers. The cross-examination of Chief Superintendent Lagan by MOD counsel Mr. Gibbens, exemplifies this approach:

> "Did it occur to you that by saying that the march should go through owing to these considerations, you were in fact saying that the ban against marches in Northern Ireland should only apply in parts where people are prepared peacefully to accept the ban, but shall not apply if they are going to defy it?" WT17.34A [6]

10.2.24.12 Significantly and in contrast to the police approach this was the case even where military personnel were aware that a confrontational approach on their part might result in either an increase in the numbers breaking the law or an increased risk of violence.

shown the distribution-list and the fact that the Order was addressed directly to him he accepted that "it is very likely he may have shown it to me."

[6] The suggestion that allowing the march to proceed to the Guildhall was an abdication of his responsibility to enforce law and order is a persistent theme of Mr. Gibbens cross-examination of Chief Superintendent Lagan. WT17.28A to 17.35G

10.2.24.13 Brigadier MacLellan had advised General Ford by way of a signal on 24 January 1972 that Chief Superintendent Lagan's assessment was that stopping the march would led to a "massive confrontation with Security Forces" which would "shatter such peace as is left in the city, create intense violence, and remove the last vestiges of moderate goodwill." G70A.441.01 There is no suggestion that the military did not accept his assessment of the probable consequences of stopping the march. It is moreover evident from the Operation Order prepared by Major Steele on the 10 January 1972 that Chief Superintendent Lagan's views about the likely impact of stopping the march were reflected in military thinking:

> "The strength of the march could be in proportion to our attitude to stopping it. If ignored the Association might muster 1000; if we stop the march dead in its tracks, and previously publicise this intention, we can expect 2-3000 marchers or more." G49.302

10.2.24.14 Similarly, in the context of the marching ban General Tuzo acknowledged when proposing in January 1972 that the military take a tougher approach to the ban on marches that, a consequence of the implementation of the firmer line was that "violence may be precipitated in an otherwise non-violent situation." G53.318 paragraph 5

10.2.24.15 These documents demonstrate a military mindset which, when it came to law enforcement, saw the priority as achieving military victory, the march was to be stopped not because of any public order considerations; not because of any genuine policing considerations; that it was, quite simply a challenge which had to be met?" Day 259/3/24 to Day 259/7/6 Reducing the numbers involved in breaking the law or reducing the numbers involved in violent confrontation with the Security Forces, was not the military priority, regardless of the risks of the use of force.

10.2.24.16 By way of contrast:

> "In policing terms . . . at all costs emits of too many serious probabilities or possibilities. I think what we should be searching for here – you know, in policing it is sometimes . . . necessary to appear to lose to win. You may lose a battle, but you have won the war, and the war here was for peace, total peace. It did not seem to me it was going to hurt anybody very, very much, although to allow that march to proceed anyway . . . but as far as stopping it was concerned, the cost, the cost was immense. I think history has shown it to be." Superintendent McCullagh Day 232/80/18 to Day 232/81/4

Hooliganism in Derry

10.2.24.17 There was also a clear distinction between the approach of the military and the police to the problem of hooliganism in Derry. By the time of Bloody Sunday the military were addressing the problem of dealing with unarmed teenage rioters as a threat commensurate with that of dealing with the IRA, an armed paramilitary organisation.

10.2.24.18 The military approach was most graphically illustrated in General Ford's memo to General Tuzo of the 10th January 1972 when he stated:

"the Londonderry situation is further complicated by one additional ingredient. This is the Derry Young Hooligans (DYH). Gangs of tough, teenaged youths permanently unemployed, have developed sophisticated tactics of brick and stone throwing, destruction and arson. Under cover of nearby buildings, they operate just beyond the hard core areas and extend the radius of anarchy by degrees into additional streets and areas. Against the DYH . . . the Army in Londonderry is for the moment virtually incapable. This incapacity undermines our ability to deal with the gunmen and bombers and threatens what is left of law and order on the West bank of the River Foyle." G48.300

10.2.24.19 General Ford's views were not unique. As far back as October 1971 on the direct request of the Prime Minister Mr. Heath, a paper was produced by the Chief of the General Staff to meet the "Prime Minister's wish for a full exploration of the scope for intensifying military action at whatever inconvenience to the civilian population". KS3.126

10.2.24.20 That military appreciation of the security situation, prepared by the General Staff at the British Prime Minister's behest identified tactics including "less restriction on the use of non-lethal devices . . . and firearms, to permit tougher action with a view to deterring riots and hooliganism." G14B.86.12 paragraph 18a

10.2.24.21 Significantly given the role of 1 Para on Bloody Sunday, General Ford's views are also mirrored by Col. Wilford the Commanding Officer of 1 Para. Col. Wilford described the rioters on Bloody Sunday to Deirdre Dean in the following terms:

> "[The March] was a great opportunity now, of course, to throw more stones and throw more lethal missiles at the soldiers, because it was a great opportunity and there were lots, lots more people there. And of course, that's exactly what happened, and there was a large core of – I won't call them hooligans, they were not hooligans; they were marshals, they were organised. It was like a mini army that had been organised to take on the troops at that corner" and they attacked the troops at the barrier . ." X1.35.21 – X1.35.22
> and in his Eversheds statement he stated
>
> "Through training and experience the soldiers were able to deal with large and extremely violent riots. . . . These crowds were very different from ordinary civil disturbances. The rioters in Northern Ireland used sophisticated tactics, operated in conjunction with gunmen and armed themselves with weapons that were designed to cause serious injury. Their objective was to attack, injure and kill members of the security forces." B1110.026, paragraph 51

10.2.24.22 Col. Wilford's conflation of the objectives of the rioters with the objectives of armed gunmen and bombers had implications for all marchers on Bloody Sunday, as is reflected in his Eversheds statement, when asked about whether his view was that all marchers were troublemakers. "In my view, they were all potential rioters." B1110.028 paragraph 60

10.2.24.23 In sharp contrast to the military conflation of unarmed rioters with gunmen and bombers, the approach of the RUC in Derry to the problem of hooliganism was quite different.

10.2.24.24 Primarily there was a recognition by the RUC in Derry that rioters were not the threat to the security forces "extending the radius of anarchy" that was perceived by the military. Senior RUC officers in Derry acknowledged that "there was more problems in the Bogside than stone-throwing". They also recognised that there were more ways of addressing the difficulties of hooliganism than outright confrontation.

> "hooliganism is not always dealt with which [sic] confrontation, sometimes it is obviously necessary to do so, but there are other ways. It is a social malaise and you have to deal with these things in a series of ways, social work, education, housing, employment, there are many things." Superintendent McCullagh Day 232/70/7 to Day 232/70/12

10.2.24.25 The elevation of the hooliganism problem to the status of a military problem requiring a military solution was one which resulted from the military's pre-eminence in security matters and which significantly contributed to the use of lethal force by members of the Parachute regiment on Bloody Sunday.

Minimum Force

10.2.24.26 Finally and crucially it is submitted that, at least among senior officers in Derry the prevailing culture was not one which regarded recourse to the use of lethal force against unarmed civilians as a legitimate option.[7]

10.2.24.27 The prevailing military and political culture is dealt with in more detail at 9.3 below, at this point we simply seek to demonstrate that the approach of senior officers of the RUC in Derry to the policing of the NICRA march was informed by the philosophy that minimum force should be used in the policing of the situation. A fact reflected in Superintendent McCullagh's evidence to this Inquiry where he states that:

> "The force that you use at any time should be proportionate and appropriate to the task you are faced with. I do not think that the use of deadly force is appropriate in those circumstances.[the problem of stone-throwing and rioting]" Day 232/75/5 to Day 232/75/12

10.2.24.28 It is our submission that this outlook, markedly different from the approach of the military, was also reflected in the strategies used by the RUC in Derry prior to Bloody Sunday, in dealing with armed opposition from the IRA:

> "I remember Mr. Lagan's stratagem in that respect. He felt the longer the police – previous to that we have been unarmed. Armed activity is beginning to take place and Mr. Lagan hoped that by not responding in kind and keeping guns away from his officers. And hoping that that itself would be taken as an example of – or an intention of goodwill on the part of the police" Superintendent McCullagh Day 232/86/2 to Day 232/86/15

10.2.24.29 This approach contrasts sharply with the approach of the military, which involved recourse to maximal force even where dealing with unarmed

[7] This submission is made subject to the proviso that members of the RUC had been involved in the unlawful assault of Samuel Devenney in April 1969 resulting in his death, which led the Chief Constable of the RUC to criticise the "conspiracy of silence" within his own force. Nonetheless that behaviour does not appear to be reflected in the policing philosophy outlined by Superintendent McCullagh and Chief Superintendent Lagan.

civilians. The approach is exemplified in General Ford's paper where he regards the situation in Derry as one in where he was "coming to the conclusion that the minimum force necessary to achieve a restoration of law and order is to shoot selected ring leaders amongst the DYH, after clear warnings had been issued." G48.300 paragraph 6 Although it will be seen in the section below that General Ford's views were by no means those of a maverick within either the military or political establishment.

10.2.24.30 It is noteworthy in this respect that "the regular army holds a disproportionately high responsibility for deaths by the use of lethal force since 1969 in public order situations."[8] Of 350 deaths caused in public order situations by the use of lethal force, the regular army is responsible for 240.

10.3 Military and Political Culture

August 1971 – December 1971

10.3.1 It is our submission that the prevailing culture within the military and within Westminster and Stormont, created the environment within which soldiers felt able to use lethal force against unarmed civilians. It was:

i) A culture within which those involved in civil disobedience were regarded as the enemies of the State and against whom lethal force was regarded as a legitimate tactic; and,

ii) A culture within which there was no respect for the rule of law as it applied to the people of Northern Ireland. In this respect we refer the Tribunal to our detailed submissions on this issue at Section 7.11

Lethal Force against Unarmed Civilians

[8] Fionnuala Ni Aoláin , 'The Politics of Force: Conflict Management and State Violence in Northern Ireland', page 87

10.3.2 Internment had been introduced by Westminster under pressure from Stormont with the objective of improving the security situation in circumstances where the military did not regard it as the best method of defeating the IRA. It had been made clear by Edward Heath that "if internment was tried and did not succeed in improving matters, the only further option could be direct rule." G5.51 paragraph 2

10.3.3 In fact the security situation deteriorated following the introduction of Internment, and in the months that followed both the military and the Westminster Government were engaged in a process of seeking to improve the security situation in ways which would not necessitate the imposition of direct rule.

10.3.4 Over the period August 1971 until December 1971 there was in consequence extensive debate within the military and political establishments about ways of improving the security situation. It will be our submission that within the British army and the Westminster establishment in 1971-1972 the prevailing culture was one where, in the context of Northern Ireland, there was a willingness to countenance operations and measures in which the use of lethal force against unarmed civilians was possible. It was moreover the case that as those unarmed civilians passed from the category of Nationalist, to civil rights protestor to hooligan the threat of the use of unlawful lethal force by state agents increased. It was within this context that lethal force was used by 1 Para against unarmed marchers from the Bogside and Creggan.

10.3.5 In our submission a number of documents, produced over the relevant period, illustrate a view within the political and military establishments that:

i) large sections of the Catholic community, with particular emphasis on: residents of the Bogside and Creggan; NICRA members and its supporters; and; rioters, were regarded as enemies of the state; and,

ii) there was an increasing willingness on the part of the military and political establishment to contemplate the use of lethal force as a means of improving the security situation.

A Military Appreciation of the Security situation in Northern Ireland

10.3.6 In October 1971 at the behest of the Prime Minister, a paper was produced by the Chief of the General Staff to meet the "Prime Minister's wish for a full exploration of the scope for intensifying military action at whatever inconvenience to the civilian population". KS3.126 This reflects the evidence of Sir Arthur Hockaday that by October 1971 there was a sense of frustration in Westminster with the deteriorating security situation[9] and that consideration was being given to getting tougher in Northern Ireland.[10] The involvement of the Prime Minister illustrates that this view was held at the highest level of Government.

10.3.7 The military appreciation of the security situation prepared for the Prime Minister identifies tactics including "less restriction on the use of non-lethal devices . . . and firearms, to permit tougher action with a view to deterring riots and hooliganism." G14B.86.12 paragraph 18a The paper also contemplates, in the context of border areas closing the border with a view to mobile patrols shooting "intruders".

10.3.8 The paper concludes that the current low intensity policy should be maintained while removing "those restrictions on the operations GOC Northern Ireland wishes to carry out". G14B.86.15 The paper evidences a view among senior politicians within Westminster and senior military figures that in order to resolve the security situation consideration must be given to more repressive measures for policing Northern Ireland. More repressive that is than the introduction of detention without trial and the inhuman and degrading treatment of detainees. One of the tactics under consideration was the use of lethal force against unarmed civilians. Meanwhile despite the protestations of all the Westminster politicians and senior civil servants who have given evidence to this Inquiry there is no contemporaneous documentary evidence to suggest that anyone within the political or military establishment regarded the tactic of shooting unarmed civilians as unconscionable.

CLF Directive for Future Security Operations

10.3.9 Arising directly from the Prime Minister's request General Ford produced a Directive for Internal Security Operations. General Ford acknowledged in the course of his evidence that this operational directive "represented in effect a deliberate change of gear . . . in relation to the new instructions which had come down from above." Day 253/35/6 to Day 253/35/15

10.3.10 Significantly the Conclusion of the Directive states that "We should not hesitate to fire whenever events demand and the law permits." G23.167 paragraph 15 Thus a senior officer in charge of operational matters in Northern Ireland produced a Directive which suggests that soldiers have shown a reluctance for the use lethal force in the past and such reluctance should not be shown in the future. Albeit the sentence is qualified by the suggestion that there should be no use of lethal force outside the law.

10.3.11 When questioned by Christopher Clarke QC about why he felt it necessary or desirable to tell people that they should not hesitate to fire whenever events demand and the law permits, General Ford was unable to explain why he wrote it. Day 253/35/19 to Day 253/36/19 However in his interview with Desmond Hamill in 1984 he stated as follows:

> "There were constraints not just of the Yellow Card, but of using minimum force compatible with the task. Any form of over-reaction was immediately seized by the media – even if it was only an over-reaction in one corner of what was going on. . . . So the soldiers on the ground very often operated below the level they could have done and be justified within the law." B1208.003.012

[10] KH9.76 paragraph 34

10.3.12 General Ford clearly formed the view that soldiers needed to be encouraged to use lethal force. This, on the 14 December 1971, by which time a significant number of civilians had been killed by the army in disputed circumstances since the introduction of Internment, and on the same day as Martin McShane a 16 year old Catholic was shot and killed by soldiers in Coalisland.[11]

10.3.13 The views communicated by General Ford to Desmond Hamill are a clear demonstration of a culture or mindset which advocated the use of lethal force as a military necessity rather than an option of last resort, despite the fact that the army's role was that of policing a civilian population and acting in support of the civil power. It is moreover a direct response to the Prime Minister's request "for a full exploration of the scope for intensifying military action at whatever inconvenience to the civilian population". KS3.126

10.3.14 What is evident is that it was not part of General Ford's "mental furniture" that "the amount of force should be the minimum necessary and should not be disproportionate to the offences being committed. In particular, firearms should be regarded as very much a last resort". KH9.98 paragraph 111

Visit of Home Secretary – December 1971

10.3.15 The Home Secretary paid a visit to HQNI in December 1971. In preparation for the visit General Ford prepared a paper advising the Home Secretary of the general operational situation. The assessment at the conclusion of the paper was that "overall the position is good with the one exception of Derry and here a major decision will have to be taken shortly." B1155.019

[11] Lost Lives p.131-132

10.3.16 At that meeting General Tuzo, the GOC, advised the Home Secretary that the situation in Derry had reached a point where a choice had to be made "between accepting that Creggan and Bogside were areas where the army were not able to go, except on specific information, or to mount a major operation, which would take ten days and require seven battalions and which would involve, at some stage, shooting at unarmed civilians." G40.261

10.3.17 General Tuzo's suggestion that an operation in Derry would at some stage involve shooting at unarmed civilians, flows from General Ford's analysis that a major decision would have to be taken shortly. It is a clear demonstration of the extent to which the views of General Ford and General Tuzo coalesced on the approach to be taken to the security situation in general and in Derry in particular.

10.3.18 There is no suggestion, anywhere in the minute that either Mr. Maudling, or any of the senior officers involved in briefing the Home Secretary balked at the suggestion that shooting of unarmed civilians.

10.3.19 At least one witness who gave evidence to this Inquiry has suggested that the wording of these minutes, where the GOC suggests the shooting at unarmed civilians as an option, are inaccurate.[12] However no witness has been able to demonstrate a single document, or refer to a single meeting at which senior politicians within Westminster or senior military figures made it clear that the shooting of unarmed civilians was not an option which could be contemplated.

10.3.20 While the military preference in December 1971 was for maintaining the current low key military approach, the military were clearly alerting their political masters to the fact that such a course would inevitably entail accepting criticism of allowing "No Go" areas which was an issue of particular concern for Stormont and the Unionist community. Even prior to the introduction of Internment in July 1971 General Tuzo had experienced heavy criticism at the Joint Security Committee in respect of the "Army's apparent reluctance to move in and "mop up" militant elements in the Bogside area of Londonderry". G2.20

10.3.21 Again the document demonstrates that the use of lethal force against unarmed civilians was considered a legitimate military strategy for discussion, albeit under certain conditions.

CLF Appreciation on Future Military Policy for Londonderry

10.3.22 Also on the 14 December 1971 General Ford prepared a paper on future military policy for Derry which discussed the options open to the military in light of the failure of the policy of containment then in operation. The three options aimed at establishing control and stability considered were:

"a. Course 1. To revert to the previous policy of containment of the Creggan and Bogside from their periphery but adopt a much more offensive attitude than in previous months.

b. Course 2. To continue the present policy of undertaking major operations within the Creggan and Bogside but without providing a permanent presence in those areas.

c. Course 3. To establish, on a permanent basis, a full scale military presence in the Creggan and Bogside." G41.265 paragraph 9

10.3.23 Both Courses 2 and 3 entailed an acknowledged risk of the shooting of unarmed civilians. One of the disadvantages identified by General Ford to Course 2 was that "the use of ball ammunition becomes more likely, particularly when units of platoon strength are assaulted by organised mobs numbered in hundreds. This in turn raises the question of opening fire on "unarmed" mobs, whose strength lies not in firepower, but in numbers and brick power." [Emphasis added] G41.268 paragraph 15b While if Course 3 was adopted the "risk of casualties is high and apart from gunmen and bombers, so called unarmed rioters, possibly teenagers, are certain to be shoot in the initial phase. Much will be made of the invasion of Derry and the slaughter of the innocent." G41.270 paragraph 18c The references to " "unarmed" mobs" and "so called unarmed rioters" are clear examples of a mindset within the military which categorised unarmed rioters as a military problem of the same magnitude as gunmen and bombers and necessitating the same military solution.

10.3.24 By December 1971 therefore the military envisaged and had communicated to politicians in Westminster that the undertaking of major military operations within the Creggan and Bogside entailed a risk of opening fire on unarmed civilians, with teenage rioters identified as those most at risk of being the victims of the use of lethal force.

10.3.25 While Courses 2 and 3 were rejected at that point in time, it is noteworthy that the rationale behind their rejection was not the fact that in a western democracy the shooting of unarmed civilians, albeit engaged in unlawful activity, was unconscionable. Course 2 was rejected because there was little "military value" in continuing a policy which did not lead to the restoration of law and order while arousing antagonism within the Nationalist community and it therefore served no useful military purpose unless the implementation of Course 3 was imminent. G41.272 paragraph 22 Course 3, regarded as the "correct military solution to the problem", was rejected because of the public relations implications and the lack of sufficient manpower within Northern Ireland to implement this option. G41.271 paragraph 20 and G41.272 paragraph 24 That the lack of military resources was the primary motivating factor for the rejection of Course 3 is supported by the evidence given to this Inquiry by Sir Arthur Hockaday who stated that:

> "my general impression, reinforced by papers that I have seen in recent weeks is that the re-establishment of a permanent military presence, which in some ways a desirable objective, would involve the importation into Northern Ireland of such extensive military reinforcements that, given the general overstretch on the Army, it probably was not on." Day 271/8/4 to Day 271/8/10

10.3.26 Eventually General Ford recommends Course 1½ (to distinguish it from the "defensive and defeatist" course adopted in August 1972, G41.272 paragraph 24) at least until such time as there is a cessation of hostilities elsewhere in Northern Ireland and at the price of "a community of some 33,000 citizens of the UK . . . in a state of anarchy and revolt." G41.272 paragraph 23 Again the Nationalist community of the Bogside and the Creggan are depicted as 'enemies of the State'.

10.3.27 In the period after Internment and up until December 1971, the debate about the enforcement of law and order in Derry had been removed entirely from the remit of the police or the civil power. Security initiatives and policy development lay in the hands of the military under the supervision of Westminster. While the use of a shoot to kill policy against unarmed civilians was not adopted during this period, it was regarded as a legitimate tactic for discussion and consideration within senior military or political circles. At no stage was the use of lethal force against unarmed civilians rejected as a legitimate tactic whether for legal or moral reasons. It is certainly not the case, as Sir Arthur Hockaday stated in the course of his evidence that the prevailing culture was one of "respect for the law and the doctrine of minimum force." Day 271/23/24 to Day 271/24/2 and KH9.97 to KH9.98 paragraph 111

January 1972

10.3.28 In the months preceding Bloody Sunday the use of a shoot to kill policy against unarmed civilians, although a legitimate tactic for discussion and consideration, was expressly rejected. It is submitted that by January 1972 there had been a seismic change in both the tone and content of the discussion about lethal force, and specifically:

i) There was a build-up in the frequency with which a shoot to kill policy was discussed;

ii) There was an increasing intolerance, both for those categorised by Brian Faulkner as "civil disobedients" (G81.510) and of rioters; and,

iii) The manner in which the use of lethal force was discussed had shifted from its use as a possible tactic which was ultimately rejected, to a military tactic necessary to enforce law and order.

10.3.29 In the weeks prior to Bloody Sunday there are 4 documents which to varying degrees illustrate this shift and demonstrate both a hardening of attitudes with respect to Nationalists who break the law and an increasing willingness to contemplate the use of lethal force.

i) On the 10 January General Ford's memo to General Tuzo stated that "the minimum force necessary to achieve a restoration of law and order is to shoot selected ring leaders, among the DYH, after clear warnings have been issued." (G48.299)

ii) On the 24 January, General Tuzo described an increasing hostility by all Catholics to the military and conflated those involved in NICRA and the civil rights movement with an armed paramilitary organisation. He advised the Chief of Defence Staff that hostility towards the Army on the part of Catholics was being "encouraged particularly by some Roman Catholic priests and behind it all stands NICRA, the active ally of the IRA." (G70.437 paragraph 2a)

iii) On the 27 January, the Joint Security Committee were advised of and accepted that the NICRA march in Derry might develop into a "shooting war". G76.465 paragraph 4

iv) Also on the 27 January, Col. Dalzell-Payne, the head of MO4 drafted a memorandum on Marches and which stated that in order to impose the ban on marches it was necessary to consider additional measures for the physical control of "crowds which threaten to march". He went on to acknowledge that the "only additional measure left for physical control is the use of firearms i.e. "Disperse or we fire". Inevitably it would not be gunmen who would be killed but "innocent members of the crowd." G82.519 paragraphs 14 to 15

10.3.30 These documents, demonstrate not merely a significant shift in favour of the use of lethal force but do so in a context where there is a focus on:

Derry; the ban on marches; and the difficulties in policing rioting, a focus, which in our submission resulted in a significant shift in military policy applied in Derry addressed at Section 9.5 below.

Ford-Tuzo Memo

10.3.31 This memorandum is important in terms of the prevailing military culture in two respects: firstly, because of the assertion that the use of lethal force against unarmed rioters was the minimum force necessary to enforce law and order; and, secondly because of the equation of, not only hooligans, but the people of the Bogside and the Creggan, with armed gunmen.

10.3.32 A large number of senior military and political figures have sought to downplay the significance of this memo, giving evidence to the effect that they had not read the memo and were unaware of its contents, and that its views were not endorsed within Whitehall or Westminster. It is our submission that the memo represented a significant shift in thinking with respect to the use of lethal force and that its significance cannot be under-estimated. The memo was exchanged between the two most senior military officers in Northern Ireland, who worked together extremely closely, and had operational control over all security operations in Northern Ireland. Moreover, the views were obviously receiving serious consideration on the part of General Tuzo as evidenced by the record of the meeting of the Joint Security Committee on the 13 January, just 3 days after the memo was sent. The minute records General Tuzo as having indicated that "following a meeting with businessmen in Londonderry[13] certain measures were in mind with a view to putting down the troublesome hooligan element there. It was a very difficult problem to solve within the law." G52.316 paragraph 2

10.3.33 It also mirrors the Dalzell-Payne paper on marches, dealt with in more detail below, which demonstrates that General Ford was not a maverick within the military establishment in 1972.

[13] The meeting attended by General Ford on the 7 January 1972 which gave rise to the memo.

10.3.34 General Ford sought to downplay the significance of his proposal that the minimum force necessary to enforce law and order involved the shooting to kill of unarmed teenage rioters, giving evidence that .22 ammunition was "marginally lethal" and that he "saw the weapon being used to incapacitate and cause less casualties". Day 253/55/11 to Day 253/55/14 and Day 253/56/2 to Day 253/56/8

10.3.35 In our submission the suggestion by General Ford that by modifying SLR rifles for the use of .22 rounds, the proposal did not amount to a proposal to shoot to kill unarmed rioters, was patently dishonest.[14] The reason for the proposed modification of the SLR rifle was because it was "less lethal in terms of producing collateral death to unintended targets."[15] However as General Ford eventually accepted, "a high velocity .22 bullet shot to kill, which soldiers are trained to do, if it hits where it is intended to hit will kill the person concerned." Day 258/49/13 to Day 258/49/17

10.3.36 This interpretation is also consistent with a reading of the memo which acknowledges that if General Ford's proposal was implemented "we would be reverting to the methods of IS found successful on many other occasions overseas". G48.301 paragraph 7 Those methods were described by General Kitson in the course of his evidence:

> "it was the general system for dealing with riots up to a certain time. . . in the colonies they would say "over now to the military Commander" and a banner would be extended in whatever language you were in, saying "disperse or we fire" and then a fellow would say to one of the riflemen "you see that man dancing round out there, fire one round and hit him", and then there would be pictures taken. That was all the formal system of internal security and duties in aid of the civil [14] Day 253/55/11 to Day 253/57/17 When questioned by Christopher Clarke QC about the adoption of SLR rifles for the use of .22 rifles General Ford refused to accept that it was still a lethal weapon for the intended target, persisting in using the term "marginally lethal" a term he was unable to explain.

power that had at one time existed." Day 237/12/7 to Day 237/13/10

As is clear from General Kitson's description, the IS methods, found successful overseas, involved the use of lethal force against unarmed civilians, which had as its clear objective, killing, and not incapacitation of, the intended target.

10.3.37 Moreover, General Ford appears to expressly acknowledge that, what was envisaged, was a lethal weapon in a paper he prepared for the MOD in the aftermath of Bloody Sunday.

> "I had prepared a paper on this subject in the preceding week. . . . The paper was based on the assumption that there was a gap in our armoury which could only be met with a lethal weapon; and that it would be necessary to revert to the hard concept used in other counter-insurgency campaigns of warning ring leaders that they would be shot if it was necessary doing so." G121.805

10.3.38 General Ford also sought to minimise the importance of the memo by suggesting that it was only a preliminary document which would have necessitated: discussion papers; more detailed consideration within the MOD; and an amendment of the Yellow Card before it could have been adopted.[16]

10.3.39 In our submission this is contradicted by the evidence before this Tribunal. The wording of the memo describes the use of lethal force against the rioters as "the minimum force necessary", suggesting in effect, that such a course would be lawful under the doctrine of minimum force. Moreover under questioning General Ford never accepted that the implementation of this proposal would be unlawful and went on to

[15] Day 258/47/5 to Day 258/49/20 This suggestion was not expressly accepted by General Ford, although it appears to follow from his concession to Lord Saville quoted at 9.3.35. Day 258/49/13 to Day 258/49/17

[16] Day 253/57/18 to Day 253/59/2 re need to change the Yellow Card and Day 253/60/14 to Day 253/60/17 "Are you saying that paragraph 6 was simply an idea, the details and confines of which would have been worked out later if it was to be put into effect? A. Absolutely. It is purely an idea, a first suggestion."

demonstrate circumstances where it would be lawful.[17] It is also the case, as the memo makes it clear and as has been confirmed by other evidence, that in taking steps to implement this suggestion, 30 modified SLRs were sent to Derry on or after the 10 January.

10.3.40 The memo is also significant because of the way in which it depicts hooligans, described in terms more consistent with the description of a guerrilla army than unarmed teenage rioters; as gangs who have "developed sophisticated tactics of brick and stone-throwing, destruction and arson. Under cover of snipers . . . they operate just beyond the hard core areas and extend the radius of anarchy by degrees into additional streets and areas. Against the DYH . . . the Army in Londonderry is for the moment virtually incapable. This incapacity undermines our ability to deal with the gunmen and bombers and threatens what is left of law and order on the West bank of the River Foyle." G48.300

10.3.41 This characterisation of the hooligan problem in January 1972 marks a shift in General Ford's analysis. In October 1971 the problem of rioting was described as a "fringe activity", albeit to be vigorously countered G23.166 paragraph 11a and while hooligans are identified as a problem in December 1971 G41.264 paragraph 6 it is not until January 1972 that they take on the significance accorded to them by this memorandum.

10.3.42 Of equal significance in terms of General Ford's perception of the people of Derry is his description of armed gunmen "dominating the Creggan and Bogside backed and protected by the vast majority of the population in these two areas." G48.300 This view, which is entirely consistent with the views previously expressed by General Ford[18] amounts to the characterisation of an entire community as 'enemies of the State' actively backing and providing support to persons engaged in armed insurrection.

[17] Day 253/57/20 to Day 253/60/13

Visit of Chief of Defence Staff

10.3.43 The minutes of this meeting are significant in that, at this meeting, General Tuzo expresses views which mirror those previously expressed by General Ford about the Catholic population of the Bogside and Creggan. The GOC when briefing the Chief of Defence Staff about the problem of hostility towards the army on the part of Catholics, described:

> "implacable and growing Roman Catholic hostility, not only to the Protestants but to the Army. This hostility is tending to spread upwards through the middle class, encouraged particularly by some Roman Catholic priests and behind it all stands NICRA, the active ally of the IRA." G70.437

10.3.44 This demonstrates that General Ford's views were mirrored to a large extent by General Tuzo, and that as General Ford himself put it "we were in each other's minds totally." Day 253/31/15 to Day 253/31/23

10.3.45 It is a further demonstration of a culture within the military which categorised the NICRA march in Derry and those participating in it as enemies of the State.

JSC Meeting

10.3.46 On the 27 January, at the meeting of the Joint Security Committee which approved the military plan to stop the march, it was noted that the "operation might well develop into rioting and even a shooting war". G76.465 paragraph 4

10.3.47 According to Sir David Ramsbotham:

i) General Carver was aware of the risk and "everyone knew it was a risk", and Day 254/191/18 to Day 254/193/17

ii) He was "quite certain that General Carver would have alerted the Prime Minister as to the possibility. He certainly alerted the

[18] See for example G41.263 paragraph 3 where General Ford describes the security forces as facing "an entirely hostile Catholic population" and at G41.272 paragraph 23 "a community of some 33,000 citizens of the UK . . . in a state of anarchy and revolt."

Secretary of State for Defence". Day 254/193/18 to Day 254/194/18

10.3.48 While, unlike the other documents referred to, the minute does not advocate the use of lethal force. There is no questioning, at JSC level, or in Westminster, of a military strategy which poses the risk of a shooting war, in circumstances where thousands of unarmed civilians were going to be on the streets of Derry. No consideration is apparently given to the question of whether an alternative military strategy would pose less risk of a 'shooting war' and no consideration is given to taking steps to minimise the risk to civilian life.

10.3.49 It is submitted that the document is consistent with the culture evidenced by the other documents referred to, in which military and political priorities take precedence over safeguarding human life.

Col. Dalzell-Payne Paper

10.3.50 Col. Dalzell-Payne was Colonel with responsibility for Military Operations Branch 4 in the MOD, (MO4) working on the General Staff. MO4 had responsibility for co-ordinating MOD policy in Northern Ireland. While Col. Dalzell-Payne states that "he had no strategic role; I reacted to orders received and disseminated information" CD1.1 paragraph 3

10.3.51 It is submitted that the evidence before this Inquiry suggests a more influential role than that which he ascribes to himself. He liaised closely with Sir Anthony Hockaday, then the Civil Servant member of the General Staff and according to Sir Arthur Hockaday he played a crucial role and "most of the running on the military side was made by him". Day 271/112/16 to Day 271/113/1 Moreover his involvement in drafting the paper on Marches in Northern Ireland, which included recommendations about strategic direction for the future, demonstrates that he was someone who initiated debate and discussion on areas of policy within the MOD rather than someone who had no strategic role, reacting to orders received and disseminating information.

10.3.52 The minute is particularly important in understanding the culture within Whitehall and Westminster because:

i) It recommends, in the days leading up to Bloody Sunday, a policy of shooting to kill unarmed marchers;

ii) The reason, it recommends 'shoot to kill', is because of concerns about the implications of the NICRA march in circumstances where marchers were going to be seen breaking the ban and the security forces were going to be seen to be unable to police either the ban or the Creggan or Bogside;

iii) It gives the lie to the suggestion that General Ford's memo was unique and not reflective of thinking in 1972. It was circulated extensively within Whitehall and there is no evidence that there was any criticism of the recommendations contained therein. Moreover, even when giving evidence to this Inquiry, the recipients make no criticism of the paper, with Anthony Stephens suggesting that it would be "negligent if "think-pieces" of this kind had not been produced." KS3.105 paragraph 52

10.3.53 The aim of this minute is described within the body of the document as "to outline the situation about marches today, and to make recommendations." G82.514 paragraph 4

10.3.54 Col. Dalzell-Payne in his statement to this Inquiry stated that he probably prepared this paper "having seen the note prepared by Stephens. I probably thought that I should expand on his note for the benefit of my working group although I did this without HQNI clearance." The note to which he is referring is entitled 'Proposed March in Londonderry' G74.457 and was prepared for the Secretary of State for Defence and drafted by Anthony Stephens, the head of DS10 on the 26 January 1972.

10.3.55 The paper's covering-note refers to trying to anticipate some of the problems we may face on Monday 31 Jan 72 "if events on Sunday prove our worst fears." Col. Dalzell-Payne in the course of his evidence stated that the reference to "worst fears" was primarily, a reference to the march leaving the no-go areas and provoking a strong Protestant reaction, and also a reference to the risk of violent rioting and confrontation with the security forces. Day 245/16/4 to Day 245/16/17

10.5.56 However, neither the paper drafted by Anthony Stephens G74.457, nor the paper drafted by Col. Dalzell-Payne make any reference to the possibility of sectarian confrontation in the context of the march in Derry. The Stephens paper does contain a reference to "at least some hooliganism" on the fringe of the march. The focus of the Stephens paper however is on handling public relations in the aftermath, if marchers are seen to break the ban and the Bogside and Creggan are seen to be No Go areas.

10.3.57 There is in consequence no explanation in oral evidence before this Inquiry for the reference to "our worst fears". It is our submission that if, as Col. Dalzell-Payne stated, the paper was a follow-on from the Stephens paper, the reference is a reference to the likely Protestant/Unionist backlash to the marchers being seen to defy the ban with the consequent implications for policing the ban in the future.

10.3.58 Col. Dalzell-Payne's paper reviews the history of the ban on marches in Northern Ireland and identifies a number of problems in relation to enforcing the ban:

i) The fact that "the Force Levels to control urban situations of this sort created by illegal marches are prohibitively high." And that the security forces were unable to police marches 'effectively' without a substantial increase in force levels. "[I]t is not possible to enforce the ban rigidly with the force levels available and we can only hope to deal with two or three large scale demonstrations at any one time." G82.516 paragraph 6 and G82.518-9 paragraph 13

ii) The fact that "It could well be claimed that the activities of IRA gunmen/bombers are easier to control than mass civil disobedience of the sort involved in the defiance of the ban on marches." G82.516 paragraph 6 Thus civil rights marchers were characterised as posing a greater threat than IRA gunmen and bombers. A theme which resonates with General Ford's analysis which categorised the 'Derry Young Hooligans' as a serious military threat.

iii) The fact that a failure to clamp down on the Civil Rights March was likely to result in a hostile Unionist/Loyalist reaction, leading to significantly greater problems in the policing of Loyalist marches in the future. The paper makes it clear that in terms of addressing future difficulties, it as essential to be seen to police the NICRA march in a manner acceptable to Unionism. G82.517 paragraphs 8 to 9

10.3.59 Having identified the difficulties for the security forces, and against that background the paper refers to:

i) The need for "stronger military measures which will inevitably lead to further accusations of "brutality or ill-treatment of non-violent demonstrators."" (paragraph 13) and

ii) The need for "additional measures for the physical control of crowds which threaten to march."

10.3.60 When questioned about what was meant by "additional measures" Col. Dalzell-Payne stated that what was envisaged was a more aggressive arrest policy directed at hooligans. Day 245/18/10 to Day 245/18/19

10.3.61 In the first instance, it is clear that contrary to Col. Dalzell-Payne's evidence, his paper is nowhere concerned with addressing the hooligan problem and that the additional measures, are directed at people who "threaten to march." G82.519 paragraph 14b[19]

[19] See also the evidence of Col. Dalzell-Payne on this topic Day 245/47/1 to Day 245/57/15

10.3.62 Secondly, it is clear from a reading of the paper, as stated in paragraph 15 that the only "additional measure left for physical control is the use of firearms i.e. "Disperse or we fire." Inevitably it would not be the gunmen who would be killed but "innocent members of the crowd." G82.519 paragraph 15

10.3.63 Thus the paper recommends that, in the event that the military are shown to be ineffective in policing the NICRA march on Bloody Sunday, and given that they cannot increase force levels to police the ban on marches,[20] that, in order to enforce the ban the military should shoot to kill unarmed marchers.

> "in enforcing the ban, if you have troops who are present on the ground who cannot actually use overwhelming physical force themselves, to disperse those who have gathered to march, then the only alternative would be to shoot them." Day 245/56/22 to Day 245/57/2

10.3.64 The paper is more extreme than the proposals made by General Ford, who was at least discussing the use of lethal force against persons who were engaged in violent, albeit unarmed, confrontation with the military. Nonetheless there is a clear resonance between this paper and the paper prepared by General Ford, both contemplating recourse to "Disperse or we fire" methods against unarmed civilians as a means of enforcing law and order. As General Ford said in his statement "It is perhaps significant that such ideas were being ventilated within the Ministry of Defence." B1208.041

10.3.65 Yet when dealing with this document in his supplementary statement to this Inquiry, Anthony Stephens stated that "the references to the possible use of firearms are unexceptional, in that they only pose the use of such

[20] G82.519, paragraph 14 "We must accept that the current force levels cannot be appreciably increased merely to impose a ban on marches. If the ban must continue, we are left with two possible courses of action, besides speeding up legal proceedings." See also Day 245/54/18 to Day 245/54/23 "In other words, what you cannot do is introduce more battalions into Northern Ireland simply for the force as is reasonable in the particular circumstances." KS3.105 paragraph 52 When questioned about the paper Anthony Stephens describes it as "a curious piece of writing". In our submission it is only "curious" because of the strained interpretation Mr. Stephens sought to place on a document which clearly contemplates the shooting of unarmed civilians. Day 273/21/18 to Day 273/24/20 Moreover when a straightforward reading of the paper makes it clear that what is in contemplation is the shooting of unarmed marchers, that such a paper could ever be described as "unexceptional", demonstrates in stark terms the mindset which operated within Whitehall and Westminster.

10.3.66 It is our submission that the prevailing culture within Whitehall, Westminster and Headquarters Northern Ireland was one which contemplated as legitimate, the use of lethal force against unarmed civilians, in order to achieve military objectives. The use of lethal force gained increasing acceptance as the persons against whom it was directed came to be regarded as enemies of the State. By January 1972: rioters in Derry; NICRA; and the population of the Bogside and Creggan had all been categorised as active allies of the IRA. The prevailing culture was such that by Bloody Sunday the military operated in an environment in which the use of lethal force was acceptable for the achievement of military or political objectives.

10.4 The Ban on Marches

10.4.1 The Ban on Marches posed significant policing difficulties for the military. The ban, although a ban on all marches, was directed primarily at Orange Order marches and had been imposed by Westminster on Stormont with the aim of appeasing Nationalists in the context of the introduction of Internment. It is noteworthy that at the time the ban was introduced the military did not regard the ban as militarily necessary. G4.49

purpose of physically having such massive numbers available on the streets of troops to physically

10.4.2 The ban met opposition from Stormont from the outset. It is acknowledged that although the British Prime Minister's objective had been to impose a total ban for an indefinite period, he had agreed "in the face of strong representations from Mr. Faulkner that the ban be expressed as lasting "until further notice" and might be initially for a period of 6 months" G46a.288.1 paragraph 2

10.4.3 In the period immediately preceding its proposed renewal the enforcement of the ban had run into difficulties. At the end of December 1971 NICRA began organising anti-internment marches and rallies in breach of the ban. The security forces had been unable to prevent the marches at source and this resulted in a perception that the security forces were unable or unwilling to police effectively Civil Rights marches. There were also difficulties in securing prosecutions, with the RUC referring cases to the Attorney General, which resulted in delays and led to a perception among Unionists that civil rights protestors were able to flout the law with impunity. G46A.288.2 paragraph 6

10.4.4. The ban fell within the remit of the Northern Ireland Parliament and thus needed to be renewed by the Stormont Government. Whether it would be renewed by Stormont was a matter of concern in Westminster, as is evidenced by a paper on the Control of Marches prepared for the Secretary of State for Defence. The paper advised the Secretary of State that the GOC had raised the matter with Mr. Faulkner and had been advised that Mr. Faulkner intended to place the matter before his Cabinet with a view to securing its renewal for a further 12 months. Nonetheless the Secretary of State was alerted to the possibility that "intervention from London might yet become necessary", in the event that Mr. Faulkner was not able to persuade his Cabinet colleagues to renew the ban. G46A.288.1 paragraphs 2 to 5 It is thus clear that renewal of the ban was an issue of concern for Westminster, it follows that effective policing of the ban would also be a concern.

prevent marches starting or beginning; is that not right? A. Correct"

10.4.5 The matter was placed formally before a meeting of the Joint Security Committee by the GOC. A paper was submitted to the JSC by the military proposing the extension of the ban while acknowledging that "the continuance of the ban has undoubted drawbacks, including problems of enforcement". G53.318

10.4.6 During the JSC meeting, the issue of opposition from the Orange Order was raised in the context of the dissatisfaction by Unionists with the ability of Nationalists to flout the law without apparent sanction. The minutes of the meeting reflect the fact that, in order to secure the renewal of the ban, the military were under pressure from Unionists to fully implement the ban, in the context of civil rights marches, and to arrest those who broke the law. This is reflected in the minutes which note that opposition from the Orange Order "could be met to some extent by ensuring that there was no defiance of the ban by anyone. Loyalist opinion had been disturbed by the failure to completely stop the CRA march on 2 January." G52.315

10.4.7 To meet this concern the military policy placed before the Joint Security Committee proposed the strengthening of existing enforcement procedures, involving departure from previous practice. It appears from the paper prepared for the Secretary of State for Defence that the previous practice implemented by the security forces in respect of the anti-internment marches on 25 December and 2 January was "to avoid outright confrontation with the marchers but to make it difficult for them to form a column – and to identify the leaders, with a view to their being prosecuted subsequently." KS3.191 paragraph 6

10.4.8 The military now proposed the following "firmer measures"

> "a. The security forces will normally exercise the option of closing a march route entirely and will not normally permit marchers to continue on the pavements as has been done recently.

b. On the spot arrests of ringleaders, including perhaps well known citizens may be made; . . .

c. The route closing policy described above may result, particularly in the case of multiple converging marches, in the closing of all routes leading to the place of assembly, thus in effect cordoning it off and preventing the assembly from taking place at all." G53.318 paragraph 4

The paper expressly acknowledged that a consequence of the implementation of the firmer line was that "violence may be precipitated in an otherwise non-violent situation." G53.318 paragraph 5 Thus the army proposed, with the express approval of Stormont and Westminster, to take a more confrontational approach to the policing of illegal marches, even where to do so would provoke a violent situation which would not otherwise occur.

10.4.9 By way of implementation of the 'firmer measures' it was agreed that the current RUC Force Order be amended to "include the change of emphasis in control measures and define the military powers of arrest" and that the Force Order be reissued as a joint RUC/Army instruction. G53.318 paragraph 7

10.4.10 The joint RUC/Army instruction issued on the 19 January 1972 provided that a "detailed joint Police/Army plan will be made in respect of each procession" and clearly envisages that as a norm the march would be prevented from setting off. G82.520 paragraph 2

10.4.11 The amendment of the RUC Force Order on the proposal of the military to be replaced by a joint RUC/Army instruction is yet another example, this time in the context of the Ban on Marches, of military encroachment in areas which came under the remit of the civil power.

10.4.12 The proposals for stricter enforcement failed entirely to satisfy Unionist opinion

"The extension of the ban has upset the Rev Ian Paisley and his followers who see it as a final surrender to the IRA. The immediate reaction to the announcement in Stormont was that the Loyalist section of the community was going to be outraged and that victory had been given to the IRA who had said that they would put Orangemen off the streets and would certainly prevent the Twelfth of July marches. Even one of the most liberal-minded Stormont MPs, Mrs Anne Dickson, made a strong and reasoned plea to the Government to "rethink" the whole question. She said that the suppression of the normally well-disciplined Loyalist parades, and the continued failure to control the IRA and to prevent the Civil Rights movement from demonstrating publicly, will invite a Protestant backlash." G82.517-8 paragraph 8

10.4.13 The Orange Order also expressed its opposition and stated that "in the absence of a clear demonstration of the effectiveness of the ban – a reference to the Civil Rights marches on Christmas Day and 2 Jan 72, and the anti-internment demonstrations on 22/23 Jan 72 – the Government could not expect Loyalists to observe it. . . . It has also been said by Loyalists that it is an impossible task to enforce such a ban as there are over 100,000 Orangeman." G82.518 paragraph 9

10.4.14 That the failure of the military to stop the march in Derry could have a knock-on effect throughout Northern Ireland is clearly evidenced by Mr. Gibbens, MOD counsel at the Widgery Inquiry, when he asked Chief Superintendent Lagan "In how many other parts of Northern Ireland were you prepared to see the consequential demand for marches?" WT17.31D

10.4.15 Dalzell-Payne's memorandum on Marches in Northern Ireland also pointed out that "the Force Levels to control urban situations of the sort created by illegal marches are prohibitively high" involving a significant drain on military resources with little benefit in terms of either policing or military objectives. G82.516 paragraph 6

10.4.16 Against this background the march planned for Derry posed unique difficulties for the military. Its timing was crucial because it occurred in the immediate aftermath of the renewal of the ban and at a time when the military had publicly announced their firmer measures of stopping marches at source. Its location in Derry meant that there was no realistic prospect of stopping the march at source and in reality the march would proceed for a significant period without being stopped and would attract a significant level of publicity, both national and international.

10.4.17 In the week preceding Bloody Sunday the difficulty in enforcing the ban on marches was expressly acknowledged by General Tuzo, when briefing the Chief of Defence Staff, to be "the major current problem" "The Security Forces regard a march as prevented (by stopping it on ground and at a time of their own choice) it is aim is frustrated. The trouble as usual is the local news media, particularly BBC TV, who did not fairly report the march and the Security Force measures of prevention on Sun 23 Jan 72. Too much was made of the attempts to defy the law. . . . (The COS [Brigadier Tickell] subsequently gave it as his opinion, and D Int agreed, that the Protestants have got used to the Roman Catholic bomber/gunmen (whom they don't see) and are more likely to react increasingly aggressively to the sight of NICRA supporters defying the law."[21] G70.437 paragraph e It was acknowledged by General Ford in the same meeting that the NICRA march proposed for Derry "can only be effectively halted on the line of William Street, but by the time they arrive there they will have been seen on (invited) TV to have marched." G70.439 paragraph 3(c)(1)

[21] Brigadier Tickell gave evidence that on Day 244/123/14 to Day 244/124/4 to the effect that he believed that the reference to COS was a misprint for CLF. Col. Dalzell-Payne on Day 245/7/12 to Day 245/7/20 gave evidence that he did not believe that it was a misprint.

10.4.18 The Derry march was seen by the military as a significant test of the military and their ability to enforce law and order against the background of their increasing prominence in policing.

> "Our ability to impose the ban is tested now and will certainly be exposed on Sunday 30 Jan 72 when the Civil Rights Association plans to hold a massive anti-internment rally in Londonderry." G82.518 paragraph 11

10.4.19 The Derry march was also regarded as a significant political problem within Westminster. On the 26 January, Anthony Stephens, the Head of DS10 prepared a minute for the Secretary of State for Defence in relation to the NICRA march planned for the 30 January. The concerns identified by Anthony Stephens can be summarised as follows:

i) The march would effectively advertise the existence of the No Go areas in the Bogside and Creggan; G74.457 paragraph 4

ii) No statement should issue from the military which would appear to concede the right to march within 'communal' areas (whether the Bogside or the Shankill), as to do so would defeat the whole point of the ban politically speaking, thus the concept of 'stopping marches at points of the security forces choosing' was developed; G74.457 paragraphs 4 to 5

iii) There was concern about critical reaction from Protestants if arrests were not seen to be made quickly; G74.458 paragraph 6

10.4.20 Thus the problems faced by the military in dealing with the proposed NICRA march in Derry were acute:

i) In the face of criticism of the manner in which the security forces had policed civil rights marches, the military had publicly announced the implementation of a tougher policy for the enforcement of the ban on marches in the context of its renewal. The NICRA march in Derry was therefore going to be seen as a test of the new get tough policy on the part of both civil rights marchers and Unionists.

ii) Unionists regarded the ban as a sop to the IRA who had threatened to prevent Orange Order marches. The Orange Order and Loyalists organisations took the view that if Nationalists could break the ban so could they, a threat which involved significantly greater numbers and would demonstrate the security forces complete ineffectiveness in the face of disorder from both sections of the community.

iii) The force levels required to enforce the ban were prohibitive, the security forces needed to demonstrate that they were effective in policing marches as a means of deterring future marches. To be seen to fail to police the march effectively increased the risk of future illegal marches.

10.4.21 It was against this backdrop that the NICRA march in Derry led to a change in military policy in Derry in January 1972.

10. Military Policy in Derry

10.5.1 There was a significant difference in the approach of the military to policing Belfast and Derry. This difference arose because of the acknowledgement in military circles that Derry, as a predominantly Catholic city, needed to be policed in a different way and a recognition that there needed to be co-operation between the military and the majority community, if policing was to be effective.

10.5.2 This has been almost universally acknowledged and was described by one witness in the following terms:

> "When I assumed my appointment on 27th December [1970], my predecessor and the then Brigade Commander both briefed me on the need, because of the sectarian make-up of the population in Londonderry for the operation of 8 Brigade to be less physical and forceful than perhaps was being used elsewhere in the Province, and that did not just include Londonderry because we had country areas as well for our responsibility, and we played our operations as discreetly as we could, with less physical, obvious action than was elsewhere in the Province.

We spent a great deal of time. Certainly the Brigade Commander did and I did also, talking to representatives of the people, the local MP for instance; I got out and about because of my job and often found myself speaking to priests and members of the public. . . . and this was, from my understanding of visits to Headquarters Northern Ireland and from my understanding of talking to people who were serving outside 8 Brigade, this was a quieter and a different approach to trying to contain the violence that went on within Londonderry compared to the way that containment took place elsewhere in the Province." INQ 1900 Day 241/6/14 to Day 241/7/13

10.5.3 It is moreover apparent that this policy did not meet with universal approval elsewhere in Northern Ireland.

"Part of my duties were to go to Headquarters Northern Ireland fairly regularly, on some occasions about once a week for several months . . . I often met and talked with friends who, in a friendly way, would make it clear that they thought we were a bit cissy-ish and rather - - I do not want to use the word "stupid", but that our approach was being ridiculed by those in Belfast who believed that a firmer form of action should be taken. It was a general view within the Province, and particularly within the young staff officers at headquarters of Northern Ireland." INQ 1900 Day 241/47/9 to Day 241/48/4

10.5.4 Nonetheless until July 1971 the policy appeared to be working and the military perception was that "very significant progress towards normality had been made in Londonderry." G41.263 paragraph 1

10.5.5 The situation changed dramatically with the killings of Seamus Cusack and Desmond Beattie which "turned the Catholic community from benevolent support to complete alienation." G27.197 paragraph 1(a)(3)

10.5.6 These killings by the military were followed by the introduction of Internment which, leading as it did to a deterioration in the security situation throughout Northern Ireland, did nothing to alleviate the tensions which had arisen between the military and the Nationalist population of Derry.

10.5.7 To similar effect, on the 19 August 1971, 8 Brigade launched Operation Huntsman. The operation was designed to lure gunmen into the open in order to shoot them, and thereafter to remove the barricades which had gone up in the Bogside and the Creggan. The operation spearheaded by 2 Royal Green Jackets, while initially perceived as a success "It is disappointing to note that by the following morning most of the barricades had been rebuilt." G3C Operation Huntsman was described by General Ford as "a failure and there was major Catholic reaction." B1208.023 paragraph 3.9

Appeasement[22]

10.5.8 On the 20 August 1971, following a meeting between the GOC, the UK Rep and the "Committee of 30", it was decided "in a last attempt to maintain the hitherto unsuccessful policy of minimum pressure, the military profile should be lowered in Londonderry in the hope that moderate opinion would win the day." G41.263 paragraph 2 also G27.198 paragraph 1(a)(4) The meeting between the GOC and the "Committee of 30" thus took place against a background in which, the low-key approach adopted by 8 Brigade had apparently been relatively successful, while, the use of 'firmer measures' in the form of lethal force, Internment, and removal of the Barricades had only served to alienate the Catholic population without improving the situation.

10.5.9 This initiative is crucial to an understanding of the military mindset when dealing with the NICRA march. Firstly, because the policy was regarded by both General Ford and General Tuzo as a failure which had strengthened the IRA within the Bogside and Creggan. This clearly had a bearing on the decision to adopt a tougher military approach on Bloody Sunday. Also, because they placed the blame for that failure squarely on the shoulders of Chief Superintendent Lagan, in consequence of which Headquarters Northern Ireland were unwilling to take advice from him in relation to the NICRA march.

10.5.10 In the interview given by General Ford to Desmond Hamill in 1984 it appears that he opposed this policy from the outset:

> "while you could dominate Belfast you could never dominate Londonderry. You had to operate in cooperation. So we had to allow the No Go areas. We had to bring the RUC very much into our confidence – bring the Catholic leaders into our confidence, getting things done with their support and cooperation in so far as we could. Harry Tuzo tried it and it all went wrong. I never really agreed with it. There were differences of opinion on Londonderry all the way down the line." B1208.003.010

10.5.11 It moreover appears to have been accepted by General Ford in the course of his evidence that the interview accurately represents his views on this issue. Day 253/26/2 to Day 253/6/8

10.5.12 General Ford made it clear in the course of his evidence that the decision to embark on this policy was a unilateral decision by General Tuzo[23] and a decision which General Tuzo subsequently attributed to the fact that Chief Superintendent Lagan had been a particularly persuasive advocate of this course:

> "he told me later . . . that it was not just the strong views of the middle class Catholics who appealed to him to give them a chance

---

[22] The description of the Policy of Containment as an appeasement policy comes from Mr. Gibbens, Counsel for the MOD, when cross-examining Chief Superintendent Lagan. WT17.30A-B

[23] Day 253/24/16 to Day 253/24/17

to stop the rioting in the city, but that he was particularly and especially persuaded by Chief Superintendent Lagan. And indeed it was Lagan who finally made up his mind that this totally low profile approach was worth a go." Day 253/24/18 to Day 253/25/1

10.5.13 In an interview held in May 1998 General Tuzo described the decision as his major mistake in Northern Ireland:

> "His most memorable experience was making an effort to respond to the attitude adopted by middle-class Catholics in Londonderry who said the British army was being brutal and over-bearing and if it would only desist, this group of professional men would be able to put the situation under control. The General offered to withdraw the troops for a month or so to see what they could do.
> "I spoke very rashly and, as it turned out, quite wrongly and I need hardly say the situation went from bad to worse," he recalled. "This has always stuck in my mind as the major mistake for me. It was a gesture which was quite futile – like so many gestures." L279.1

10.5.14 It is also apparent that this was a view he held prior to Bloody Sunday, according to General Ford who stated that General Tuzo regarded the decision as "the biggest mistake he made in the whole of his time in Northern Ireland." Day 253/52/14 to Day 253/52/16 The reason for this assessment was apparently because in the "succeeding months . . . the situation in the Creggan and in most of the Bogside got pretty well out of control and law and order was not enforced." Day 258/28/15 to Day 258/28/25 This view led him to have "a very low opinion of [Chief Superintendent Lagan]" Day 253/52/2 to Day 253/52/16 and which clearly had a significant influence on General Ford's assessment of Chief Superintendent Lagan.[24]

10.5.15 General Tuzo's view was shared by General Ford, and he appears to attribute to this policy, the situation whereby in December 1971 the security forces faced "an entirely hostile Catholic community". G41.263

10.5.16 Thus after a career in Northern Ireland during which he presided over: the introduction of Internment, now an acknowledged military disaster; and Bloody Sunday, General Tuzo regarded the decision to adopt a military policy in Derry, which would allow a space within which moderate Catholic opinion might have some influence, as the decision which caused him most regret. This analysis impacted decisively on decisions which resulted in the use of lethal force on Bloody Sunday.

10.5.17 The hostility of the military to the policy of containment which had been advocated by Chief Superintendent Lagan is evident from the tone of the questioning of Chief Superintendent Lagan by MOD Counsel Mr. Gibbons, who characterised the policy as one of appeasement

"Q. A policy of appeasement had twice been rejected and defeated by the terrorists?

A. Yes, my Lord.

Q. As recently as November 1971?

A. Yes, my Lord.

Q. Your advice was appeasement in the extreme, was it not, on the question of the march?" WT17.30A-B

10.5.18 The deep personal hostility and distrust exhibited by General Ford towards Chief Superintendent Lagan and which, by his own account, was based in large part upon what he had been told by General Tuzo, is

[24] By way of example when General Ford was questioned about whether or not he would have sought information from the RUC in Derry about the likely strength of the march he stated that he did not go to the RUC because "I would not wish to deal direct with Chief Superintendent Lagan, particularly in the light of the circumstances about him of which I was well aware, well aware." Day 253/77/20 to Day/253/77/23

mirrored by the Rev. Ian Paisley's description of the attitude of the "vast majority of the loyalist policemen of Londonderry" who apparently felt as Generals Tuzo and Ford felt that "they [could] have no confidence in this gentleman". OS1.508 and Day 232/86/1 to Day 232/86/25

10.5.19 That hostility, which in our submission was in no small part informed by the distrust held by those within the military establishment for a Catholic holding a senior post within the RUC,[25] significantly influenced the decision to completely marginalise Chief Superintendent Lagan in the planning and control of the NICRA march in Derry in January 1972.

10.5.20 There appears to have been no recognition on the parts of Generals Tuzo or Ford that they had little option but to adopt a low key approach by the 20 August 1971. Military policy over the previous month had led to the complete alienation of the Catholic population. Moreover the security forces did not have the force levels required to effectively police the Bogside and Creggan. The shooting of Cusack and Beattie, the introduction of Internment, and Operation Huntsman, had not only failed to prevent hooliganism and to remove the barricades, they had resulted in a deterioration of the security situation. Given that tougher tactics worsened the security situation and in the absence of the force levels to engage in more repressive policies there was only one security option. That it had the backing and support of moderate Catholic opinion and the RUC could only be to the advantage of the military.

10.5.21 While there was no apparent recognition on the part of Generals Ford and Tuzo that tougher tactics worsened the security situation, 8 Brigade appeared to have a somewhat different analysis of the situation. See Section 9.5.35-36 below.

[25] A fact reflected in the correspondence from Brigadier MacLellan to General Ford where he describes Chief Superintendent Lagan in the following terms: "he is an RC who was brought up in Derry. He and his family still live, by choice, West of the Foyle. 2 His sympathies, not unnaturally, lie entirely with the Catholic community and he makes no secret of his contempt for Stormont policies." General Ford in his statement to this Inquiry states about Chief Superintendent Lagan "I would have been aware that he was a Londonderry Catholic, and my recollection now is that there was a feeling that he was closely identified with the Bogside community." B1208.028

October 1971 – A Firmer Line

10.5.22 The arrival of Brigadier MacLellan to Northern Ireland coincided with a shift in policy, implemented by General Ford's Directive for Internal Security Operations, which had the approval of the GOC. B1208.024 General Ford acknowledged that his directive represented "in effect a deliberate change of gear . . . in relation to the new instructions which had come down from above." Day 253/34/23 to Day 253/35/15 [26]

10.5.23 This is also confirmed by Lt. Col. Steele in his statement to this Inquiry "Having followed a policy of containment under the command of Brigadier Cowan until July 1971, it became clear in the second half of 1971 that that policy had to change since the conditions on the ground had changed." B1315.001 paragraph 3

10.5.24 When Brigadier MacLellan assumed command of 8 Brigade ". . . it became clear that he had instructions to take a firmer line." C1900.1 paragraph 6 and Day 241/7/18 to Day 241/7/25

10.5.25 Brigadier MacLellan, also confirms that the October 1971 Directive involved a "fresh concept of operations for Londonderry". B1279.004

10.5.26 The "change of gear" in October 1971 resulted in a decision that "there should be a full-scale coverage of the area and three battalions were ear-marked to be set out to do this. But at the last moment they were diverted to Belfast due to pressure from Protestant businessmen." B1279.003.009 and Day 261/11/10 to Day 261/12/23 Brigadier MacLellan was to have arrived with the three extra battalions.

10.5.27 The concept of operations was thus that, by October 1971 there was to be an increase in the force levels in Derry to enable an intensification of military operations. While the policy, in the form of the Directive remained extant, the force levels required to implement the policy were not made available.

10.5.28 In November 1971 however, an additional Battalion was made available to 8 Brigade, as a result of which there was an intensification of operations. 5 battalion strength operations were mounted in the City over the month of December. The last of these on the 28 December 1971.

10.5.29 There is some confusion in the evidence on this issue. Brigadier MacLellan's draft statement, prepared for the Widgery Inquiry in 1972 and written by Lt. Col. Steele, makes reference to 5 battalion strength operations. B1279.004, B1279.005 This is also confirmed by Brigadier MacLellan in the interview conducted by Desmond Hamill B1279.003.001 and by Brigadier MacLellan in his statement to this Inquiry. B1279.029 paragraphs 13 to 15 To similar effect reference is made to these operations in General Ford's Military Appreciation of December 1971 G41.263 paragraph 5

10.5.30 In the course of his oral evidence to this Inquiry however, Lt. Col. Steele rejected the proposition that there had been 5 battalion strength operations stating that this was totally wrong. Day 266/22/18 to Day 266/24/1 He continued to reject the suggestion even when Brigadier MacLellan's draft statement, which he had written, was shown to him. Day 268/66/14 to Day 268/68/12

10.5.31 In our submission Lt. Col. Steele's evidence on this issue is inaccurate. We state this primarily because it is inconsistent with the contemporaneous documents, all of which refer to "battalion strength operations". It is also the case that the basis for Lt. Col. Steele's rejection of the possibility, was that 8 Brigade did not have the force levels. This ignores the fact that the force levels had just increased by 1 battalion.

[26] The reference in instructions from above, is a reference to the demand for firmer measures to meet

10.5.32 Col. Ferguson has also given evidence on this issue which is somewhat at variance with the other evidence. His evidence was that as a result of the increase in 8 Brigade by 1 battalion it was decided to launch 5 in-depth battalion size operations, within the Bogside and Creggan. According to Col. Ferguson's evidence, however this was as part of the implementation of Course 1½ following General Ford's paper "Future Military Policy for Londonderry: An Appreciation of the Situation by CLF" G41 drafted in December 1971. This analysis is consistent with his contemporaneous notes. Day 281/11/3 to Day 281/12/25

10.5.33 Col. Ferguson stated that two of these operations were postponed and the first such operation "consisted of two companies of 2 RGJ, assisted by one from 1 Coldsm Gds, searching some garages in the Bogside starting early in the morning. They were meet by an extremely hostile crowd, which quickly assembled, serious rioting continued throughout the day. I recall the CO 2RGJ telling me that he had never seen such hostility in the City before and that he feared for the lives of his soldiers had they been seized by the mob." B1122.5 paragraph 25 The search operation described by Col. Ferguson in our submission is the same operation as that referred to in Brigadier MacLellan's draft statement. B1279.004[27]

10.5.34 There is an inconsistency as to whether the operation on the 28 December flowed from the October 1971 directive or the December 1971 Military Appreciation. However both Col. Ferguson and Brigadier MacLellan are clear that the operation on the 28 December 1971 was the final battalion strength operation, and that "after this aggressive operation, and presumably because of the very hostile and violent reaction which occurred, the further planned two/three company operations did not take place." B1122.5 paragraph 27

the security situation coming from Westminster, see Section 9.3.6 above

[27] "28 Dec – Arrest & search op in Stanleys Walk (conducted in daylight)" B1279.004 In Brigadier MacLellan's statement to this Inquiry he confirms that some of the operations were conducted by the 2 RGJ which is also consistent with the account given by Col. Ferguson.

10.5.35 As Brigadier MacLellan stated:

> "I came to the not very original conclusion that the more drastic our action the more drastic the reaction. . . . It became apparent therefore that our more intense activities were not only making the general security situation worse and aggravating an already tense state of affairs but also playing into the hands of the IRA's efficient propaganda machine with the result that Catholic newspapers became extremely hostile.
>
> It thus became abundantly clear that instead of isolating the IRA from the community, as directed by the CLF, we were welding them to it." B1279.029 paragraphs 14 to 15

Future Military Policy in Derry

10.5.36 In December 1971 General Ford prepared a paper "Future Military Policy for Londonderry: An Appreciation of the Situation by CLF". G41 In that paper following a consideration of three options, General Ford proposes continuing with the policy of containment, albeit the course adopted was described as Course 1½, to distinguish it from the "defensive and defeatist" course adopted in August 1971. G41.272 paragraph 24

10.5.37 It is evident from the Appreciation, prepared by General Ford, that the policy eventually adopted is not one which he endorses from a military perspective. Rather the policy is one which he is effectively forced to adopt:

> "The best that can be said of Course 1 is that it does not stir the pot unduly in Creggan and Bogside, but it most be recognised that the price to be paid is that a community of some 33,000 citizens of the UK will be allowed to remain in a state of anarchy and revolt. The containment aspect of this policy can certainly be achieved and the temptation to adopt this course until a cessation of hostilities elsewhere in Ulster is strong and certainly attractive from a political point of view. Some limited military benefit will also accrue in that some pressure is brought to bear on the IRA provided that the offensive part is given sufficient emphasis." G41.272 paragraph 22

10.5.38 It is clear that General Ford was aware of the battalion strength operations mounted by 8 Brigade, G41.263 paragraph 5 it appears however that the analysis of Brigadier MacLellan and 8 Brigade that they should revert to "low level activity to allow tempers to cool" B1279.003.001 had not been communicated to General Ford at that stage.[28] Certainly no reference is made to it in the appreciation, which amounts to an intensification of offensive action rather than a reversion to a more low key approach.

Breaking the Stalemate [29]

10.5.39 Over the period July to December 1971 the inability of 8 Brigade to exert military control in Derry, in the manner in which it had been imposed in Belfast, was an issue which had exercised military decision-makers in Headquarters Northern Ireland.

10.5.40 The period marked a trend towards increasingly firmer measures with the aim to "[p]rogressively impose the rule of law on the Creggan and the Bogside" G23.166 paragraph 11(a) and a recognition that "some new initiative is clearly necessary if the present stalemate is to be broken." G41.271 paragraph 19

10.5.41 There was therefore a build-up of pressure from Stormont, Westminster and from Headquarters Northern Ireland for some fresh military initiative to break the stalemate in Derry. This is reflected in General Ford's interview with Desmond Hamill in 1984 when he states:

> "There was a lot of pressure from Stormont to take tough action and I agreed with that. I wrote a paper on it. We had reached a [28] Which is of course consistent with the timing of that decision, made sometime after the Operation on the 28 December 1971.

[29] General Ford when questioned about the fact that he had expressed himself as 'disturbed' by the attitude of Brigadier MacLellan and Col. Ferguson in his memo to General Tuzo stated "I was purely disturbed by the fact that there were no suggestions for breaking the stalemate. That was the crux of the thing: we had stalemate." Day 253/51/6 to Day 253/51/9 The term is also to be found in G41.271 paragraph 19 critical moment in time. The damage was increasing. The youths were becoming more and more confident and unless we did something round about that time the whole thing was going to get out of control. The impression we were getting was that a lot of the local population was getting fed up with the youths. Their own way of life was being destroyed. So all that put together indicated that this was the time to show we were not prepared to allow those hooligans to go on any longer." B1208.003.015[30]

10.5.42 Throughout this period there was an unacknowledged tension between the analyses of Headquarters Northern Ireland and 8 Brigade. Headquarters Northern Ireland had come to the conclusion that the 'appeasement' policy was a necessary evil, pending the availability of additional force levels. In 8 Brigade there was some recognition that in Derry, with its 75% Catholic population, some accommodation had to be reached with the majority population, and that the consequences of intensification of military action were that "instead of isolating the IRA from the community, as directed by the CLF, we were welding them to it." B1279.029 paragraph 15

10.5.43 General Ford's visit to Derry on 7 January 1972, saw the underlying tensions exposed. General Ford professed himself "disturbed by the attitude of both the Brigade Commander and the Battalion Commander, and also, of course, by Chief Superintendent Lagan. All admitted that "The Front" was gradually moving Northwards and, in their view, not only would Great James Street go up in time but also Clarendon Street unless these was a change of policy." G48.299 paragraph 1

10.5.44 While this memo has been discussed previously in the context of its advocacy of the use of lethal force, the memo also marks:

i) A vote of no confidence in the leadership of 8 Brigade.

[30] It is submitted that General Ford in effect accepted that this account was accurate, see for example

ii) A significant change in military policy in Derry at an operational level.

10.5.45 It is our further submission that given the personalities involved, General Ford and General Tuzo, were in a position to effect a change at this level without requiring overt sanction from Whitehall or Westminster. We state that for the following reasons:

i) The memo was communicated to the General Officer Commanding who was the Director of Operations in Northern Ireland and as such, was "responsible for the control, tasks and deployment of all security forces in Northern Ireland." G20.142 paragraph 5a

ii) The close working relationship between the Commander of Land Forces and the General Officer Commanding[31] which means that there can be no question but that the contents of the memo were discussed by them prior to Bloody Sunday.

iii) The views represented the "considered" views of General Ford, the Commander of Land Forces in Northern Ireland and amounted to a definite proposal. We make this submission both in light of the evidence of General Ford to this Inquiry [32] and because in view of the nature of the working relationship between Generals Tuzo and Ford, the fact that General Ford chose to put his views in writing demonstrates that the memorandum amounted to a serious proposal.

iv) The views were obviously receiving serious consideration on the part of General Tuzo as evidenced by the record of the meeting of the Joint Security Committee meeting on the 13 January just 3 days after the memo was sent. The minute records General Tuzo as having indicated that "following a meeting with businessmen in

[31] The working relationship between General Ford and General Tuzo was described by General Ford in the following terms: "our relationship was so close that as we met—I said earlier possibly three times a week entirely privately . . . and, as it were, let our hair down completely, we were in each other's minds totally." Day 253/31/15 to Day 253/31/23

[32] See transcript Day 258/25/4 to Day 258/25/15 "General Ford, it is also a very important document in that it provides an insight into the general thinking that you were applying to the problem as it existed in Londonderry? A. That is correct, it is my first thoughts or part of it was. Q. It is not really your first thoughts, General Ford, because you had a handwritten document which did not include much of the Londonderry[33] certain measures were in mind with a view to putting down the troublesome hooligan element there. It was a very difficult problem to solve within the law." G52.316 paragraph 2

v) The views were those of General Ford who took over effective operational control of the security operation in Derry on Bloody Sunday.

10.5.46 General Ford states in his memo that the prevailing wisdom of the security forces in Derry was to the effect that, absent a change of policy, ""The Front" was gradually moving Northwards and in their view, not only would Great James Street go up in time but also Clarendon Street . . . [which would mean] that this major shopping centre would . . . become extinct over the next few months". G48.299 paragraph 1

10.5.47 He attributes the movement of "The Front" to the Derry Young Hooligans "Gangs of tough, teenaged youths permanently unemployed, have developed sophisticated tactics of brick and stone throwing, destruction and arson. Under cover of nearby buildings, they operate just beyond the hard core areas and extend the radius of anarchy by degrees into additional streets and areas. Against the Derry Young Hooligans the Army in Londonderry is for the moment virtually incapable." G48.300

10.5.48 While General Ford attributes his appreciation of the situation in Derry to Brigadier MacLellan and Colonel Ferguson, the evidence would tend to suggest that this appreciation, is in large part, General Ford's own.

10.5.49 According to Col. Ferguson, Brigadier MacLellan was not at the meeting he attended with General Ford and Chief Superintendent Lagan, which took place at the conclusion of the meeting with the Strand Road Traders' Association. Day 281/31/17 to Day 281/31/23 Brigadier MacLellan is also clear that he did not attend the meeting with the Strand Road Traders, detail which is contained in this document. This document is a refined document which extends beyond your handwritten notes? A. oh yes"

[33] The meeting attended by General Ford on the 7 January 1972 which gave rise to the memo.

Day 261/22/5 to Day 261/22/8 which would tend to suggest he was not at the subsequent meeting, although it is accepted that it is probable that he met General Ford at some stage during the day.

10.5.50 General Ford's analysis of the Derry Young Hooligans as the core problem has been expressly rejected by Col. Ferguson.

"Q. Whether or not you expressed any view yourself, was it in fact your view that unless there was some sort of change of policy, the trouble was likely to spread further into the commercial area around the Strand Road?

A. Certainly as far as – there are two things: one is the containment of hooliganism along the so-called containment line. That was something we did and that was a problem; it caused us casualties; it was a difficulty; it was annoyance to everyone, including the people of Derry, but that was something that was under control in the sense it did not – we did not have hooliganism going into the shopping centres; it did not go into the very sensitive Protestant areas of Fountain Street and so that part of it was all right.

With regard to the problem of bombing shops, that was a problem which had not been solved in Belfast or, indeed in Londonderry. So there are two separate issues. I might have expressed a gloomy view about the problem of bombing, because unless one can get to the heart of where the explosives are and who was carrying the bombs, then it is very difficult to actually prevent the shops being bombed.

Q. When General Ford says in his memorandum that all at the meeting admitted that the front was gradually moving northwards and that not only would Great James Street go up in time, but also Clarendon Street unless there was a change in policy, should we understand that so far as you were concerned that would not completely reflect your view because it does not make a distinction sufficiently clear between the problem of hooliganism which was, in your view, contained, geographically contained, and the problem of bombing which was more liable to spread into areas that were unaffected by hooliganism'?

A. I think that is correct and I think I would disagree that there had been agreement to anything. I do not think it was that kind of meeting." Day 281/38/22 to Day 281/40/13

10.5.51 Brigadier MacLellan is more equivocal:

"Q Should we suppose that that appreciation of the internal security situation in Londonderry was derived from his discussion with you and Colonel Ferguson?

A. I should think we very largely had contributed to it, but he was getting daily sit reps, he visited – I mean, he was supposed to be au fait with the situation and I think he was, but not necessarily – what I am trying to say is that I do not think he came with a blank mind, took this in and then". Day 261/27/11 to Day 261/27/19

10.5.52 What is clear is that General Ford came away from Derry with an extremely jaundiced view not only of the Derry Young Hooligans, and the people of the Creggan and the Bogside,[34] but also of the military leadership of 8 Brigade.

10.5.53 General Ford has sought in the course of his evidence, to minimise the extent of his criticism of Brigadier MacLellan and Colonel Ferguson, rejecting the suggestion that the memo was in effect a vote of no confidence in the military leadership within 8 Brigade:

"Q. In your evidence last week to the Tribunal you said . . . that you were disappointed that there were no suggestions for breaking the stalemate coming forward?

A. Yes, that was the limit of my dissatisfaction.

[34] "The IS situation in Londonderry is one of armed gunmen dominating the Creggan and Bogside backed and protected by the vast majority of the population in these two areas". G48.300 paragraph 4

Q. Would it be fair, therefore, to say that so far as . . . MacLellan and Ferguson were concerned, you had a lack of confidence in them, and, to some extent, their men?

A. No, I did not. Not a lack of confidence." Day 256/14/1 to Day 256/14/10

10.5.54 It is submitted that a reading of the memo itself, and General Ford's evidence to the Inquiry, it is evident that the memo of the 7 January 1972 communicated to General Tuzo General Ford's complete lack of confidence in the military judgment of senior officers in 8 Brigade. We say this for the following reasons:

i) The fact that General Ford describes himself as 'disturbed' by the attitude of the Brigadier and Battalion Commander and then goes on to state in the same sentence "and of course Chief Superintendent Lagan". The association by General Ford of Brigadier MacLellan and Colonel Ferguson's attitude, with that of Chief Superintendent Lagan, was designed to convey to General Tuzo a complete lack of confidence in their ability, given General Ford's knowledge of the low opinion with which General Tuzo held Chief Superintendent Lagan at that time.

ii) Throughout his evidence it is clear that he feels the blame for the problems lie, not with a lack of force levels or a difficult situation, but with a failure of leadership. For example in his statement, he states that "for my part, despite the difficulties, I would have expected a greater degree of initiative and enterprise." B1208.027 paragraph 4.4 And in the course of his oral evidence he states "the attitude was one . . . of really feeling he had to accept the situation and that, I felt was really unacceptable; we had to try and find a way forward." Day 258/26/7 to Day 258/26/10

10.5.55 The memo also takes place against a background in which 8 Brigade had "undertaken more offensive operations against the IRA" Day 281/15/8 to Day 281/15/19 in response to Directives from Headquarters Northern Ireland and had come to the conclusion that they should abandon this approach because of the reaction it was provoking amongst the wider community. Day 281/11/3 to Day 281/11/13 and B1279.029 paragraph 15

10.5.56 Significantly both Brigadier MacLellan and Lt. Col. Ferguson, of whom General Ford is critical, were of the view that this policy had to be abandoned.

10.5.57 It is submitted that following his visit of the 7 January General Ford's appreciation of the situation in Derry had shifted dramatically. He saw a need for an intensification of military operations and a military initiative aimed at breaking the stalemate. He also concluded that this initiative would not come from within 8 Brigade, resulting in a decision that Headquarters Northern Ireland would take effective operational control of the proposed Civil Rights march. G48.301 paragraph 8 General Ford saw the NICRA march on Bloody Sunday as an opportunity to seize the initiative. However General Ford's appreciation of the situation in Derry had significant consequences for the form that initiative took:

i) General Ford regarded an offensive against hooligans as vital, if law and order was to be enforced in Derry;

ii) General Ford characterised rioters in Derry as synonymous with the IRA, he had come to regard the use of lethal force as the 'minimum force' necessary to deal with rioters and in consequence no weight was attached to the Article 2 rights of rioters.

iii) General Ford had no confidence in 8 Brigade to implement the type of initiative necessary, this informed both his lack of consultation with 8 Brigade in developing the concept of the military operation and his decision to use 1 Para.

10.5.58 In our submission, General Ford's memo to General Tuzo amounted to a significant change in the appreciation by Headquarters Northern Ireland of the security situation in Derry and a decisive move from the policy of containment as operated by 8 Brigade. The proposed Civil Rights March in Derry was the first opportunity to seize the initiative and to restore law and order in Derry, with General Ford exercising effective operational control. It led to General Ford's direct involvement in the planning and control of the march in Derry and resulted in decisions which ultimately led to the deaths of innocent civilians at the hands of the Parachute Regiment.

11. CONCEPT OF MILITARY PLAN

"Where it all went wrong was at the arrest operation.
This was carried out by 1 Para. These were General Ford's favourite 'shock troops' and he stood there and urged them on 'Go and get them'.
The Paras cry anyway was Go, go . . ."
B1279.003.014

11.1 Introduction

11.1.1 The planning and control of the operation to police the NICRA march on the 30 January was ostensibly a matter for the local security forces. The joint Police/Army instructions clearly envisage that operational decisions are made primarily at local level and should involve the co-operation of the RUC and the military with the objective of preventing illegal marches. G59.362

11.1.2 Mr. Glasgow QC suggested, when questioning Superintendent McCullagh, that the decision whether or not to stop the march was not a matter for the local security forces, and that the decision to stop the NICRA march in Derry had in fact been made by the JSC, prior to the meeting between Chief Superintendent Lagan and Brigadier MacLellan on the 24 January 1972. Day 232/115/20 to Day 232/116/20 In making that suggestion he specifically referred Superintendent McCullagh to the views attributed to his Chief Constable where he emphasised "the importance of stopping marches decisively, leaving no room for infiltration." G52.315 However the JSC meeting to which he referred was the meeting of the 13 January 1972 at which the decision was made to renew the ban on marches. In fact the decision to stop, as distinct from the decision to ban, the NICRA march on the 30 January 1972, was not discussed by the JSC until their meeting of the 27 January 1972.

11.1.3 Moreover, the minutes of the next JSC meeting of the 20 January show that, while a civil rights march in Armagh was to be banned and stopped,

"An Ulster Protestant Volunteer Rally was also scheduled as a counter to the March. The Committee accepted the Police view, based on tactical grounds, that this should not be banned." G63.378 The minutes demonstrate that: local police retained primary responsibility for tactical decisions on how to implement the ban in their area and that local circumstances were pertinent to the decision-making process.

11.1.4 In our submission, under normal circumstances, the local security forces decided on the concept of operations and made key decisions relating to the planning and control of the operation to police illegal marches.

11.1.5 The NICRA march in Derry on the 30 January was different. It was different in that from an early stage, control over the planning of the operation was removed: firstly from the local police; and, then from the local military; with effective operational control being exercised from within HQNI by General Ford, while seeking to maintain a veneer of local responsibility.

11.1.6 In the initial planning stages of Operation Forecast, a concept of operations was developed, and key decisions were made, which to a significant degree dictated the outcome of Bloody Sunday. The concept of operations involved:

i) The decision to prevent the march from reaching the Guildhall;

ii) The decision that the Army, as opposed to the RUC would police the march;

iii) The decision to provide for an arrest operation; and,

iv) The decision that 1 Para would be used in the arrest operation.

11.1.7 The concept of operations was developed, not by the local security forces in Derry, who ostensibly retained operational control, but by the Commander of Land Forces, General Ford. In our submission, each of these decisions finds its origins in General Ford's memo to General Tuzo, when he "told Commander 8 Brigade that he was to prepare a plan over this weekend based on the assumption that the march was to be stopped as near to its starting point as was practical and taking into account some form of battle (therefore he must choose a place of tactical advantage) and also the fact that the minimum damage must be done to the shopping centre." G48.301

11.1.8 Our submissions on this issue can be summarised as follows:

i) Operational control for the Concept of the Military Operation was removed from N Division and 8 Brigade and decisions about tactics, strategy and even troop deployment were made at Headquarters Northern Ireland level.

ii) Crucial decisions on how the march was to be policed were dictated by factors, unrelated to the policing and security requirements for the NICRA march in Derry.

iii) Decisions were formulated with the objective of 'breaking the stalemate'[1] identified by General Ford in his memo to General Tuzo, and were specifically designed to: take on and defeat the Derry Young Hooligans; and to, demonstrate a 'tougher' policy on the streets of Derry, both to the citizens of Derry, and to 8 Brigade.

iv) The decisions made at Headquarters Northern Ireland level did not seek to minimise the risk of the use of lethal force by the security forces, and created the circumstances in which lethal force was more likely to be used against unarmed civilians.

11.2 Decision to Prevent the March reaching the Guildhall

11.2.1 The order made by the Minister of Home Affairs under Section 2(2) of the Public Order Act 1951 "prohibiting the holding of all public processions on any highway, road or street in Northern Ireland" was extended in January 1972 for a further 12 months.

11.2.2 For the reasons set out in Section 9.4 above, the military, at the level of General Ford and above, and, within the Ministry of Defence, regarded it as imperative to be seen to stop the March, albeit, the march could not be stopped prior to leaving the Bogside and the Creggan.

11.2.3 While there is clear evidence that the local RUC took the view that the march should be allowed to proceed to the Guildhall, there is a conflict of evidence on the question of whether Brigadier MacLellan wanted the march to be allowed to proceed.

11.2.4 The determination of this issue is important in that it demonstrates the extent to which the decision to stop the march, and the decisions which flowed from it, identified at 11.2.1.1 above, were taken, not because it was the correct tactical approach to policing the march but in order to impose a change in military policy in Derry.

Lagan – MacLellan Dispute

11.2.5 It is common case that on the 24 January 1972, Brigadier MacLellan met Chief Superintendent Lagan and Superintendent McCullagh, to discuss the strategic approach of the security forces to the NICRA march scheduled for the 30 January. While Brigadier MacLellan appears to suggest that this meeting was unnecessary, Day 261/43/18 to Day 261/43/25 such a meeting was consistent with the requirement under the Police/Army instruction that there must be prior "Police/Army planning" and a "detailed joint Police/Army plan" made in respect of each procession. G59.362 paragraph 2

11.2.6 Chief Superintendent Lagan's view was that the march should be allowed to proceed to the Guildhall, because:

> "I felt that by allowing the marchers to enter the Guildhall Square, the police and the army could identify many of the marchers by sight and through using photographs they could be prosecuted later. This would have had the added benefit of

[1] Day 253/51/ to Day 253/51/9 "I think, to put it into context from what I can remember, I was purely disturbed by the fact that there were no suggestions for breaking the stalemate. That was the crux of the thing: we had stalemate." General Ford's oral testimony in relation to G48.299-301 minimising the risk of confrontation between the marchers and the security forces.

I believe that had the marches and the speeches been allowed to proceed as planned, events would have taken place as they had done in the past. That is, I expected that when the speeches had finished the majority of the marchers would return to their homes their buses or their cars and a limited amount of stone throwing would then occur by the hooligan element. At that time I did not believe that massive damage to property would result. The only injury or damage that I could see that would happen would be suffered by the security forces as the result of the stone throwing." JL1.9 paragraphs 45 to 46

11.2.7 The evidence of Superintendent McCullagh was to similar effect:

"if the march had been allowed to the Guildhall, then you would not have had a hooligan element in confrontation. You might have had it later, but you would not have had it at that point, the march would have proceeded, you would not have had hooligans misbehaving in William Street or Waterloo Street. You might have had a problem coming back from it, but that is another issue." Day 231/129/13 to Day 231/129/20

11.2.8 Chief Superintendent Lagan gave evidence at the Widgery Inquiry that after discussion, everyone at the meeting, including Brigadier MacLellan, agreed that the march should be allowed to proceed to the Guildhall. WT17.18B-D, WT17.22E to 17.18D, WT17.34A

11.2.9 His evidence did not allow for any ambiguity on the point, as can be seen from the following excerpt:

"Q. On the 24th did you get the impression that the Brigadier's advice was going to be on the same lines as yours?

A. I did ask the Brigadier in the course of the afternoon had he any instructions from his authorities what attitude should be adopted, and he told me that he had received no instructions.

Q. So far as his own attitude after the meeting is concerned, did you get the impression that if his advice was asked it would be on the same lines as your own?

A. Yes, and he was giving this advice in fact to General Ford.

Q. And did he tell you that?

A. He did indeed." WT17.23A-B

11.2.10 Brigadier MacLellan wrote to General Ford, the day after Chief Superintendent Lagan gave evidence, disputing this version of events and stating that Chief Superintendent Lagan's evidence was 'untrue'. He stated that the discussion on the 24 January had "centred around the probable consequences of stopping the march, in order that we could anticipate the steps that we should have to take. The question of whether the march should or should not be stopped was academic." He went on to suggest that Chief Superintendent Lagan's motivation for perjuring himself was because, as a Catholic, his sympathies, and those of his deputy Superintendent McCullagh, "lie entirely with the Catholic Community." G128.849

11.2.11 Chief Superintendent Lagan has made a statement to this Inquiry in which he continues to assert that, while he does not remember Brigadier MacLellan "expressly saying that he thought this was a good idea he did not object or suggest another course of action. There certainly was not any argument about it. . . . I understood that Brigadier MacLellan's report [to General Ford] would be along the same lines as mine. That is, that we would put forward our advice that the march ought to be allowed to proceed and that would be presented as a view that had been reached jointly by us ("our joint advice")." JL1.10 paragraphs 48 to 50

11.2.12 Evidence has been given to the same effect by Superintendent McCullagh, who confirmed his statement that "we all agreed on the philosophy that was to be adopted" and stated that:

"He definitely did not say no, but I was clearly under the impression that he had to receive superior instructions on the matter and it may not, at the time, have been within his remit to give a whole-hearted agreement to it, but I do not remember that he showed any hostility to the suggestion." Day 231/131/25 to Day 231/132/19

11.2.13 Superintendent McCullagh specifically rejected the suggestion that:

"the respect that he expressed for the views that you and Chief Superintendent Lagan were putting forward led you to believe that he necessarily agreed with them just because he was listening sympathetically?

A. Not at all.

Q. You do not think that is a risk?

A. No, he was taking the case that we put to him and we did not expect an immediate response to it in the first place. We knew the matter was of such proportions that it was way above his level and indeed ours." Day 232/120/5 to Day 232/120/25

11.2.14 As against this, in his statement to this Inquiry, Brigadier MacLellan stated that he regarded the suggestion by the RUC that "you could allow the marchers to go through to the Guildhall to make their protest, to photograph them and then arrest and prosecute them later, [as] pie in the sky. . . the whole idea was impracticable. I did not agree with Mr. Lagan that the march should be allowed to proceed to the Guildhall." B1279.032 paragraph 30

11.2.15 It should be noted that in this correspondence to General Ford, G128.849 Brigadier MacLellan never states that:

i) He had expressly advised Chief Superintendent Lagan at the meeting on the 24 January 1972 that the march had to be stopped.

ii) The idea that the march be allowed to proceed to the Guildhall was in his view 'pie in the sky' and that he had so advised Chief Superintendent Lagan.

11.2.16 Brigadier MacLellan did not suggest, as had been suggested to Superintendent McCullagh, that he might have given the impression to the RUC officers that he shared their view that the march should be allowed to proceed to the Guildhall. His evidence is that while he could not remember the detail of the discussion, that the march would have to be stopped was his "starting position". Day 261/41/10 to Day 261/41/24

11.2.17 There is thus a clear conflict of evidence in the account of the meeting given by Chief Superintendent Lagan and Superintendent McCullagh on the one hand and Brigadier MacLellan on the other.

11.2.18 Brigadier MacLellan's explanation for his disagreement with Chief Superintendent Lagan is that he regarded the question of allowing the march to proceed as 'academic', because of:

i) The impossibility of arresting people residing in the Bogside and Creggan subsequent to the march, a proposal which he regarded as 'pie in the sky';

ii) The fact that the Government and JSC would inevitably determine that the march be stopped, given that the aim of the marchers was to demonstrate that Stormont was unable to impose the ban on marches in Derry;

iii) The threat of marches elsewhere in Northern Ireland by Loyalists, if the march was not seen to be stopped. G128.849

11.2.19 He has also in his statement to this Inquiry advanced an additional reason for his opposition to Chief Superintendent Lagan's analysis:

> "Personally, I was concerned that if the march had been allowed to go to the Guildhall, the hooligans would have had a heyday, busting the place up and looting. This would have been followed by a sectarian flare up and I was therefore in no doubt that the march had to be contained." B1179.032 paragraph 30

11.2.20 In our submission, for the reasons set out in Section 9.3 above and Section 11.2.25 – 11.2.36 below, Superintendent Lagan was correct in describing the exchange of views between himself and Chief Superintendent Lagan as 'academic', G128.849 because it had become inevitable that the security forces in Derry would be ordered to stop the march.

11.2.21 It is nonetheless our submission that Brigadier MacLellan has lied to this Inquiry when he stated:

i) That he did not convey to Chief Superintendent Lagan and Superintendent McCullagh that he agreed with the proposal that the march should be allowed to proceed to the Guildhall; Day 261/41/9 to Day 261/41/24

ii) That he did not agree with Chief Superintendent Lagan's analysis that the best approach to policing the march was to allow it to proceed to the Guildhall; Day 261/43/18 to Day 261/44/1

iii) That he formed the view that Chief Superintendent Lagan's suggestion, that the march should be allowed to proceed to the Guildhall, and those breaking the ban photographed, and prosecuted subsequently, was absurd; Day 261/39/14 to Day 261/39/24

iv) That he conveyed to Chief Superintendent Lagan and Superintendent McCullagh that the proposal of identifying and photographing people to be followed by normal court proceedings was pie in the sky. Day 261/239/25 to Day 261/40/2

v) That he believed that the consequences of allowing the march to proceed would be: rioting; destruction of property in the city centre; and sectarian conflict. B1279.032 paragraph 30

11.2.21 Given our acceptance that the discussion between Chief Superintendent Lagan and Brigadier MacLellan was in fact 'academic', because of the agenda of the Commander of Land Forces, the Tribunal may take the view that it is unnecessary to resolve the dispute between Brigadier MacLellan and Chief Superintendent Lagan. It is our submission that this is a dispute which the Tribunal needs to resolve for the following reasons:

i) It goes to the credibility of Brigadier MacLellan, who is a crucial witness in this Inquiry in relation to a number of key issues: whether an Order was given to 1 Para to go in to the Bogside; the nature of that Order; and, whether separation was a factor in launching the arrest operation.

ii) It is a specific example, of the willingness of military officers, at the highest level, to perjure themselves in this Inquiry, and to close ranks in order to protect themselves as individuals and the army as an institution. [See Section 5.2.2 of these submissions]

11.2.22 It is our contention that Brigadier MacLellan lied to this Inquiry, and we make this case for the following reasons, which are developed below:

i) There is a clear conflict between the evidence of Brigadier MacLellan on the one hand, and Chief Superintendent Lagan and Superintendent McCullagh on the other. In our submission the evidence of the RUC officers is to be preferred over that of Brigadier MacLellan.

ii) Brigadier MacLellan, now professes to have held strong views about the decision to stop the march in 1972, believing that the decision to allow the march to proceed to the Guildhall was absurd and that the security consequences of not stopping the march were extremely grave. Yet those views were not communicated to either Lt. Col. Steele or General Ford at the relevant time. These views have, in our submission, been manufactured, to protect both Brigadier MacLellan himself, and also the reputation of the military in the aftermath of Bloody Sunday.

iii) Chief Superintendent Lagan's proposal was not in fact absurd, it was rather, consistent with the containment policy operational at that time, and was the most effective way of achieving a peaceful outcome on the 30 January 1972.

Conflict between MacLellan and Lagan

11.2.22.1 There is a clear conflict of evidence between the 2 former RUC officers on the one hand and Brigadier MacLellan on the other. It is submitted that, in light of the evidence given under oath by each of them, the evidence does not allow for the possibility of a misunderstanding.

11.2.22.2 The suggestion that the RUC officers may have misunderstood Brigadier MacLellan's conduct at the meeting, believing that he was in agreement, when in fact he vehemently opposed the proposal that the march be allowed to proceed to the Guildhall, has been put in overt terms to both Brigadier MacLellan and Superintendent McCullagh. Both have rejected that proposition. Similarly, neither Chief Superintendent Lagan's evidence in 1972, nor his statement to this Inquiry appears to allow for that possibility.

11.2.22.3 In the circumstances the Inquiry is faced with a choice as to who it should believe. It is our submission that:

i) Superintendent McCullagh was a more credible witness than Brigadier MacLellan and his evidence is to be preferred.

ii) The RUC officers had no motive to lie, either to Widgery, or to this Inquiry. It was not suggested to Superintendent McCullagh by counsel acting on behalf of Brigadier MacLellan that he was lying. Moreover no motive has been advanced, by or on behalf of Brigadier MacLellan, to explain why Superintendent McCullagh would lie about this issue.

iii) The motivation advanced by Brigadier MacLellan for Chief Superintendent Lagan's dishonesty, the fact that he is a Catholic, should be expressly rejected.

iv) Brigadier MacLellan's evidence was, in common with the vast majority of military witnesses, informed throughout by the tendency on the part of the military to close ranks [See Section 5.2.2]. His motivation in lying was to prevent any personal responsibility attaching to him for the events of the day[2] and also to protect the Army as an institution from any liability for the events of the day.

[2] A feature of the evidence of Brigadier MacLellan, throughout this Inquiry, was his unwillingness to accept any responsibility for the events of Bloody Sunday. In response to questions about responsibility he attributed responsibility for failures in the planning and control of the operation, either above him, to General Ford, or below him to Lt. Col. Steele and Col. Wilford. This will be addressed in more detail in the Section entitled Operation Forecast.

For all of the above reasons, the evidence of Brigadier MacLellan should be rejected.

Failure to Communicate his Views at the time

11.2.23.1 Brigadier MacLellan now gives evidence that he held very strong views about the need to stop the march. He states that a decision not to stop the march would have been absurd, and he also now states that he had grave concerns for the security situation in the event the march was not stopped. B1279.032 paragraph 30

11.2.23.2 What is clear is that he did not see fit to express those views to General Ford to whom he sent a signal after the meeting of the 24 January. G70A.441 While the signal sent to General Ford does not convey that Brigadier MacLellan supported the views expressed by Chief Superintendent Lagan, he voices no opposition to those views.

11.2.23.3 Moreover, in the statements he made for the purposes of the Widgery Tribunal in 1972, Brigadier MacLellan makes no reference to the strong views, which he now professes to have held, about the necessity of stopping the march.

11.2.23.4 Similarly, in the course of his evidence to Lord Widgery, Brigadier MacLellan conveyed Chief Superintendent Lagan's view about the need to allow the march to proceed. He never took the opportunity to advise Lord Widgery that he had come to a very different conclusion, believing that Chief Superintendent Lagan's views were 'absurd' and that the consequences of not stopping the march were very serious.

11.2.23.5 Had Brigadier MacLellan formed the professional judgment that to implement Chief Superintendent Lagan's suggestions was 'absurd', one would have expected that to form part of his briefing to General Ford, following his consultations with the RUC. Had he formed the view that the consequences of allowing the march to proceed would be: rioting; destruction of property in the city centre; and sectarian conflict;

B1279.032 paragraph 30 he would have been in gross dereliction of duty not to have advised General Ford of the dangers of following Chief Superintendent Lagan's advice.

11.2.23.6. It is also apparent, as will appear below that the Brigadier MacLellan failed to communicate these views to his Brigade Major, with whom he evidently had a close working relationship, and with whom he worked closely in planning the security operation for this march.

11.2.23.7 It is moreover noteworthy that Brigadier MacLellan's concerns about the security implications of allowing the march to proceed were articulated for the very first time in March 2000 when he came to make his Eversheds statement. Even in the interview conducted by Desmond Hamill with Brigadier MacLellan in 1984, and at which Brigadier MacLellan appears to have had access to his contemporaneous documents,[3] Brigadier MacLellan never spells out the reasons he believed the march had to be stopped.

11.2.23.8 In our submission Brigadier MacLellan's evidence that, prior to the NICRA march, he subscribed to the views to which he now lays claim, is patently untrue. His complete failure to communicate those views, either when briefing his commanding officer or speaking to his Brigade Major, render this account entirely implausible. It was only when pressed for an explanation for Chief Superintendent Lagan's evidence by the Chief of the General Staff that Brigadier MacLellan sought to distance himself from Chief Superintendent Lagan's views. G128.849 And it is only in the context of this Inquiry that Brigadier MacLellan has sought to advance concerns about the security implications of allowing the march to proceed. B1279.032 paragraph 30

Chief Superintendent Lagan's proposal 'Pie in the Sky'

[3] B1279.003.001 to B1279.003.021 The interview is replete with direct quotes from documents, for example on B1279.003.003, Brigadier MacLellan quotes from his letter to General Ford of the 15

11.2.24.1 In our submission, the strategy proposed by the RUC was not absurd, but had it been followed the NICRA march would in fact have proceeded "as they had done in the past. . ... The only injury or damage that I could see that would happen would be suffered by the security forces as the result of the stone throwing." JL1.9 paragraphs 46 Those responsible for organising the march and breaking the ban "would have been amenable" to prosecution and the law would have been enforced, albeit not in the confrontational manner envisaged by the military. Superintendent McCullagh Day 231/140/4 to Day 231/140/19

11.2.24.2 While Lt. Col. Steele was not a party to the discussions which took place between the Brigadier and the RUC, he is someone with whom the Brigadier worked extremely closely in the planning of the security operation for the March.

11.2.24.3 Lt. Col. Steele has given evidence to this Inquiry that he shared the analysis that permitting the march to proceed to the Guildhall was the best strategy to adopt in policing the march. He believed it was the best way of avoiding confrontation, and that it achieved the twin objectives of keeping peace in the city, while retaining security. He moreover regarded this approach as consistent with the general approach to security operations in Derry at the time, as the following excerpt demonstrates:

"Q. The plan that Superintendent Lagan is said to be urging on Brigadier MacLellan is to avoid direct confrontation and in effect to deal with the ringleaders of the march on an occasion after the march had taken place?

A. Yes.

Q. Which fits in with case B that you had outlined in your memorandum 10th January 1972.

A. Yes

Q. Would you at the time have shared Mr. Lagan's view, that that was the line to take?

March. G128.849 In the circumstances it is evident that Brigadier MacLellan had access to

A. Yes.

Q. Why was that?

A. Well, because what we were trying to do was to have peace in the city and yet to retain security.

Q. . . . assuming that at this stage your state of knowledge was that there was an intention for the marchers to go to the Guildhall, did you share Superintendent Lagan's view that they should be allowed to go there?
